The great and unpardonable crime is that he is a democrat. There is something fearful and alarming in that word to a stalwart republican; it grates harshly upon the tympanum of his soul; he raises his hands in horror at its sound, and, at the top of his voice, shouts in tones approaching the rattling, rumbling thunders of an earthquake, "revolution," "treason," "conspiracy," "confederate brigadiers." And while the gentleman from Michigan was on the floor one not familiar with the style of manufacturing blood and thunder campaign speeches to fire the northern heart and rekindle the dying flames of hate, malice, and revenge against the South would have almost expected a "rebel" charge on the capital with fixed bayonets. The gentlemen, in their regret, I presume, for not having "fit, bled, and died" for their country in the late struggle, feel a heavy obligation resting on their consciences to fight that war over again in the Halls of Congress, though with weapons less dangerous to their personal safety. If you find any consolation and glory in your unmanly and uncalled-for assaults on the southern section of this Union; if it affords you any solid comfort and soul-felt joy to make false and slanderous charges against your peers and equals and your fellow-countrymen who are bone of your bone and flesh of your flesh; if you have seven vials of wrath whose age has added to its quickening powers, and pouring it on our heads will increase your glory and reputation for statesmanship and patriotism among your people at home, then, gentlemen, for your special benefit and the sake of peace, harmony, and brotherly love we will grant you that privilege—yes, submit.

Mr. Chairman, if I may be allowed to digress, I want to say one word in behalf of the colored people of this country while the very great sympathy of the other side of this House seems to be so much enlisted in their behalf. If I live I intend before this Congress shall expire by its limitation to give them an opportunity to do them a substantial kindness and benefit. If all the promises your party leaders made to our colored people in their political harangues since 1867 had been faithfully and honestly fulfilled they would neither need your sympathy to-day nor mine. They were promised as the reward of their fealty to the republican party forty acres of rich land and a fat mule to each. You did more than this; you declared, through your heralds and emissaries, that colleges and school-houses for their intellectual development and churches for their moral and religious training should cover every hill and dot every valley, and that in a short time they would grow rich in wealth and rich in learning; yea, more, you led them to believe that the day had already dawned in which they would be your equals in all things and our superiors. These promises ought not to have been made or they ought to have been kept.

You have squandered millions upon millions of money and public lands enough to give each a homestead in the shape of subsidies and grants to moneyed rings and moneyed corporations. You have been lavish in your aid to those who did not need it. I now ask you, in the name of fourteen millions of people, to appropriate a few million acres of land or a few million dollars for the purpose of educating the poor children, white and black.

Now, as to the political complexion of the blacks. Upon what authority do you assume that the colored man is a republican, and if allowed to vote untrammeled and according to his own will he would vote the republican ticket? Is black hair and black skin the normal condition of a republican? Does he belong to you as completely as he did to his old master? Have you bought and paid value received for him? If the former be true, you would repudiate and reject your name and assume another quicker than a flash of lightning could dart across the heavens; if the latter be true, then the colored man was emancipated from a master who fed him, clothed him, paid his doctor's bill, took care of him in old age, and buried him when death called him home, and was sold to one who does none of these things, but holds him as a hewer of wood and a drawer of water, without warming by the one or quenching his thirst with the other.

When you have no power to confer a favor or give an office you are very greatly aroused in his behalf; but when in your power to give office you are as tame as a lamb and as silent as a mole. Sir, back behind all this are two great fundamental principles which underlie the secret and cause of the South being democratic and the reconciliation of the whites and blacks. It is well understood and admitted the world over that intellect, talent, virtue, and Christianity must and will finally prevail. You had as well undertake to force the waters of the Mississippi River back through its channel to its fountain-head; you had as well undertake to dry up the fountains of the mighty deep or turn Jupiter from his orbit in the starry heavens as to undertake to crush out the wisdom, the experience, and the intelligence of the South. It is against the unchangeable laws of nature and the irreversible decrees of Him who presides over the destinies of nations as well as the fate of individuals. And the eternal principles upon which the democratic party was inaugurated, the foundation-stone upon which its golden temple was reared, had their origin in the courts above and their growth in the midst of a wise, intelligent, patriotic, Christian, God-fearing people.

You had as well undertake to blot out our civilization and remit us back to heathen barbarism and military despotism; you had as well undertake to shut in the light of the silver queen of night or extinguish the luminous rays of the golden king of day in his meridian glory as to undertake to crush and annihilate these lofty principles and destroy this noble temple. If they should perish and go down, it will be from the hands of their friends in their own household. No enemy, no midnight assassin's hand can reach them; they are lodged and rooted in the hearts of the American people. Yet when we plead for a free and untrammeled election under State laws, you cry out "rebel;" when we defend and maintain the Constitution in its original spirit and purity as the fathers did, you cry out "treason;" when we pledge our plighted faith and honor to our country, you cry out "war, blood, revolution;" when we demand as the Representatives of a majority of the people to be heard in the councils of the nation, you cry out "confederate brigadiers;" when we remind you that the Constitution is being violated and trampled under foot, you cry out "you are opening the book at the chapter and page turned down in 1861 with an effort to starve the Union to death;" when we on behalf of the overburdened toiling millions of the American people demand and insist that the Army shall not be used at the polls, that the Federal head through his marshals and supervisors shall not control the elections in the States for partisan ends, you cry out "you are attempting to coerce the President;" when we claim the constitutional right of the majority to pass laws and present them to the President for his approval, you cry out "you are upsetting the granite foundation of free consent." You have made the "confederate brigadiers" the scapegoats for your sins and transgressions for the last fourteen years until you have completely exhausted the brigadiers, and your sins have become intolerable to your own people, and you must not only seek a scapegoat, but a steed sufficiently strong and fleet to bear your bodies as well as your many sins.

Ah, this will not last always. The burning, seething volcano of public opinion will compel you to get upon a higher level, a loftier plain. The time is and will be when you must and shall meet the democracy of this country upon the all-important and living issues now pending and being tried before that august tribunal of near fifty millions of human souls who will never consent to wear the yoke and bear the burden you have willfully, through malice and passion, placed upon them. And this contest must be determined upon a field and in a position not of your choosing, nor ours, but of the tribunal itself. It will be a manly, patriotic, virtuous contest between the people and the combined moneyed influences for universal suffrage, universal rights, and universal freedom. No threatening, no bulldozing, no coercion, but a weighing and balancing of principle and patriotism in the golden scales of justice and human rights, and a quiet, manly, honorable, and patriotic submission of all parties to the righteous will of the American people, honestly, legally, and constitutionally expressed. The democratic party has been charged repeatedly during this discussion with a purpose and design of destroying the Union of the States. The charge is utterly unfounded and without even the semblance of truth.

No man of reason and ordinary intelligence can believe it; no honest man will believe it. The fear is not for the Union, for you know it is as safe and as perpetual as the "granite foundation of free consent," but the fear is for the safety and perpetuity of the republican party. You tremble for fear of your expulsion from power and because of the apprehended loss of the patronage and emoluments of the Government. Your party may die, the earth may open and swallow it up, the democratic party may perish, but this Constitution and Union, never! They have withstood the wreck of parties and the storm of revolution when its surging waves, more terrible and destructive than an avalanche, dashed against its battlements. But, Mr. Chairman, how are these two great sections, both absolutely indispensable to the salvation, glory, and perpetuation upon constitutional principles of the Federal Union, to understand each other?

Will the North ever understand the true feelings and sentiments of the southern people so long as its information and knowledge are obtained and received through the medium of extreme partisans, demagogues, and professional politicians? If the source of information is corrupt and poisonous, it is natural and reasonable to expect the information to be tainted and contaminated with the same poison and corruption. If the country really desires the "whole truth and nothing but the truth," unvarnished, as to the real sentiment and alleged crimes of the South, it must be derived from other and better sources. The witnesses tendered here on this floor, with their wild declamation and their impassioned eloquence, are incompetent and their evidence totally inadmissible because their political life and existence depend entirely upon the country's accepting as true the infamous and slanderous charges preferred against the southern section of this Union.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if the charges of the commission of crime, the violation of law, and the subversion of the right of the citizens be true, it is indeed a wonderful and fearful commentary on republican administration of justice and republican officials. At the time most of these crimes are alleged to have been committed in the Southern States it is a historical fact that nearly or all of the Southern States were completely under the control of your republican emissaries and political adventurers and their political allies in the Southern States. They held the executive, legislative, and judicial departments of the States in the hollow of their hand. Nine-tenths of the sheriffs and jurors, both grand and petit, and the solicitors, were republicans; and especially was this true in the sections where these crimes are charged to have been committed; and, furthermore, nearly all the witnesses were republicans. Now, if these alleged crimes were not punished with the machinery of the State and Federal governments in your hands, together with the judiciary and all its machinery, the country must arrive at one of two conclusions—either that you sold out the justice you had sworn to administer, or that you are utterly incapable to administer justice. You can take either horn of the dilemma, and either will justify the verdict of the American people that your party is incapacitated to govern this country and execute its laws, or that it is too corrupt and wicked to be longer intrusted with the administration of the Government.

Mr. ELAM. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. THOMPSON having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. BLACKBURN reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 2) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. ELAM. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. FORT. I hope that the gentleman will yield so that I may move a recess until half past ten o'clock to-morrow morning.

Mr. ELAM. No, sir; I am opposed to that. I cannot consent that five or six members on this floor should alter the order of the House.

The motion to adjourn was agreed to; and accordingly (at ten o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, April 23, 1879.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. J. BULLOCK, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting a letter from the Second Auditor of the Treasury recommending legislation to place the claims of certain white and colored soldiers upon the same footing; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. DAWES. I present resolutions of the State of Massachusetts in favor of the establishment of a national bureau of labor. I ask that they may be printed, as they are resolutions of a State Legislature, and also printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

The resolutions were referred to the Committee on Education and Labor and ordered to be printed, as follows:

COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS,
In the year 1879.

Resolution concerning the establishment of a national bureau of labor.

Whereas labor and capital are so essentially dependent upon each other in the successful prosecution of business enterprises that comity and equity are among the primary requisites which mutual interests should seek to ingraft upon their associative relations; and

Whereas nothing can so effectually harmonize and unify existing divergencies between capital and labor as a comprehensive statement of all facts relative to the condition and necessities of the labor classes: Therefore,

Resolved, That the United States Congress should establish a national bureau of labor; and

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, March 4, 1879.

Adopted. Sent up for concurrence.

GEO. A. MARDEN, Clerk.

SENATE, March 10, 1879.

Adopted in concurrence.

S. N. GIFFORD, Clerk.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I hold in my hand a petition from all the pastors of the leading churches, and indeed of all the churches, I believe, in Yankton, Dakota Territory, praying that some legislation may be had to secure permanent homes for the Ponca Indians. It will be remembered by the Senate, no doubt, that these Indians were removed two years ago from Dakota to the Indian Territory, contrary, as they say, to any agreement that they made. They are dissatisfied with their present home and want to return. They claim that they have not disposed of the title to their lands. This petition prays that some action may be taken to secure permanent homes for these Indians. As the petition is very short, and will be referred to the appropriate committee, and probably there will not be a report upon it at this session, I should like to have it read at length, so that the Senate may understand it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will be read.

The Secretary read the petition, as follows:

To the Senate and the House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

We would respectfully call your attention to the sad case of the Ponca Indians who two years ago were forcibly removed from their homes in Dakota Territory to the Indian Territory.

The change has been fatal. They have already lost one-fourth of their number by death. Those yet living are so thoroughly convinced that to stay there is death to them that they are wrought up almost to the point of desperation.

You have been informed of their recent attempt to get away. Thirty of them, under Standing Bear, one of their chiefs, reached the Omaha agency, and were then captured by the troops and returned to the south a few days ago. There is imminent danger of another Cheyenne horror.

They still own their old reservation lands in Dakota Territory; nor could these lands be taken from them by the Government, for their title is peculiar, these lands having once been sold by the tribe to the United States, and then sold back again to the tribe, "ceded and relinquished" by our Government to them. (Revised Treaties, page 665.)

These lands were taken for a time for the use of Spotted Tail's tribe, hence the removal of the Poncas; but Spotted Tail would not stay there, and the lands are now unoccupied.

It would be only justice to the Poncas to allow them to return to their old homes. It would also be for the general welfare. Not only would it avert the danger of another Indian war, but their former white neighbors on the border, who remonstrated against their removal, would feel safer if they were allowed to return, because they would stand between them and the Sioux. If allowed to return, they would virtually move themselves if rations were furnished them; but as they have lost most of their horses by going south, it would be only just to replace them.

We would therefore ask:

1. That they be allowed to return to their old homes in Dakota Territory.

2. If that cannot be allowed, that they be suffered to come north and join whichever of the tribes they may severally choose—the Omahas, the Santees, or the Yanktons.

3. Or if neither of these be done at once, that a commission be sent to investigate their case.

We respectfully urge that something be done at once, and that these Indians be assured immediately that they will be removed from the Indian Territory before another summer.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

INTEROCEANIC CANAL SURVEYS.

Mr. ANTHONY, from the Committee on Printing, to which was referred the following resolution, reported it without amendment, and it was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That 200 additional copies of the report of the commissioners on an interoceanic route between the Atlantic and Pacific be printed for the use of the Navy Department.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. KELLOGG asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 481) for the better organization of the district court of the United States within the State of Louisiana; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. PENDLETON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 482) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to repair and extend the public building owned by the Government at Cleveland, Ohio; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. GROVER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 483) for the relief of William L. White; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. JONAS, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers relating to the claim of Joseph R. Shannon be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Claims.

TRANSPORTATION OF THE MAILS.

Mr. TELLER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to inform the Senate what balances, if any, have been audited and are due for the transporting of the mails prior to the 1st of July, 1878, and which are unprovided for by any appropriation by Congress.

APPOINTMENT AND REMOVAL OF SENATE EMPLOYÉS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next business in order is the resolution offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALLACE] to amend the standing order of the Senate relating to the appointment and removal of the employés of the Senate. The pending question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] to the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.]

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let it be reported, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to amend the amendment of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] by adding thereto these words:

And acceptable to a majority of the Senators. And inasmuch as the appointment of the subordinates and the power of dismissal should remain with those officers respectively, who must be responsible for all the service committed to their charge: Therefore,

Resolved, That the standing order of the Senate regulating the appointment and removal of clerks and other employés of the Senate be, and it is hereby, amended by striking out of the same all after the word "respectively," in the third line, so that the same shall read as follows:

"Resolved, That the several officers and others in the departments of the Secretary of the Senate and of the Sergeant-at-Arms shall be appointed and removed from office by those officers respectively."

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask for the yeas and nays on the adoption of the amendment to the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I am rather surprised at the language of the amendment to the amendment, the first part of it in particular. Of course the last part merely reaffirms the original resolution.

My proposition was taken from the report and the unanimous judgment of the Senate, both democrats and whigs, or republicans, whatever name they had at that time, in 1854, that efficiency, fidelity, capacity to discharge the duties, and permanence should be the true and honest test for the appointees in this body, and the exclusive one. That has stood for twenty-five years through all administrations of various parties, and it has been substantially lived up to.

The Senator from Ohio proposes to add to that the cumulative qualification that the appointees in the Senate are to be "acceptable to a majority of the Senators." What does that mean, Mr. President? How "acceptable?" Socially? In respect of drinks or the absence of drinks? In respect of snuff or tobacco, or Graham bread or white bread? In respect of religion, and if so which kind of religion? What sect are we to stand by as "acceptable" to the majority of the Senate? Or is it politics? If it comes to that—which I suppose is the complexion which we reach at last (that is what it means I suppose)—then I can understand it. I take it as meaning undoubtedly and intended to mean, in view of what has taken place, exactly that, that in addition to fidelity, to capacity, to honor, to good conduct, to everything which makes a good clerk, or a good deputy sergeant-at-arms, or a good page, whatever it may be, there shall also be acceptability in the political sense to a majority of the Senate. That is to be made into a standing order, so that when agreed to and the rectifying providence of the times shall bring around a majority of this body that does not think exactly as the present majority does, then there is a standing order of the Senate that none of the persons who the day before were acceptable to a majority of the Senate shall be acceptable any more; because that is what it necessarily means if you refer to politics, as this undoubtedly does.

Is that right, Mr. President? Is that according to what has been the usage and tradition of this body?

There is force in what the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HILL] said the other day—I believe it was he—that there is no use of crying for spilled milk when your bowl is turned over, and gentlemen on this side of the Chamber ought not to make wry faces because gentlemen on the other side prefer their own political associates. We do not. But if the Senator from Georgia would have the same patience that Senators who preceded us on this side of the Chamber had in old times, under exactly the same rule, they would find that, without kicking out a man because he differed on the true construction of some act of Congress, or thought the tariff ought to be 30 per cent. instead of 40, or whatever it might be, vacancies would happen by natural causes in a considerable body (as the body of our employés is) from day to day and from year to year. There are natural causes of change, resignation, illness, removal from town, death; everything that enters into the composition of a long period of time makes vacancies that are then naturally and properly filled up among gentlemen otherwise equally well qualified by those whose notions are agreeable to the majority. Very well; the consequence in such a case would be, in this change of affairs that has now occurred in the Senate, that in a very short time there would be, whenever vacancies occur in the way I have named, gentlemen introduced whose faith is of the democratic persuasion, to which nobody would object in the slightest degree. Then as time went on and a larger proportion of democrats occupied all these places under the Senate and there then came a change in political phases that should make what is now called the present democratic party in a minority and gentlemen of other views in the majority, the same slow process of change would go on, and the order and fitness of our doing business would be standing secure all the time, and everybody of all parties in the long run would get his equal rights and his equal representation, if you can use such a term in respect of these employments. All it wants is a little faith and a little patience.

We are told by gentlemen that this Government as it is is going to endure now; that there are not going to be any more efforts to overthrow it. If it does, here will always be the Senate; and if we can have self-control enough to let these natural causes operate to make the gradual changes that will be agreeable to gentlemen's political views, shall we not have done wisely? Shall we not have done what democrats and whigs and republicans twenty-five years ago after an experience under a rule just as you would now make it, found was necessary and wise, will continue to be necessary and wise? It seems so to me.

Therefore not out of any hostility to democratic gentlemen who would like these places—quite the reverse—but out of faith in the perpetuity of this body and faith in the justice that every man politically will get if you hold on to the rule as it stands by steady methods and slow processes an absolutely correct average in the end, I very much regret that this proposal is made. So regretting, Mr. President, I have asked for the yeas and nays upon it, and I ask a division of the question so as to take the vote first upon the first part of the amendment, about acceptability to Senators.

Mr. PENDLETON. Mr. President, I desire to inform the Senator from Vermont that the language of the amendment which I have offered, except that portion of it which relates to the acceptability of officers, is quoted from the report which received the commendation of that Senator and others upon the floor of the Senate the other day in discussion. I refer to that portion of my amendment which serves as a preamble to the resolution which I have introduced as a part of the amendment. Inasmuch as both the doctrine and the language of that report received such hearty commendation from the Senator from Vermont the other day I think he must have been unaware that this language was used in that report or it would not have met his criticism.

So far as the use of the term acceptable is concerned I do not care to follow the Senator into a very close examination as to the meaning of that term or the application that it may have, whether, as he has chosen to name the points, to taking a drink or using snuff, or religion, or even politics—I say it is as necessary to the comfort and convenience of Senators that the officers should be acceptable to Senators as it is that they should be faithful in the discharge of their duty. Does the Senator propose that the officers who are recommended and appointed here shall be not acceptable to Senators? Does he desire that no regard shall be paid to whether they are acceptable or unacceptable, provided an equal fidelity in the discharge of duty can be found in both?

I hold that an officer thoroughly fulfilling his duty might by reason of his manners, by reason of his conduct outside of the immediate discharge of his duty, by a course of comment upon the conduct of Senators upon the opinions they hold, upon their capacity in debate, upon their mode of conducting debate, upon a thousand other peculiarities of Senators, might become so unacceptable that it would be the duty of the majority to remove him, and I would be one who would take the lead in doing so.

I think it is easy to distinguish wherein the term "acceptable to a majority of the Senators" applies in this connection. Therefore I trust that the amendment to the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I made no criticism upon that part of the Senator's preamble that he got out of the democratic report of a committee. I devoted all that I had to say to the part that he says is a new invention of his own. Therefore I trust I shall not be thought to be inconsistent, for it does not logically follow that because I am in favor of the democratic doctrine of 1854 I am in favor of the democratic doctrine of 1879. They may possibly be quite different things.

What the Senator has said about the preamble illustrates the whole case. The report of the committee in 1854, from which the Senator has quoted the paragraph and from which I did, the substance of the whole report, concluded as a consequence with a proposition which the Senate unanimously agreed to, to make the rule of the Senate as it now stands and as it has stood ever since. The Senator takes a fragment of the same report as the inducement to repealing and reversing that rule. That is rather a strange method of drawing conclusions, I must say. Either the conclusion that the committee of 1854 drew from the principles that they laid down was a radically erroneous one, or the conclusion exactly in the opposite direction that the Senator draws from the fragment he has taken must be an erroneous one,—one or the other. You cannot draw two opposite conclusions from the same premise; at least you could not until the present time. I do not know how it is now. The part of the preamble to which the Senator refers is unobjectionable in itself, but he cannot wrest it into the means of coming to a conclusion that this rule ought to be reversed and set aside from the same premise. That is plain enough.

My honorable friend says that an employé of this body may so conduct himself as to become unacceptable to Senators. So he may; but if he conducts himself in the way the Senator has described he would be removable under the existing rule, not for unacceptability to Senators but for misconduct unbecoming his place. There would be cause in the very language of the order of the Senate, upon which the Sergeant-at-Arms would report him for removal to the President of the Senate, be he who he may, whether the Vice-President or the President pro tempore, whichever the rule means, or if it means both—to the one who was in the chair at the time. There would be cause, just cause, I agree, and I should follow the lead that the Senator says he would take with entire satisfaction as a matter of duty, no matter who the employé might be.

You do not need, therefore, Mr. President, any change of this standing order which has come down to us for a quarter of a century in order to redress any grievance (for that is the popular term now) that Senators may have in respect of the misconduct of a clerk or a page in this body. The whole power exists already. The only difficulty with the order as it stands now is that there must be a cause stated to the President of the Senate, and it seems that gentlemen are unwilling to state the real cause, that the person proposed to be removed happens to believe in the Declaration of Independence instead of believing in something else. There is the difficulty. Probably it has been found somewhere and in some way that the President of the Senate, be he the Vice-President, who unfortunately, as we all feel, is absent on account of illness in his family, or be it our honored and respected President pro tempore, will construe that rule where it uses the word "cause" as being a cause that affects the demeanor and good conduct and capacity of the person employed, and not his abstract opinions upon questions of the Constitution of the United States or the by-laws. There is the rub, and we may just as well face it fairly.

If it is thought wise in the long run, if it is thought expedient in view of the means that I have suggested of making all this equal in the long run by the slow and gradual processes of what I might call nature, merely for political considerations, in order to give places that have salaries to gentlemen who very likely, when they have been here as long as those who are now here, may do the duties just as well, but who in the mean time cannot and will not, then let us say plainly and fairly that the whole point and object of this is to find places for political adherents, and find them faster than a rule adopted unanimously in democratic times and kept in force ever since will allow. That is all there is to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] to the amendment of the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.]

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask for a division of the question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A division is asked by the Senator from Vermont. It is the opinion of the Chair that the amendment to the amendment is divisible and that the question is to be put first upon adding to the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont these words:

And acceptable to a majority of the Senators.

So that if that amendment be adopted it will read:

That in the opinion of the Senate the correct and safe transaction of the business of the Senate is materially dependent on retaining in its service a corps of experienced, well-trained, and diligent officers; and this can only be done by security in their respective positions so long as they continue faithful in the discharge of their duties and acceptable to a majority of the Senators.

On this question the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. WALLACE, (when his name was called.) I am paired with my colleague [Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania] on all political questions, and as the Senate seems to divide politically on this question I decline to vote. If my colleague were here, I should vote "yea."

The Secretary resumed and concluded the call of the roll.

Mr. ALLISON, (after having voted in the negative.) I for the moment forgot that I am paired with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. WHYTE.] I desire to withdraw my vote.

Mr. BECK, (after having voted in the affirmative.) On all political questions I am paired with the Senator from Nevada, [Mr. JONES.] I withdraw my vote as I observe that this is a political question.

Mr. HEREFORD. I rise for the purpose of stating the fact that my colleague [Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia] is paired with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. WINDOM] upon this and upon all political questions. My colleague is not in his seat to-day, and will not be here for some days on account of a death in his family. If my colleague were present, he would have voted "yea" and the Senator from Minnesota would have voted "nay."

Mr. EATON, (after having voted in the affirmative.) I voted inadvertently, forgetting that I am paired on political questions with the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR.] I withdraw my vote.

Mr. MCMILLAN. As has been announced by the Senator from West Virginia, [Mr. HEREFORD,] my colleague [Mr. WINDOM] is paired with the Senator from West Virginia, [Mr. DAVIS.] If my colleague were here, he would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 36, nays 23; as follows:

YEAS—36.

Bailey,	Call,	Farley,	Groome,
Bayard,	Cockrell,	Garland,	Grover,

So the first branch of the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is upon the adoption of the remainder of the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] to the amendment of the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.]

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Chair please have the remainder reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be reported.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

And inasmuch as the appointment of the subordinates and the power of dismissal should remain with those officers respectively, who must be responsible for all the service committed to their charge: Therefore,

Resolved, That the standing order of the Senate regulating the appointment and removal of clerks and other employés of the Senate be, and it is hereby, amended by striking out of the same all after the word "respectively," in the third line; so that the same shall read as follows:

"Resolved, That the several officers and others in the departments of the Secretary of the Senate and of the Sergeant-at-Arms shall be appointed and removed from office by those officers respectively."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On this question the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DAWES, (when the name of Mr. HOAR was called.) My colleague [Mr. HOAR] is necessarily absent from his seat. This question has assumed such serious party proportions that the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] has kindly consented to pair with him.

Mr. WALLACE, (when his name was called.) I am paired as I have already stated.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. HEREFORD. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia] is paired on this subject with the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. WINDOM.] If my colleague were here, he would vote "yea."

Mr. RANDOLPH. I was paired on all political questions with the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. PLUMB.] As he has voted, I vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 35, nays 23; as follows:

YEAS—35.

Bailey,	Grover,	Kernan,	Slater,
Butler,	Hampton,	Lamar,	Thurman,

Bruce,	Hill of Colorado,	Sharon,
Cameron of Pa.,	Hoar,	Teller,

So the second branch of the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is, Shall the amendment of the Senator from Vermont, as amended, be adopted as a substitute for the original resolution? on which the Chair supposes that the order for the yeas and nays on the original amendment prevails, and that the vote must be taken by yeas and nays.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to have the resolution part of it now read, merely the resolution, not the preamble.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution offered by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. PENDLETON?]

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, sir; the one that has just been agreed to.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the standing order of the Senate regulating the appointment and removal of clerks and other employés of the Senate be, and it is hereby, amended by striking out of the same all after the word "respectively," in the third line, so that the same shall read as follows:

"Resolved, That the several officers and others in the departments of the Secretary of the Senate and of the Sergeant-at-Arms shall be appointed and removed from office by those officers respectively."

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, first I wish to call attention to the fact, as I understand it to be, that every assistant doorkeeper, our venerable friend who sits at your left, is an officer in the department of the Sergeant-at-Arms, and the Senate turns the fate of this gentleman who has been with us so long over to the Sergeant-at-Arms. I dare say the Sergeant-at-Arms will not abuse the power; but the principle we go upon is that every officer may be thus removed. The executive clerk and the Chief Clerk of the Senate are officers in the department of the Secretary of the Senate. The Secretary of the Senate therefore can dismiss those gentlemen to-morrow, although they were elected only a week ago.

But I did not rise to say anything about that in particular. I rose to move an amendment to be added at the end of the resolution as a qualification, in these words:

But no officer or employé of the Senate who served in the forces of the United States in suppressing the late rebellion shall be removed except for cause, stated in writing to the President of the Senate, and approved by him in writing.

Mr. WALLACE. I apprehend there need be no apprehension on the part of the Senator from Vermont that those who act on this apparently tender subject with him will make such removals. I speak for myself——

Mr. CONKLING. Then there is no objection to this amendment.

Mr. WALLACE. But a majority of this body may not see fit to accept as binding law what is really the wish of the majority of this body. It seems to me that has been the action of the Senator from New York, and those who acted with him in the past, and I assume that it will be in the future with those who are in the majority in this body. As to the assistant doorkeeper, he was put in his place by a vote of this body, and I assume that he will not be removed save by a vote of this body. The executive clerk also was put in his place in the same way, and I assume he will not be removed save by a vote of the body.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WALLACE. Certainly.

Mr. CONKLING. Did I understand him aright when I thought he said that the majority had not removed and did not intend to remove any Union soldier or wounded Union soldier?

Mr. WALLACE. The Senator heard me correctly. They have not removed and do not intend to remove such.

Mr. CONKLING. I understood the Senator with surprise; I understand him with surprise now, because I assert that they have already acted in violation of what the Senator says. I assert that they have already removed a Union soldier, a man who served in the armies of the Union and was discharged because of the injury he received; and yet the honorable Senator says it is not worth while to guard this because the majority may be trusted to abstain, much as the overseer may be trusted to abstain from the lash.

Mr. WALLACE. Will the Senator state the name of the party that has been removed? If there be such a case I do not know it.

Mr. CONKLING. I do not think I shall fail to indulge the Senator in the name. I refer to Mr. Fitz, who has been removed from a position in the office of the Secretary of the Senate, a position whose duties he never neglected or came short in, Mr. Fitz having served, I repeat, in the armies of the Union and having been discharged because of the injury and suffering that came upon him in that service.

Mr. KERNAN. Mr. President, I do not find that when our friends on the other side were in power they made any such rule. I for one acting here shall act and intend to act justly toward soldiers and particularly toward wounded soldiers; but I propose to do it from my own sense and not because the other side now seek to make a new rule tying us up in that respect. If we do it we should do it because we think it is right and proper to honor them, and I do not think we should be called upon to do it by their making a rule which they never adopted when they were in power themselves. [Applause in the galleries which was checked by the President pro tempore.]

Mr. CONKLING. My colleague seems to earn the applause of somebody in the galleries by strangely forgetting or strangely ignoring the truth of the matter to which he refers.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from New York permit the Chair to interrupt him for a moment? The Chair wishes to state that if there has been any such removal, he is wholly ignorant of it. The Chair has seen a statement in the newspapers that the present incumbent of the Chair signalized the first day of his service here by consenting to the removal of some employé of the Senate. The Chair wishes to say that no application whatever for leave to remove anybody has been made to the present incumbent of the chair, and therefore there is no foundation for any such statement.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, before concluding the remark I designed to make in reply to my colleague, I pause to observe the statement which has fallen from the Chair, and I am glad to say that I did not suppose, I had not been informed, and if so informed I should not have supposed, that the presiding officer of the Senate had approved of the proceeding to which I referred. But I intended to state, and I do now repeat the statement, that the officer whose name I gave was some time ago, by his official superior notified that he must vacate his place and the day was fixed on which he must vacate, and my honorable friend by my side [Mr. HAMLIN] tells me that the successor of this officer to be removed is here on the spot to take his place.

Now, I turn back to what was said by my colleague. He is going to act upon his own judgment and he is not going to act with the other side, thereby meaning this side, for some new rule that they are to establish, and he says they never established any rule for the protection of officers, of this class of officers at all events. Why, Mr. President, does not my colleague know that this resolution is aimed at the rule which the republican party established by maintaining and affirming it for nearly twenty years? During all that time this side of the Chamber maintained a rule which said that no doorkeeper, no janizary, no police officer of this body should be driven away to make place for a favorite unless the presiding officer of the Senate could be acquainted with reasons for his dismissal which amounted to good cause and approved of them. That was the rule made on this side of the Chamber, made by being inherited from democrats, and maintained and preserved from session to session and year to year even unto this day, even when they came into power and found both wings of this Capitol swarming with men who were the enemies of the Republic——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour has expired.

Mr. CONKLING. Very well.

Mr. WITHERS. I call for the regular order.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 4) to provide for the exchange of subsidiary coins for lawful money of the United States under certain circumstances, and to make such coins a legal tender in all sums not exceeding $20, and for other purposes; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 218) changing the name of the National Bank of Commerce of Cincinnati, Ohio, to the National Lafayette and Bank of Commerce of Cincinnati, Ohio.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is the bill (H. R. No. 1) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment offered by the Senator from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] to the sixth section.

Mr. BLAINE. If the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIAMS] who is expected to claim the floor will pardon me a moment, I ask leave, for the purposes of modification, to withdraw the amendment which I offered to the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The yeas and nays have been ordered, and it can be withdrawn only by consent.

Mr. BLAINE. I ask consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the withdrawal of the amendment offered by the Senator from Maine? The Chair hears none, and it is withdrawn.

Mr. BLAINE. The honorable Senator from Kentucky will pardon me for a moment longer. I see the honorable Senator from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] in his seat. On the day before yesterday the honorable Senator from Connecticut formally notified me, as appeared in the RECORD, to be in my seat yesterday morning, and I was here promptly and waited for the honorable Senator all the day. I do not appeal to him now for any other purpose than to learn when it will be his convenience to desire my presence.

Mr. EATON. Mr. President, I did not notify the honorable Senator at all. I said this, that I should on Thursday or on Friday last have asked permission of the Senate to make a few remarks, if the Senator from Maine had been in his seat; and I said further, that I should ask the Senate to hear me "to-morrow morning." That was yesterday morning. I did not notify the Senator from Maine. As a matter of courtesy, I did not go on because of his absence for two days. Yesterday morning gentlemen desired to press this discussion, and, as that was not a public matter, but a matter private to myself, I withheld asking the favor of the Senate to hear me yesterday. At the proper time, and as soon as may be, I shall ask the Senate to hear me on that matter.

Mr. BLAINE. All I desired from the Senator was that as he seemed in some form to attach some consequence to my being present, I might know in as public a manner as he has already given notice to the Senate. The RECORD of yesterday contains the following, as a part of the proceedings of Monday last:

Mr. EATON. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that I shall ask to be heard to-morrow morning, as soon as the morning business of the Senate is concluded. I should have asked the same privilege on Thursday or Friday of last week if the Senator from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] had been in his seat. As my friend from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] will go on with his remarks on the Army appropriation bill this morning, I shall ask the Senate to hear me to-morrow morning immediately after the ordinary morning business of the Senate.

I took that as a very distinct notice to myself. The Senator had twice refrained from speaking because I was not in the Chamber. He notified the Senate that when I was present he would proceed the next morning. I sat in my seat all day waiting for the honorable Senator; and all I desired now was that I might have the hour assigned when the Senator would desire me to be present and not have to wait and to watch his movements and his pleasure. That was all.

Mr. EATON. Mr. President, it strikes me that the Senator from Maine is driving the matter unnecessarily. I withheld two days from asking the favor of the Senate because of his absence, and he ought to know that I shall not go on in his absence, and he need not sit here longer and be annoyed by hearing speeches that it is difficult for him to answer, to-day or any other day. I will give him notice whenever I shall call the matter up.

Mr. BLAINE. That is all.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, the Senator from Kentucky allows me to make an inquiry of the Senator from Virginia who has this bill in charge. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Virginia when it is his wish that the debate which now proceeds shall conclude?

Mr. WITHERS. I will state that about a week ago, or perhaps more, I gave notice in the Senate that I should ask for a vote upon this bill to-day. That is my purpose still. My desire was that ample time should be given for discussion. I think that the subject has been very thoroughly debated, and I now announce that it is my purpose, if a majority of the Senate shall concur with me in opinion, to endeavor to secure a vote on the bill to-day.

Mr. CONKLING. When does the Senator say he gave the notice to which he refers?

Mr. WITHERS. I think about a week ago, and I have repeated it since on one or two occasions.

Mr. CONKLING. I misunderstood the notice if the Senator's recollection is correct. I did not understand the notice to be for to-day. I am told there are several Senators who wish to-day to address the Senate. I should be sorry myself to prolong seriously the debate, and yet I should be glad for an opportunity to submit some observations of my own to the Senate; and therefore, as I think there has been some misunderstanding about this which led me to ask the question, it would be better for the Senator not to say that he will attempt to get a vote to-day.

Mr. WITHERS. I only wish to say that my recollection is very clear on the subject, and I certainly regret that the Senator from New York has misunderstood the matter, and thereby may possibly be embarrassed in his anticipated purpose of addressing the Senate. I do not desire to cut short the debate in any particular, further than directing attention to the passage of the bill.

Mr. CONKLING. I beg the Senator not to misunderstand me as disputing the statement about the notice he gave. I only said I did not so understand the notice. I thought it related to a later day; and on this day, without displacing several other Senators who have told me they wished to address the Senate, I cannot be heard, nor can anybody except those Senators, as three of them I believe have intimated to me that they intended to speak. So then if it be the pleasure of the Senator and of the Senate I shall ask that any Senator on this side who wishes to-morrow to address the Senate may be enabled to do so.

Mr. WITHERS. In view of the statement made by the Senator from New York, I wish to make a suggestion, if it meets with his approval and the approval of all the Senators present, that we fix an hour to-morrow, say four o'clock, at which the vote shall be taken on this question. If so, it will be perfectly agreeable to me.

Mr. CONKLING. That might be entirely convenient to me individually, and I answer as the Senator addresses me among others; but I suggest to him that we had better not do that now. It will be very awkward for any Senator on this side—I speak for myself—it would be awkward for me should the floor fall to me in the morning, to occupy so much of the time, an hour being fixed, that any other Senator might be cut off. Therefore I suggest to the Senator that he had better allow it to stand simply with the understanding that after to-day he will get a vote as soon as may be. I do not intend myself to occupy a very long time, and yet I should prefer not to know in advance that I was not at liberty to speak more than a certain length of time.

Mr. WITHERS. I should be perfectly willing to agree to a postponement of the vote on this question until to-morrow to meet the views of Senators who desire to address the Senate on the question. I had supposed that the debate was pretty well exhausted. I had no knowledge or information that more than one or two other Senators desired to submit their views to the Senate, and supposed that no difficulty would be had in securing a vote to-day. I think the long notice which I gave in advance indicated my unwillingness to place any obstruction or impediment in the way of such full discussion of the question as might be desired.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I gave way to a gentleman to ask simply a definite question and get a definite answer. I did not expect discussion would arise upon it. I suppose the preliminaries of closing the debate can be settled after I am done speaking. I hope gentlemen will now let me have the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kentucky will proceed.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, it is with extreme diffidence that I rise for the first time to speak in this august body; and nothing but the gravity of the great questions of liberty that lie at the bottom of this debate would justify me in asking this indulgence of the Senate.

Before coming to the merits of the discussion, I desire to say a few soothing words to those Senators over the way, who have manifested apprehension and alarm at seeing so many confederate brigadiers in the Congress of the United States. One would think from their speeches that they were still in doubt as to whether the war for the Union had been a success or not.

Upon this point we wish to assure them that in our deliberate opinion, and our experiences should give our opinion great weight upon this subject, that the war has been a complete success; and I regard the presence of these brigadiers as the best possible proof that the Union is restored.

I wish from the bottom of my heart that the people of the North had shown an equal disposition with the people of the South to honor their heroes, and had given us more Federal brigadiers in Congress. If the complications growing out of the war had been left for solution to the brave men who fought its battles, the country would have been at peace long ago. But the men who shared not its dangers and its hardships, but remained safely at home, and made money out of the blood and miseries of the people while the soldiers were fighting, these are the tongue-valiant warriors who have been a stumbling-block in the path of peace and reconciliation.

In common with the people of my State, I was opposed to secession. Mr. Clay had taught us all that secession was treason, and that liberty and property were safer in the Union than out of it. But when the war came my lineage, my affections, my property all conspired to carry me South, and I went in with a hearty good-will and fought it out to the end; but when the bonny-blue flag went down in the dust, overwhelmed by millions in arms, we buried it with the honors of war, accepted the situation, and renewed our allegiance to the Union of the States. We have no apologies to make, we feel no regret or remorse for the part we bore in the dreadful drama of the past, but we do feel that our own honor demands the faithful discharge and performance of every duty and every obligation imposed upon us by our restored relations to the old Government; and we have from the first been ready and willing to strike hands with all good and true men everywhere in a common patriotic effort to restore peace and prosperity to our common country. We have but one flag, one country, and one destiny. Why, sir, I regard these reconstructed brigadiers as the best Union men in Congress. Of all men they are the least inclined to coerce anybody or anything.

I know of but one possible occasion that would rouse them up with the spirit of conflict again. It is this: The great thinker and soothsayer of the republican party, Wendell Phillips, has made the prophecy that the next rebellion will come from New England. Now should this come to pass in our time, you will find all these confederate brigadiers rallying around the old flag to whip these seceded States back into the Union again. The whole South will be for coercion then.

Thirty years ago, when that flag was insulted and the country called for volunteers to avenge the insult, there are on our side of the Senate now several of these much-abused "confederate brigadiers," who in the prime of their young manhood responded to that call; they hired no substitutes, but rallied themselves around the old flag and followed it in a deadly climate upon many a bloody field. They bore it up at Monterey and Buena Vista; planted it on the castle of San Juan de Ulloa and the walls of Vera Cruz; upon the heights of Cerro Gordo, and finally waved it in triumph over the halls of the Montezumas. Which of you did as much for your country then? These flings at us are never made in society, and it is time to stop them here and not attempt to deceive the people by these mock-heroics longer.

Having said thus much to quiet the apprehensions of my friends on the left, I come to the questions before the Senate.

Mr. President, I have not the slightest difficulty in deciding as to my duty upon the questions before us. At the last session the House of Representatives passed the usual appropriation bills for the support of the Government. These bills came to the Senate, and two of them were amended by striking out several important sections and returned to the House, which refused concurrence in the Senate's amendments. Thereupon committees of conference were appointed, which committees did not agree, and Congress adjourned without providing the necessary means for carrying on the Government for the fiscal year beginning on the 1st of July next. This failure of Congress rendered it necessary for the President to call us together in this extraordinary session.

We are met to-day by the same issues, but under widely different circumstances; then the conflict was between a democratic House and a republican Senate, but there is complete harmony between both branches of Congress now. The reign of the carpet-bagger is ended, and the party of the Constitution and of the people, for the first time in twenty years, has a pronounced and harmonious majority in both branches of Congress; and you, sir, are the first democratic President of the Senate who has sat in that chair since the time of John C. Breckinridge.

And, sir, I can see no good reason why we may not accomplish in a few days all necessary legislation and return to our respective homes before the heated season, for I am sure there is no member of the dominant party in either House of Congress who wishes to withhold from any branch of the public service its necessary supplies but when we vote away the people's money we insist upon our right to say how it shall be used. In voting supplies to the Army we propose to say that none of them shall be used to employ soldiers at the polls. When we vote money to the Department of Justice and to the Executive we insist upon saying that none of it shall be used to support judges and juries where fair and impartial trials may not be had, and that none of it shall be used to hire deputy marshals and special deputy marshals to interfere with the freedom of elections.

We will give liberally, but we propose, at the same time we give, to repeal all those sections of the Revised Statutes which authorize the presence of soldiers at the polls to keep the peace or for any other purpose, and which allow Federal judges to exclude from juries good and true men because they have served in the confederate army or sympathized with the rebellion.

We propose to repeal all those sections providing for the appointment of deputy marshals and special deputy marshals, to harass and vex the people on election day, and armed with power to prevent free men from voting and to arrest and imprison them without due process of law.

In these appropriation bills, we propose to repeal and wipe out forever this whole batch of iniquitous legislation, which is a standing reproach to the statute-book of a free people. They are the offspring of tyranny and hate, engendered in a military epoch, and it is amazing that they find apologists and defenders now.

I hold in my hand a statement of the proposed changes in the Revised Statutes, I will not read it now, but adopt it as part of my speech, so that the country may understand precisely what legislation we propose to repeal:

SEC. 820. The following shall be causes of disqualification and challenge of grand and petit jurors in the courts of the United States, in addition to the causes existing by virtue of section 812, namely: Without duress and coercion to have taken up arms or to have joined any insurrection or rebellion against the United States; to have adhered to any insurrection or rebellion, giving it aid and comfort; to have given, directly or indirectly, any assistance in money, arms, horses, clothes, or anything whatever, to or for the use or benefit of any person whom the giver of such assistance knew to have joined, or to be about to join, any insurrection or rebellion, or to have resisted, or to be about to resist, with force of arms, the execution of the laws of the United States, or whom he had good ground to believe to have joined, or to be about to join, any insurrection or rebellion, or to have resisted, or to be about to resist, with force of arms, the execution of the laws of the United States; or to have counseled or advised any person to join any insurrection or rebellion, or to resist with force of arms the laws of the United States.

SEC. 821. At every term of any court of the United States the district attorney, or other person acting on behalf of the United States in said court, may move, and the court, in their discretion, may require the clerk to tender to every person summoned to serve as a grand or petit juror, or venireman or talesman, in said court, the following oath or affirmation, namely: "You do solemnly swear (or affirm) that you will support the Constitution of the United States of America; that you have not, without duress and constraint, taken up arms or joined any insurrection or rebellion against the United States; that you have not adhered to any insurrection or rebellion, giving it aid and comfort; that you have not, directly or indirectly, given any assistance in money or any other thing, to any person or persons whom you knew, or had good ground to believe, to have joined, or to be about to join, said insurrection or rebellion, or to have resisted, or to be about to resist, with force of arms, the execution of the laws of the United States; and that you have not counseled or advised any person to join any insurrection or rebellion against, or to resist with force of arms, the laws of the United States." Any person declining to take said oath shall be discharged by the court from serving on the grand or petit jury, or venire, to which he may have been summoned.

SEC. 2016. The supervisors of election so appointed are authorized and required to attend at all times and places fixed for the registration of voters, who, being registered, would be entitled to vote for a Representative or Delegate in Congress, and to challenge any person offering to register; to attend at all times and places when the names of registered voters may be marked for challenge, and to cause such names registered as they may deem proper to be so marked; to make, when required, the lists, or either of them, provided for in section 2026, and verify the same; and upon any occasion, and at any time when in attendance upon the duty herein prescribed, to personally inspect and scrutinize such registry, and for purposes of identification to affix their signature to each page of the original list, and of each copy of any such list of registered voters, at such times, upon each day when any name may be received, entered, or registered, and in such manner as will, in their judgment, detect and expose the improper or wrongful removal therefrom or addition thereto of any name.

SEC. 2018. To the end that each candidate for the office of Representative or Delegate in Congress may obtain the benefit of every vote for him cast, the supervisors of elections are, and each of them is, required to personally scrutinize, count, and canvass each ballot in their election district or voting precinct cast, whatever may be the indorsement on the ballot, or in whatever box it may have been placed or be found; to make and forward to the officer who, in accordance with the provisions of section 2025, has been designated as the chief supervisor of the judicial district in which the city or town wherein they may serve, acts, such certificates and returns of all such ballots as such officer may direct and require, and to attach to the registry list, and any and all copies thereof and to any certificate, statement, or return, whether the same, or any part or portion thereof, be required by any law of the United States, or of any State, territorial, or municipal law, any statement touching the truth or accuracy of the registry, or the truth or fairness of the election and canvass, which the supervisors of the election, or either of them, may desire to make or attach, or which should properly and honestly be made or attached, in order that the facts may become known.

SEC. 2020. When in any election district or voting precinct in any city or town, for which there have been appointed supervisors of election for any election at which a Representative or Delegate in Congress is voted for, the supervisors of election are not allowed to exercise and discharge, fully and freely, and without bribery, solicitation, interference, hinderance, molestation, violence, or threats thereof, on the part of any person, all the duties, obligations, and powers conferred upon them by law, the supervisors of election shall make prompt report, under oath, within ten days after the day of election to the officer who, in accordance with the provisions of section 2025, has been designated as the chief supervisor of the judicial district in which the city or town wherein they served, acts, of the manner and means by which they were not so allowed to fully and freely exercise and discharge the duties and obligations required and imposed herein. And upon receiving any such report, the chief supervisor, acting both in such capacity and officially as a commissioner of the circuit court, shall forthwith examine into all the facts; and he shall have power to subpœna and compel the attendance before him of any witness, and to administer oaths and take testimony in respect to the charges made; and, prior to the assembling of the Congress for which any such Representative or Delegate was voted for, he shall file with the Clerk of the House of Representatives all the evidence by him taken, all information by him obtained, and all reports to him made.

SEC. 2021. Whenever an election at which Representatives or Delegates in Congress are to be chosen is held in any city or town of twenty thousand inhabitants or upward, the marshal for the district in which the city or town is situated shall on the application, in writing, of at least two citizens residing in such city or town, appoint special deputy marshals, whose duty it shall be, when required thereto, to aid and assist the supervisors of election in the verification of any list of persons who may have registered or voted; to attend in each election district or voting precinct at the times and places fixed for the registration of voters, and at all times and places when and where the registration may by law be scrutinized, and the names of registered voters be marked for challenge; and also to attend, at all times for holding elections, the polls in such district or precinct.

SEC. 2022. The marshal and his general deputies, and such special deputies, shall keep the peace, and support and protect the supervisors of election in the discharge of their duties, preserve order at such places of registration and at such polls, prevent fraudulent registration and fraudulent voting thereat, or fraudulent conduct on the part of any officer of election, and immediately, either at the place of registration or polling place, or elsewhere, and either before or after registering or voting, to arrest and take into custody, with or without process, any person who commits, or attempts or offers to commit, any of the acts or offenses prohibited herein, or who commits any offense against the laws of the United States; but no person shall be arrested without process for any offense not committed in the presence of the marshal or his general or special deputies, or either of them, or of the supervisors of election, or either of them, and, for the purposes of arrest or the preservation of the peace, the supervisors of election shall, in the absence of the marshal's deputies, or if required to assist such deputies, have the same duties and powers as deputy marshals; nor shall any person, on the day of such election, be arrested without process for any offense committed on the day of registration.

SEC. 2023. Whenever any arrest is made under any provision of this title, the person so arrested shall forthwith be brought before a commissioner, judge, or court of the United States for examination of the offenses alleged against him; and such commissioner, judge, or court shall proceed in respect thereto as authorized by law in case of crimes against the United States.

SEC. 2024. The marshal or his general deputies, or such special deputies as are thereto specially empowered by him, in writing, and under his hand and seal, whenever he or either or any of them is forcibly resisted in executing their duties under this title, or shall, by violence, threats, or menances, be prevented from executing such duties, or from arresting any person who has committed any offense for which the marshal or his general or his special deputies are authorized to make such arrest, are, and each of them is, empowered to summon and call to his aid the bystanders or posse comitatus of his district.

SEC. 2025. The circuit courts of the United States for each judicial circuit shall name and appoint, on or before the 1st day of May, in the year 1871, and thereafter as vacancies may from any cause arise, from among the circuit court commissioners for each judicial district in each judicial circuit, one of such officers, who shall be known for the duties required of him under this title as the chief supervisor of elections of the judicial district for which he is a commissioner, and shall, so long as faithful and capable, discharge the duties in this title imposed.

SEC. 2026. The chief supervisor shall prepare and furnish all necessary books, forms, blanks, and instructions for the use and direction of the supervisors of election in the several cities and towns in their respective districts; he shall receive the applications of all parties for appointment to such positions; upon the opening, as contemplated in section 2012, of the circuit court for the judicial circuit in which the commissioner so designated acts, he shall present such applications to the judge thereof, and furnish information to him in respect to the appoint, ment by the court of such supervisors of election; he shall require of the supervisors of election, when necessary, lists of the persons who may register and vote, or either, in their respective election districts or voting precincts, and cause the names of those upon any such list whose right to register or vote is honestly doubted to be verified by proper inquiry and examination at the respective places by them assigned as their residences; and he shall receive, preserve, and file al- oaths of office of supervisors of election and of all special deputy marshals apl pointed under the provisions of this title, and all certificates, returns, reports, and records of evey kind and nature contemplated or made requisite by the provisions hereof, save where otherwise herein specially directed.

SEC. 2027. All United States marshals and commissioners who in any judicial district perform any duties under the preceding provisions relating to, concerning, or affecting the election of Representatives or Delegates in the Congress of the United States, from time to time, and with all due diligence, shall forward to the chief supervisor in and for their judicial district all complaints, examinations, and records pertaining thereto, and all oaths of office by them administered to any supervisor of election or special deputy marshal, in order that the same may be properly preserved and filed.

SEC. 5522. Every person, whether with or without any authority, power, or process, or pretended authority, power, or process, of any State, Territory, or municipality, who obstructs, hinders, assaults, or by bribery, solicitation, or otherwise, interferes with or prevents the supervisors of election, or either of them, or the marshal or his general or special deputies, or either of them, in the performance of any duty required of them, or either of them, or which he or they, or either of them, may be authorized to perform by any law of the United States, in the execution of process or otherwise, or who by any of the means before mentioned hinders or prevents the free attendance and presence at such places of registration or at such polls of election, or full and free access and egress to and from any such place of registration or poll of election, or in going to and from any such place of registration or poll of election, or to and from any room, where any such registration or election or canvass of votes, or of making any returns or certificates thereof, may be had, or who molests, interferes with, removes, or ejects from any such place of registration or poll of election, or of canvassing votes cast thereat, or of making returns or certificates thereof, any supervisor of election, the marshal, or his general or special deputies, or either of them; or who threatens, or attempts, or offers so to do, or refuses or neglects to aid and assist any supervisor of election, or the marshal or his general or special deputies, or either of them, in the performance of his or their duties, when required by him or them, or either of them, to give such aid and assistance, shall be liable to instant arrest without process, and shall be punished by imprisonment not more than two years, or by a fine of not more than $3,000, or by both such fine and imprisonment, and shall pay the costs of the prosecution.

SEC. 5528. Every officer of the Army or Navy, or other person in the civil, military, or naval service of the United States, who orders, brings, keeps, or has under his authority or control any troops or armed men at any place where a general or special election is held in any State, unless such force be necessary to repel armed enemies of the United States or to keep the peace at the polls, shall be fined not more than $5,000, and suffer imprisonment at hard labor not less than three months nor more than five years.

In all free governments the majority is responsible to the country, and must be allowed to select its own subjects for legislation, and the mode of effecting such legislation. We have selected our subjects and our modes, and while we will gladly listen to the friendly suggestions of the minority, we do not propose to be governed by their dictation or frightened from our duty by the cry of revolution, nor all the ghosts and hobgoblins the great wizard from Maine can summon from the shades below; but will march straight on in the line of our duty, making liberal appropriations for the support of the Government, and appending to our bills such legislation as we deem necessary and proper; and when these bills come to the President, if he refuses his assent to laws, the most wholesome and necessary for the public good, it will be he and his party who will have locked the wheels of Government and "starved it to death."

Why, sir, it is the man who puts on the breaks that stops the train, and not he who puts the machine in motion. But, sir, we have no right to presume in advance what will be the action of the President, and if we knew, it would be unparliamentary and a breach of privilege to proclaim it here; but we have a right to say what his duty is, and we unhesitatingly say that his duty will be to approve the bills we pass, and I believe he will do so.

Mr. President, it was a cardinal doctrine of the old whig party, of which the President and most of his constitutional advisers were honored members, that the veto was only to be used in cases of clear violation of the Constitution, or of manifestly hasty and inconsiderate legislation.

Now, I submit that there can be nothing violating the Constitution in an effort to repeal laws of doubtful constitutionality themselves, and utterly repugnant to the spirit of free institutions; nor can an act be called hasty and inconsiderate legislation which has been thoroughly discussed both in and out of Congress, through three congressional campaigns, and which discussions have resulted in reducing the republican party from a two-thirds majority in both branches of Congress down to a minority in each. There remains, then, but one possible reason for the veto, which is, that this repeal is not in the interest of the republican party.

But, sir, I have too much regard for the President to believe that he will prostitute his great office to such partisan purposes and service. On more than one occasion he has shown himself capable of resisting the extreme demands of his own party, and of rising to a higher and purer atmosphere of patriotism and public duty. I do not believe, sir, that the President will veto these bills, but a knowledge of that fact would not change my convictions or my conduct. We have no warrant for saying that he will veto them, except loose and passionate threats made here and elsewhere. These measures are in perfect accordance with his early political teachings and with his letter accepting the nomination made at Cincinnati; they are in complete harmony with the doctrines of his inaugural address, and with the policy he has indicated for the government of his administration, and they are right in themselves and demanded by the voice of the country.

The Army is the creature of Congress, and is kept alive by annual appropriations made for its support. When these cease, the Army itself will cease to exist.

Will the President disband the Army unless he is allowed to use it at the polls? Will he permit all our forts, arsenals, and coast defenses to be dismantled and fall into decay? Will he abandon the women and children of our northwestern frontier to the tomahawk and scalping-knife of Indian savages? Will he leave our whole Mexican border open to murder and pillage, merely because he is not allowed to use his soldiers to keep the peace on election day? Will he allow the temples of justice to be closed and the execution of the law to cease because his supervisors and deputy marshals are not allowed to conduct popular elections? He cannot, he will not do it.

But suppose he should veto them, what then? I think the country will survive even that shock. But should such a calamity befall us, no man has authority to say what the majority will do; it will be time enough to decide that when the President refuses to assent to the passage of laws demanded by the will of the people.

Why all this rhetorical flourish and clatter about coercion and revolution? Is there anything irregular, unparliamentary, coercive, or revolutionary in passing general laws in appropriation bills? Has it not been the practice from the beginning of the Government? An examination of the Journals of Congress from 1862 to 1875 will show that this has been the usual mode of legislating. I hold in my hand a carefully prepared tabulated statement of the precedents for this mode of legislation, and from this it will appear that in these thirteen years of republican rule no less than three hundred and eighty-seven different and substantive items of general legislation were passed in appropriation bills. These laws so passed embraced every possible subject of legislation, from the act depriving President Johnson of the command of the Army down to the act providing Parson Newman with a ship of war and a salary of $5,000 a year, with all expenses paid, for a voyage around the world to spread at our foreign missions the moral ideas of his august and most Christian court. These objections do not come with a good grace from a party which has given us precedents enough to establish this mode as a fixed principle of American parliamentary law.

I hold, sir, that the President is not a part of the law-making power. He has a qualified veto upon legislation, but there are several modes by which a measure may become a law without his consent. Shall we hesitate in the discharge of our duty until we are advised of the President's views? Must we send a committee to ascertain his will and pleasure before we dare to legislate at all?

Sir, the President bears to the legislative power about the same relation that the Senate does to the appointing power. He sends nominations daily to the Senate, and we approve them as a matter of course, unless there are very special reasons for rejection.

Now, suppose the Senate were to conclude that the fair thing required the President to send in for confirmation the names of as many democrats as republicans, and we stubbornly refused to confirm any of his nominations unless he did so, what would be said of the democratic Senate? We should then hear a real howl of revolution throughout the length and breadth of the whole land.

Only think of the republican party talking of coercion now—a party whose vital principle has from the beginning been coercion; a party which has governed by force throughout all the long years of its glory, blunders, and crimes! No wonder it clings to laws which are the very essence of force. It knows full well that with fair and free elections it will be rejected by the people.

The republicans have possession of all the strongholds of power; they have the collection and disbursement annually of three hundred millons of revenue; they have all the great corporations and monopolies, and the whole money power on their side; they have an army of more than one hundred thousand office-holders ready to contribute a million a year to a corruption fund. Now give them this election machinery with the Army and Navy to run it, and they will spit upon the people who want honest government.

They now complain of a solid South, as if that was a crime. Who made it solid, sir? Your injustice and oppression drove all the respectable white people from you, and your false promises and dishonest transactions with the negroes have driven a large number of them also into the democratic party, the only party that has ever treated either the white or the black men of the South with justice and humanity.

These are the reasons why the South is solid for the democratic party; and I warn gentlemen that they must mend their ways and take their feet off the necks of the people or the North will soon be solid too; solid against the republican party.

The bloody shirt has had its day and the people of the North will not rally again upon that color line; they want peace and business, and not commotion.

But, sir, the real question in this whole matter is whether the legislation proposed is right and proper or not; there can be no doubt as to its constitutionality or of the regularity of the mode chosen to effect it. Is it necessary or right to have armed men at the polls on election days?

There is nothing more repugnant to freemen than the presence of soldiers at the polls. We inherit this feeling of aversion from our English ancestry.

There are numerous English statutes forbidding the presence of soldiers at the polls. That of George II requires that all soldiers shall be withdrawn to their barracks for three days, and forbids their coming within two miles of the voting place on the election day; and yet here in free America it is proposed to bring them on the ground beforehand and have them there ready when the voters assemble, under pretense of keeping the peace, but really to intimidate and browbeat the people and to co-operate with supervisors and marshals to suppress the freedom of elections.

The President has no power to keep the peace at the polls. Congress cannot give it to him. A breach of the peace is an offense against the common law and the statutes of the States, and not against the dignity of the nation, and is punishable only by State authorities. Congress cannot create a constabulary force either of soldiers or deputy marshals to keep the peace in the States. This whole business belongs to that mass of rights reserved to the States.

What would the great men who framed our matchless form of government have said if one had told them that the time would come when armed soldiers would be brought to the hustings to prick freemen from the polls with their bayonets? It will not do to say that nobody proposes to use this power now or that there are but few soldiers east of the Mississippi. This argument is too transparent to deceive the people and is unworthy the great talents of the Senator who employed it. Everybody understands how easy it is to transport troops from the most distant parts to any desired point. If they do not intend to use this power, why not surrender it and stop all this discussion and agitation?

We want to take away the power to use them at all, many or few; and while we are glad to say that the present incumbent of the executive office has shown great moderation in the employment of troops, yet we are not willing to trust him or any other President longer with this dangerous power. We have seen it used in a merciless manner by his immediate predecessor. We have seen it used in all the border States to suppress the freedom of elections. We have seen governors deposed and governors installed and State legislators dispersed by the bayonet; and we are resolute in our purpose to put a stop to these outrages upon public liberty. We intend to take away the power to employ the Army at the polls, whether it be to keep the peace or to count the vote and determine who is elected. We will resort to every means known to the Constitution to secure free elections and impartial trials by jury—the two chief bulwarks of our freedom.

For these heroes have poured out their blood upon the battle-field and martyrs have died upon the scaffold and the block, and we cannot surrender them without disgrace and slavery. When we have banished the Army from the polls we will repeal the law authorizing Federal judges to apply the test oath to juries. Why, sir, shall a good and true man be excluded from the jury-box because he sympathized with the rebellion? The highest offices in the country are now open to all alike, and we find confederate soldiers in nearly every branch of the Government service. We find them in the consulate and diplomatic service; we find them Cabinet ministers as well as foreign ministers; we find them in the House of Representatives and upon the floor of the Senate; then why exclude them from juries? No good reason can be given why this obnoxious law should not be at once repealed.

We next propose to repeal all those sections of the Revised Statutes which authorize the appointment of supervisors of elections and the employment of deputy marshals to arrest and imprison freemen at the polls, without process of law, and deny them the right to vote. The practical workings of this piece of election machinery has been that the very worst class of men have been selected and paid $5 per day not to protect the purity of the ballot but to corrupt it. The proof taken by the committees of the House shows that roughs and rowdies, jail-birds and penitentiary convicts, the very cankers of city populations, have been selected to do this dirty work. What freedom and purity of ballot could be expected with such guardian angels as these protecting the sacred right of suffrage? The fact is established that they prevented from voting many thousand naturalized citizens who had been voting for ten years, upon the pretense that their naturalization papers had not been recorded in a proper manner. The courts overruled these decisions of the supervisors, but the election was over and their votes were lost. Many elections for Congress have been carried in this way.

The friends of this election scheme say that it is necessary to protect the negro voter against intimidation from his old master; but there is not a word of truth in this, for the real object is to control the elections in the great cities of the North—for nine-tenths of all the money expended upon supervisors and deputy marshals has been expended in the Northern States.

The people do not want these Federal officers at the polls, whether they be soldiers, supervisors, or deputy marshals. They want no interference with their State elections, and elections for Congress are State elections, and Congressmen themselves are State officers and not Federal officers.

The Legislatures of the States and the people of the several districts are the constituency of Senators and Representatives in Congress. They receive their commissions from the governor, and when they resign (which is very seldom) they send their resignations to the governor and not to the President. They are State officers and not Federal officers. This has been authoritatively settled in the case of William Blount, United States Senator from Tennessee, who was impeached by the House of Representatives in 1798, and the impeachment was dismissed upon the ground that a United States Senator was not an officer of the Federal Government.

Section 4, article 1, of the Constitution reads:

> The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators.

Under this power Congress by the act of February, 1872, fixed the time of holding the elections on the Tuesday after the first Monday in November of each alternate year, the place in convenient districts of contiguous territory, and the manner by ballot. This exhausted the power of Congress over the subject, and left to the local authorities the entire business of conducting the elections.

The appointment of judges, clerks, and sheriffs, the keeping of the peace at the polls, the challenging of votes, and the punishment of perjury and fraudulent voting, and indeed the entire machinery for conducting elections, was left by the Constitution to the local authorities.

The second section of the first article of the Constitution provides that—

> The electors—
> For Representatives—
> in each State shall have the qualification requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature.

Now, I submit that the power to prescribe the qualifications of voters includes the power to judge of these qualifications, and therefore the officers who are to conduct the elections and determine who are and who are not legal voters must be appointed by the States.

Section 4 of the same article applies to Senators as well as Representatives; and if supervisors and deputy marshals are to conduct the elections for Representatives in Congress, why may they not preside over Legislatures of the States when they come to elect their Senators. But all these odious laws should be repealed, even if they were clearly constitutional, because they are hateful to the people. All this machinery of test oaths, of bayonets and deputy marshals at the polls was designed to control the elections in the interest of the republican party.

Suppose one of these deputy marshals arrests a democratic voter on suspicion that he is about to cast a fraudulent vote; who is to try him for this political offense, and what chance has he for justice when he is arraigned by a partisan attorney before a partisan judge and tried by a packed jury and his liberty sworn away by hired witnesses? He has no more chance for justice or mercy than a Spanish heretic before one of the courts of Torquemada. Hundreds of exactly such cases are to be found upon the dockets to-day in Louisiana and South Carolina. We got along well enough under the old system for eighty years, and why not return to it? Why shall the people be harassed and bedeviled by this everlasting intermeddling and interference of Federal officials in their local affairs? It has become positively oppressive to them.

Under republican rule the tendency of the Government has been constantly toward centralization and imperialism. This spirit of encroachment has marked the movement of every branch of the Government. Presidents, Congress, and judges have all invaded the functions of the State governments and attempted to make everything hinge and turn upon central influence. In the earlier and better days of the Republic the people looked to their State governments for everything. The hand of Federal power rested so gently upon them that they were reminded only of its existence by the occurrence of the presidential election once in four years. They looked upon the flag of the common country as the symbol of a great and invisible power, created to defend them against foreign invasion, to protect their commerce upon the high seas, and to attend to a few general duties which could not be so well done by the States in their separate capacities; but now they see this power pervading every branch of business and life.

I can remember, sir, when the governor of a State was a great dignitary in the land, but I have lived to see him so shorn of his power and consequence by Federal usurpation that his office is only coveted now as a stepping-stone to some higher position.

In the olden times State Legislatures were august assemblies, where the greatest political problems were solved and where genius, eloquence, and patriotism were trained for the highest walks of statesmanship; but they too have been dwarfed by the blighting influence of central power until they have become mere debating societies and spend their time in passing private bills.

The judge of a State circuit court was once an official of great consequence and conducted his courts with dignity and decorum; but now he is so overshadowed by the judge of his Federal district that he is treated with less respect than was once shown a Virginia justice of the peace; and a deputy United States marshal snubs the sheriff of a county.

All this has followed from the practical assertion of that most pernicious political heresy, that the Federal Government is one of absolute supremacy. The Constitution is supreme, but the Government founded by it is not absolute, but subject to it.

Mr. President, this eternal intermeddling with their local affairs has a most chilling effect upon the sentiments of patriotism and loyalty in the breasts of the people. Will they love a Government that sends its pimps and spies and detectives into every nook and corner of the land to watch them in their private affairs? Can any man feel like a freeman when he knows that all his movements are watched by the gendarmes of a government that treats him as a suspected felon? Are such circumstances favorable to the development and growth of that manly spirit of independence which distinguishes a freeman from a serf? No, sir, they are utterly destructive of manhood among men and will sink the citizen into the subject—the freeman into the slave.

Mr. President, the high mission of the democratic party is to assert the supremacy of the Constitution; to subordinate the military to the civil power; to bring the Federal Government back to its constitutional limits and to restore to the States and people their rights and liberties; to make a new procession of the boundary-lines between Federal and State authority and set up again the ancient cornerstones of freedom that have been thrown down by the violence of war and party passion.

Men often talk about the legislation of war. There is no such thing; the decrees of war are written in blood; its laws are the laws of force and find no place in the statute-book of a free people.

The war established some facts but no new theories of government. It freed the negro and established the fact that the people were determined that the union of the States should be perpetual. Even the three amendments made no fundamental changes in the principles of our Government. They all relate to one and the same subject, the negro. The first makes him a freeman, the second makes him a citizen, and the third a voter. That is all. The Federal Government has acquired no new powers and the States have lost none of their rights nor the people any of their liberties by the war; but they all stand under the Constitution equal and free just as they did before the war.

To re-establish this Constitution and to reassure these rights and liberties is the great mission of the democratic party. All this we propose to accomplish not by revolution or coercion but by the peaceful and constitutional arms of the voice and the ballot, which must be free and fair. It has a herculean labor before it, but it will prove equal to the occasion. This grand old party existed before the birth of the Republic and has been fighting the battles of the people for more than one hundred years, and it is to-day stronger than ever before. It has survived all the great parties that have existed in the country since the Government began. It has lived to drop a tear upon the grave of the old whig party, the greatest of all its rivals and foes, and it will yet live to strew with flowers the green grave of the great party founded by Seward, Sumner, and Lincoln. Look at it! It stands to-day, like a mighty oak, deep-rooted in the rock of the Constitution and lifting on high its scarred and majestic trunk, its branches greener and fresher than when planted by the hand of God in the affections of the people.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Mr. President, this discussion has taken such a wide range that I hardly know where to begin, and I shall be fortunate if I know where to end.

The resolution that was introduced sometime ago by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] who is not now in his seat was the first step in the discussion. It was followed by a very able discourse by that Senator, and when that question was pending I had intended to make some observations to the Senate upon it. It was called up and put aside to suit the wishes of gentlemen who desired to speak upon it, and we have had some very able and interesting speeches upon the subject which is presented to the Senate.

Then the Senator from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] in his discourse the other day referred to a bill which is not now before us, which is still pending in the other House, and he said with great truth that the subject-matter of that bill was so connected with the one under debate that he was compelled from necessity to allude to it. So, too, in speaking upon this subject I shall not consider myself as departing from any rule of propriety or of order if I shall review or at least refer to the several topics that have been brought into this discussion by the Army bill, the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts, and the bill which is now pending in the other House.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that this resolution violates one of the cardinal principles of parliamentary law. Although it attempts to disguise its true object by the use of the words "one House of Congress," it must be clear that it means to arraign the House of Representatives for a refusal to make appropriations except upon conditions offensive to this body and the Executive. Sir, nothing has happened at the last session, or is anything likely to happen at the present one, to justify the passage of this resolution. The House of Representatives has at no time since I have been a member of this body imposed any such conditions on this House or on the Executive as are mentioned in this resolution. It is true that before the late adjournment of the Forty-fifth Congress appropriation bills were sent here containing provisions which failed to receive the concurrence of the Senate and for that reason did not become laws. Still, sir, no man has a right to say in his place in Congress, that when these bills were before the other House it was the duty of that body to anticipate the sense of the Senate or the Executive in regard to any of the provisions of said bills. There is no way known to the Constitution in which one House can get the sense of the other except the regular parliamentary way—by transmitting its acts and resolutions in conformity with the joint rules of the Houses, and having them voted on by a quorum of either body.

The resolution speaks of the refusal of the House to make appropriati ns except upon condition that this body and the President give their consent to legislation which they disapprove. Where is the evidence of this? If the House of Representatives, following the many examples of the past and in strict conformity to its own rules, should put a proviso repealing a statute on an appropriation bill, how is the sense of this body or the Executive to be ascertained before the bill reaches them in the constitutional and parliamentary way? Is the House to rely upon idle rumors, the exaggerations of the press, or the gossip of the lobby in a matter of this kind. And can the House have no other object than the coercion of the Senate and the President in taking such a step? Who can say that it was not its purpose to avoid the delays which obstruct ordinary legislation when opposed by a strong minority? But, sir, the Senate has no right to draw in question the motives of the other House respecting a matter which is within its exclusive jurisdiction. Each House of Congress under the Constitution has the right to determine the rules of its proceedings, and no power on earth can legally or rightfully invade that right.

The House of Representatives in one of its rules, as I understand, has made it proper for general legislation to be ingrafted on appropriation bills if it tends in the direction of retrenchment and is germane to the bill. Now, who can question the right of the people's Representatives to adopt that rule under the Constitution, or the conclusive force of the decision of their Speaker when he decides that a provision falling within it is germane to the bill. How is it possible, sir, for a compliance with such a rule to amount to revolution? By revolution I understand the subversion of legal authority and regular government; the overturning of established laws and institutions and the displacement of the sovereign power in the state. We have become so accustomed to dwell upon the subject of revolution that we have lost all just conception of its real character and import. If the exercise of a clear and undisputed power, conferred by the Constitution the better to secure the independence and efficiency of Congress, be revolution, then the case which I have been considering and which is denounced by the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts amounts to revolution. Say what we will, sir, the Congress in which we are now sitting is an American Congress deliberating under the authority of the Constitution of the United States, and the people of this great country must know and feel that their rights and interests can never be seriously affected by a compliance on the part of their representatives with the laws under which they live.

The exclusive power conferred on the House of Representatives to originate money bills was put into the Constitution after the most careful consideration and the fullest debate. It has been said that the example of the British constitution in respect to such bills is not applicable to our system; but, sir, I affirm that it was that example and the struggles for human liberty with which it is associated that led to its imitation by the framers of the Constitution.

When this subject was under consideration in the convention at Philadelphia the very objections that were mentioned by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] last evening in his speech were presented. What said Mr. Randolph?

He argued, first, that he had not wished for this privilege while a proportional representation in the Senate was in contemplation, but since an equality had been fixed in that House the large States would require this compensation at least. Secondly, that it would make the plan more acceptable to the people, because they will consider the Senate as the more aristocratic body and will expect that the usual guards against its influence will be provided, according to the example of Great Britain. Thirdly, the privilege will give some advantage to the House of Representatives if it extends to the originating only; but still more if it restrains the Senate from amending. Fourthly, he called on the smaller States to concur in the measure as the condition by which alone the compromise had entitled them to an equality in the Senate.

And it is astonishing to me that many of the Representatives from the large States of this Union at the present day should be found acting in opposition to this provision, which was a concession on the part of the small States to them in exchange for the concession of equality of representation in this body to the smaller ones. That is the true history of the provision. Mr. Wilson said he—

Was himself directly opposed to the equality of votes granted to the Senate by its present constitution. At the same time he wished not to multiply the vices of the system. He did not mean to enlarge on a subject which had been so much canvassed, but would remark, as an insuperable objection against the proposed restriction of money bills to the House of Representatives, that it would be a source of perpetual contentions where there was no mediator to decide them. The President here could not, like the executive magistrate in England, interpose by a prorogation or dissolution. This restriction had been found pregnant with altercation in every State where the Constitution had established it. The House of Representatives will insert other things in money bills, and by making them conditions of each other destroy the deliberate liberty of the Senate. (The Madison Papers, volume 3, page 1309.)

That argument was made, as I said to the Senator from Iowa yesterday evening, against the adoption of this provision, and it was stated in debate that the very results which we have now before us would follow from its adoption, but still the argument carried no weight. It was distinctly avowed by the advocates of this provision in the convention of 1787 that their purpose was to give the people of the United States all the security which the free constitution of the House of Commons had thrown around the liberties of Great Britain. Mr. Randolph, as I said, compared the Senate to the House of Lords, and insisted that the same safeguards against its influence should be adopted which had proved so healthful in the mother country.

The enemies of the power argued that it would be used to support general legislation, and no one denied that the House would have authority to so employ it. We have been told that in Great Britain since 1688 no attempt has been made to ingraft legislation on appropriation bills. But why was this? During that time the King has not employed his negative. The Lords have not opposed the will of the nation as expressed in the House of Commons. There is another reason. In 1693, for the first time, a new element was infused into the British constitution, which since that day has been a great popular lever, and has controlled the whole system. I refer to the organization of the ministry. Before 1688 this institution was unknown. Since 1696 nothing has been necessary to enable the House of Commons to carry out any policy or measure but a majority against the ministry.

It can readily be seen why no House of Commons since 1688 has found it necessary to coerce the Lords or the monarch by legislation on appropriation bills. The doctrine, sir, that the House of Representatives is under constitutional obligations to provide money to maintain all existing establishments, and cannot in a money bill provide for the destruction of an expensive, unnecessary, and unconstitutional power, is to my mind something worse than revolutionary.

I do not intend to weary the Senate by the long reading of documents, but this question arose I think for the first time in the Congress of 1796, and came to the consideration of those men who were familiar with the adoption of the Constitution, and who had very enlightened opinions in regard to the meaning of its provisions. No more useful man I suppose ever lived in this country than Albert Gallatin; no man more devoted to the Government and the Constitution than he ever held high public office under it, and what did he say as early as 1796, when this question was brought up for the first time in Congress?

Mr. Gallatin felt alarmed at the principle advanced by Mr. Sedgwick, for if admitted it might be applied in future on some other and important occasion. The motion made by the member from New York ought not, perhaps, to be adopted, but there was certainly a discretionary power in the House to appropriate or not to appropriate for any object whatever, whether that object was authorized by law or not. It was a power which, however inexpedient on the present occasion, was vested in this House for the purpose of checking the other branches of Government whenever necessary.

"Checking" them! That is now called revolution.

That such a right was reserved by this body appeared from their making only yearly appropriations for the support of the civil list and of the military establishment. Had they meant to give up the right they would have such appropriations permanent. There was one instance in which this House had thought it proper to abandon the right. In order to strengthen public credit they had consented that the payment of interest on the debt should not depend on their sole will, and they had rendered the appropriation for that object not a yearly but a permanent one. Whenever that was not the case, and the right had been reserved, it was contradictory to suppose that the House were bound to do a certain act at the same time that they were exercising the discretionary power of voting upon it.—Abridgment of the Debates of Congress, volume 1, page 626.

That was the doctrine announced and successfully carried out in that very case in the Congress of 1796, and I imagine that if any man had got up at that day and charged Albert Gallatin with being a revolutionist because he was contending for the constitutional privileges of the body of which he was a member, the cry would have received little attention from the American people.

Of what avail would the power to originate money bills be to the House of Representatives or to the people whom it represents, if it is only to be used in providing means to nourish and continue every rotten and oppressive system which it finds in existence? This House, unlike the human body, undergoes a change every two years; the latter I believe every seven. This is the longest time which the Constitution gives that body to live away from the people. Every two years it must go back to the fountain of all power for a new supply of authority. The Senate is a permanent body but receives from the States every two years a partial infusion of new life, but always retains a majority accustomed to its duties and to support its character and dignity as a permanent establishment. The House of Representatives is intended to speak the voice of the American people as nearly as it is possible to do so under our Federal system.

The Senate, as we know, does not represent the people, but the States in their political character, without regard to wealth or numbers. Representation and taxation are twins of the Constitution and were born amid the throes of revolution; so it is all-important to the overtaxed people of this country who are represented in the other House that they shall have the power to protect their liberties and property from extravagance and oppression.

A majority of the people of the United States have declared in favor of impartial juries and free elections, and their Representatives at the late session, the better to secure these objects, repealed certain obnoxious laws, which they believed to be unconstitutional, authorizing the use of the Army at the polls and the employment of hordes of Federal officials to terrorize over their constituents. The repeal of these laws was effected by provisions on two appropriation bills. The House said to the Senate, Congress and the President enacted these laws when one-half of the country was represented in it by men who floated into power by the help of Federal authority. The intelligence and property of the South had, with a few exceptions, no Representatives here to speak for them. The Army had been used to set up governments there which were presided over by men who had no interests or feelings with the people whom they governed. In the course of time the influence of intelligence and the power of justice corrected these evils, and one by one the States of the South have been restored to their true position in the Union. The genius of true representation has come back to them, and, forgetting the asperities and the differences of the past, they are anxious to co-operate with you to restore complete peace and prosperity to the country.

Having been admitted to a participation in the administration of the Government upon terms of equality with the rest of the Union, the people of the South, through their representatives, have from time to time manifested great interest in the affairs of the country, and after a long night of estrangement have come to regard themselves once more as an integral part of the Republic. But since this change has occurred, and national representation has been something more than a mockery, it seldom happens that any important measure of legislation is discussed here or elsewhere without giving rise to the most bitter sectional criminations. Sir, it is melancholy to contemplate the folly and tendencies of this. Party differences I fear not, because heated and rancorous as are such conflicts they are never attended with the evils which flow from sectional or race antagonisms. Since the question brought before the Senate by the resolutions of the Senator from Massachusetts has been before the country every organ of the great party to which he belongs has labored to convince the people of the North that the legislation referred to originated in an unfriendly if not a hostile feeling on the part of the representatives from the South toward the Government of the Union.

When the veteran soldier from Missouri, covered all over with wounds which he received in defense of the country, and without consultation with southern men, tried to secure pensions for the brave old soldiers who fought with him to uphold your glory and conquer for you a continent, the occasion was used to pour out the vials of sectional wrath upon the men of the South, whose patriotism and chivalry led them into companionship of peril in planting your flag on the halls of Montezuma. And now, sir, when the democratic party of the country, animated by the consciousness of its right to speak for a majority of American people, without regard to race or sections, comes forward to reform those laws which were conceived in a spirit of revenge and are executed for the purpose of oppression, the country is told that this is a new war prosecuted by new means by the men of the South in order to subvert and revolutionize the Government. Sir, it would be uncandid to deny that the South, in common with the rest of the country, has an interest in the repeal of those laws which have been referred to in this debate, but that her people, or those who speak for them here, desire anything more than to live in peace with you under a common government is unsupported by a single fact or circumstance in their recent history.

And why should we not desire the repeal of these laws? Is it not notorious that they were mainly directed against the white population of the South and enacted at a time when that population, by the operation of the harshest policy ever put in practice, had no right to be heard here or in the other House of Congress. You divided the eleven States of the South into five military districts and placed the lives and property of a liberty-loving though subjugated people at the mercy of military commanders. These commanders and their soldiers set on foot civil governments by directing elections for conventions to frame constitutions already made and decided upon in other parts of the country; and worse than all, the white population, representing all there was of intelligence and property in the section and the only material in it out of which a government could be composed, were systematically excluded from all participation in the work of rehabilitation. To the black population, with the scales of slavery hardly removed from their eyes, without instruction or preparation of any kind for the business of government, was confided the important task of setting on foot local government for States which had ever been governed by men of the highest abilities and character. Then came Senators and members of Congress who were off-shoots of the local establishments, and sent here only to represent the prejudices and bitterness of that race which had just emerged from bondage and which was carefully cultivated by white leaders to preserve race domination.

The substantial interests of the South and its people received no attention except what we find indicated in the severest part of your criminal code. It was to maintain these vicious systems thus inauspiciously inaugurated by the Army, the colored race, and a few white political leaders, that those severe laws were enacted which have disgraced your statute-book. It never was the purpose of the party in power, from the day it became evident that the arms of the Union would prevail to the present hour, to conciliate the white element in the South. There never was a finer opportunity offered in the world for a great statesman than in the state and circumstances of that people at the end of the civil war. The mad scheme of trampling down the dominant race with an inferior one has met with the fate it deserved, and the men of your own blood, with the traditions of freedom before them for which their fathers and your fathers fought and bled, would have been false to everything which gives them a title to renown had they tamely permitted their liberties to be torn from them forever by the rude hands of their former slaves. Sir, he is a poor philosopher or statesman who can imagine that in a community where two races the most distinctly marked by nature, by feelings, associations, and traditions, make up the population, and are nearly equal in numbers, it is possible that their contests for power can be similar to the struggles of a homogeneous people. When you quarrel with the men of my section for the impassioned energy they display in their efforts to control public affairs you ought to remember that they are engaged not only in a political but in a race contest, and that the same feelings which animate and support them lie dormant and undeveloped in your own breasts. It is not all love for one party or hatred of another, nor is it, as you too often imagine, disloyalty to your flag or sectional hatred which inspires them to labor for success; but it is that higher and stronger feeling which no party or sect can appropriate, which God himself, for His own wise purpose, has implanted in every human heart—it is the law of self-defense.

In speaking thus plainly upon this great subject I would not be understood as manifesting the least unkindness toward the colored race of the South, upon which the republican party still relies for success. They are all poor laborers depending upon their daily toil for support, and probably I am the last man that would favor any system of oppression against such a class. Although I thought and now think that their premature entry into the field of politics was unfortunate for them and the country, still the rights which they have will be maintained; but it is to be regretted that the Government of the United States did not abstain from all interference with elections in the States after placing these people upon a footing of equality as respects freedom and civil rights with the white population among which they live. How often has it been said here that the only place for the black man is in the republican party, and that he could not with safety or consistency go elsewhere. The Government was not satisfied in making him a citizen and a voter, and then leave him to work out his own fortunes like other people, but it undertook to establish and did establish a harsh and expensive system of laws professedly to prevent but really to foment and intensify the natural and traditional antagonism of the two races.

It was often said that the word slavery was not used in the Constitution while many of its provisions recognized it as a living institution. If there was anything in this omission the example ought to have been followed by the wise law-makers of the republican party who, in the enactment of numerous and severe laws, have never failed to indicate to the world that they were intended to operate in favor of one class or race in the community and against another. Hence we find all over your criminal code the words "race," "color," "previous condition of servitude," "men of African descent," &c., as if it was necessary to divide the country into classes in order to protect the rights of all. These laws are based upon a principle of legislation which never ought to be recognized by a popular government. Such is the state of your laws at the present day that the power and authority of your Government are stretched to immeasurable limits for the benefit of a particular class, and we have seen that your highest court has decided that an indictment could not be maintained unless it alleged that the offense charged was against a person of that class.

It matters not what offense a black man may commit on a white man; your laws take no notice of it except to shield him from punishment; but if the fact is reversed the whole power of this Government is set in motion against the white citizen, and he is deprived of the security of a trial by the courts of his State, and he must plead at the bar of a Federal tribunal. It is said that equality is the genius of the republican party, and these laws are intended to enforce it; but notwithstanding this claim it will be found that the laws which are now on the statute-book, and which are said to have been passed in pursuance of the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments to the Constitution, have a very unequal operation when applied to the classes which are expressly named in one at least of these amendments. The fourteenth amendment declares that all persons born and naturalized in the United States are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges of citizens of the United States.

The fifteenth amendment declares the right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude. These two short provisions of organic law have given existence to more unwarranted legislation than all the rest of the Constitution put together. From these two sources all the laws on your statute-book which are now the subject of complaint have sprung, and it is believed that a majority of the people regard them as palpable violations of the Constitution. "Liberty," says Mr. Burke, "is in danger of becoming unpopular to Englishmen in the midst of the American war," and it is to be feared that this is true to a great extent at the present day. Never since the days of the alien and sedition laws has there been anything to equal the oppressions which have taken place under your new election system. In one part of the country we find four thousand naturalized citizens arrested on the eve of an election in violation of all law and given the option of abandoning the right guaranteed to them in the fourteenth amendment or being consigned to a prison pen to await the pleasure of their master.

That this proceeding was begun and consummated with the purpose of preventing the four thousand men from voting there can be no doubt, and it was only by one of those accidents which sometimes baffle the best schemes of oppression that an opportunity was had to test its legality. Most of those men were poor and were dragged from their vocations; the prospect of lengthy confinement filled them with dismay. They were given the privilege of waiving an examination and going at large on their personal recognizances on the condition—great God! I hate to utter it—that they would give up their right to vote. One poor wretch, it seems, more ignorant and indifferent to his fate than the rest, in the confusion of the proceedings drifted into Ludlow-street jail. There he remained among the sweepings of the prison until his accidental discovery afforded the occasion (long sought for in vain) of testing the legality of all the arrests. The writ of habeas corpus will not reach constructive duress—there must be actual confinement. This man's case called for the great writ of liberty, and it was issued. His trial involved the rights of thousands of his fellow-men and his liberation admonished their oppressors that the spirit of justice was yet a living principle in the land. These men had violated no law, State or Federal. They simply registered their names as qualified voters in the State records, and for this they were marked out for vengeance and their arrest postponed until the very moment when they were going to exercise the right of suffrage. In another part of the country, under the same law and on a similar occasion, ten thousand warrants were issued, and many of them against the very best people in the community, charging them with illegal registration, but in reality to prevent them from going to the polls to exercise their rights as citizens.

I am reminded by my friend from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD,] who very well remembers this statement of Judge Campbell, that eight thousand men were deliberately disfranchised by the officers of the Federal Government on that occasion in executing that law in the city of New Orleans.

These abuses of law are notorious. That they were inspired by party feeling and interest I have no doubt, and they constitute in my judgment as full a chapter of grievances as ever called for redress. Now, a word as to the authority of Congress to enact these laws, and in speaking on this branch of the subject I would remind our republican friends that if ever there was a party which took high ground on the doctrine of State rights it was their party. It had its origin, like the whig party in England, in resistance to established authority. The cardinal principles of its early creed went as far to limit and restrict the powers of this Government as anything ever written or said by Mr. Calhoun.

Massachusetts, now so ably represented in part by the Senator who introduced this resolution, as usual took the lead in promulgating the doctrines of the Jefferson democracy. Mr. Sumner in 1852, representing as he did the sentiment of his State, indorsed in one of the ablest arguments of his life the most extreme doctrines of the State-rights school. He then held and the republican party held that section 2 of article 4 of the Constitution, although regarded by a majority of the country as a positive grant of power, did not confer any authority on Congress to legislate in regard to fugitives from labor; and he felt himself justified, and his action was applauded by his whole party, in trying to effect the repeal of the act of Congress passed in pursuance of that section, and that, too, by an amendment to an appropriation bill.

We heard a little said here the other day on the subject of compacts; but, sir, there was a time in the history of this Government when Massachusetts took high ground with regard to compacts. Mr. Webster, it is true, used the expression, I think, once; but it was used frequently afterward by very distinguished men from that State. Mr. Sumner in his great speech referred to it. He said:

> The Constitution contains powers granted to Congress, compacts between the States, and prohibitions addressed to the nation and to the States. A compact or prohibition may be accompanied by a power; but not necessarily, for it is essentially distinct in its nature. And here the single question arises, whether the Constitution, by grant, general or special, confers upon Congress any power to legislate on the subject of fugitives from service.

> Here another change was made. The clause relating to public records, with the power attached, was taken from its original place at the bottom of the clauses of compact, and promoted to stand first in the article as a distinct section.—Sumner's Speeches, (edition 1856,) pages 125, 129.

Here he comes down and he gives us from his high republican standpoint a clear and unequivocal statement of his views in regard to the nature of the Federal Government. It cannot be forgotten that in the overdesire of Mr. Webster to stand by the old whig party and its great national principles he was swept from power, and Mr. Sumner came here representing the sentiment of Massachusetts, as I said, as much as any Senator whom she ever sent to these halls.

Mr. Sumner again says:

> The integrity of our political system depends upon harmony in the operations of the nation and of the States. While the nation within its wide orbit is supreme, the States move with equal supremacy in their own. But from the necessity of the case the supremacy of each in its proper place excludes the other. The nation cannot exercise rights reserved to the States, nor can the States interfere with the powers of the nation. Any such action on either side is a usurpation. These principles were distinctly declared by Mr. Jefferson, in 1798, in words often adopted since, and which must find acceptance from all parties.

And here he quotes Mr. Jefferson's language with approbation:

> That the several States composing the United States of America are not united upon the principle of unlimited submission to the General Government; but that by compact, under the style and title of the Constitution of the United States and of the amendments thereto, they constituted a General Government for special purposes, delegated to that Government certain definite powers, reserving each State to itself the residuary mass of right to their own self-government, and that whereseever the General Government assumes undelegated powers its acts are unauthorized, void, and of no force.—Sumner's Speeches, (edition 1856,) pages 133, 134.

Mr. Sumner, I say, announced this doctrine in 1852 as the doctrine of all parties in this country, taking it from the works of Mr. Jefferson, and I read it now without comment to the Senate.

Mr. DAWES. Would it interrupt the Senator if I should make a remark?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Oh, no.

Mr. DAWES. I do not quite understand whether the Senator from Florida means to be understood as saying that Mr. Webster was swept from power in Massachusetts and Mr. Sumner and the doctrine he represented installed in his place there because Mr. Webster differed from Mr. Sumner in the statement that the General Government and the States were each sovereign in their sphere. If the Senator means to make any such statement as that, it will be new in Massachusetts. I had supposed that that was the dividing line, and that Mr. Webster and Mr. Sumner were on one side and those were on the other side who believed that the States were sovereign each within its sphere, and that each with the powers granted or reserved under the Constitution was supreme. The United States derives its powers by grant from the Constitution. The State powers are reserved. Those granted to the United States, wherever they conflict with any power in the States, are supreme and must control. Those reserved to the States and not granted to the United States are equally supreme. That was the doctrine of Mr. Webster. That I understand to have been the doctrine of Mr. Sumner. I do not care whether Mr. Sumner, in attempting to express that idea, used the word "compact" or not; he intended to make that statement. The other doctrine Mr. Webster himself, here in the Senate Chamber forty years ago, ground into impalpable powder, and no statesman has ever been able to gather up from the dust of it enough to make an argument to refute his argument upon that ground, and the ghost of it has been seen flying from a hundred battle-fields since and never found a foothold in this Government until within the last two years. It never found an advocate under the dome of this Capitol until the restoration in part to power of those persons who went out to establish it upon the field of battle.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. The Senator from Massachusetts of course is at liberty to draw his own inferences from the words I have read. I have not added a syllable to them. I read them for the purpose of illustrating the views entertained by that distinguished man when he cited the words of Mr. Jefferson.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Hold on one moment; the Senator has made a speech pretty long already. I was going on to try to show that the best men and the most honest men might rationally differ in forming their opinions in regard to this subject, and they have differed. The Senator says, of course, that the State is supreme within the limits of her reserved power, and that the Government of the Union is supreme within the sphere of its delegated power. That is all true; and that is what those gentlemen have said in their works. The difficulty has been in practice. The difficulty has been in drawing the line between the power of the General Government and that of the States; but in regard to the principle itself there never has been any difference, I say, among leading public men in this country.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, I probably was led into a mistake in supposing that the Senator——

Mr. JONES, of Florida. If the Senator will allow me, I will state that I did not mean at all to insinuate for one moment that Mr. Webster was driven from power in Massachusetts because he entertained any different opinions respecting the powers of the Constitution from those entertained by Mr. Sumner.

Mr. DAWES. I understood the Senator to say that he was driven from power and Mr. Sumner who represented more truely the sentiment in Massachusetts came into power just at that point.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I remember, Mr. President——

Mr. DAWES. The Senator will allow me; I do not want to misunderstand him. I suppose the Senator has some notion wherein the difference between Mr. Sumner and Mr. Webster existed. He certainly said that for some reason Mr. Webster was driven from power in Massachusetts and Mr. Sumner installed, and he said it in connection with expounding the Constitution upon the question whether the States were supreme or the United States was supreme.

Of course I do not want to misunderstand or misrepresent the Senator. I was desirous of ascertaining whether the Senator meant to intimate that there was any difference between Mr. Webster and Mr. Sumner upon that point or that Mr. Webster by using the term "compact" or "confederacy of States," if he used that, ever meant to inculcate the idea that this was an association or confederacy of States distinct from the idea of a nation. He always held that the powers of the General Government were supreme, and that the States, I am glad to say and to believe and to affirm, in the exercise of those powers that were reserved to them, were also supreme. There never could have been any doubt upon the subject. There never stood out in the arguments that have immortalized the one side or the other anything so clear, so unanswerable as the very argument of Mr. Webster that there never could exist such a thing as the right of a State peaceably to secede from the Union; you may call it a confederacy or what you please.

Mr. JONES, of Florida, Mr. President, my time is very short, the evening is growing late, and the Senator will have an abundant opportunity to reply.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator will allow me to read a paragraph from Mr. Webster, which a friend near me has been kind enough to hand me, and which I now read:

> That a national government ought to be established, consisting of a supreme legislature, judiciary, and executive.

These words are taken from the journal of the convention itself which adopted the Constitution. Mr. Webster, commenting on this language said:

> This itself completely negatives all idea of league, and compact, and confederation. Terms could not be chosen more fit to express an intention to establish a national government, and to banish forever all notion of a compact between sovereign States.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. The Senator seems to have misapprehended entirely my purpose in alluding to this matter. I merely read to show how little importance can be attached to the mere use of words. The word "compact" runs throughout the whole speech made by this great man, Mr. Sumner, at that time. He cites article 4 of the Constitution as containing nothing but compacts between the Government of the United States and the States. I do not pretend to assert that he said the whole Government was a compact, but he cited this paragraph, for instance:

> A person charged in any State with treason, felony, or other crime, who shall flee from justice, and be found in another State, shall, on demand of the executive authority of the State from which he fled, be delivered up, to be removed to the State having jurisdiction of the crime.

He gave that as an illustration of a compact between the General Government and the States which did not authorize the Government to legislate on the subject. That is the whole of it. I am speaking now of an authority in the Government to enact certain legislation. I cite instances here of express provisions in the Constitution which a distinguished republican said gave no power to legislate or to carry them out because they were compacts, as he stated, between the General Government and the States. That is the doctrine he stated, not that the Government itself for the purpose of secession was a compact, but that certain provisions in it which were relied upon as the authority for legislation were compacts and did not authorize legislation as against the States or people.

Mr. DAWES. Will the Senator just tell us what he did mean when he said Mr. Webster was driven from power and Mr. Sumner brought into power in Massachusetts?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. He was not in accord, as I understand, with public sentiment in Massachusetts at that time upon the question that was agitating that section.

Mr. DAWES. It had no reference to their different views upon the construction of the Constitution itself?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Not at all.

Mr. BLAINE. When, in the history of Massachusetts, did Mr. Webster and Mr. Sumner come into competition?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. In what?

Mr. BLAINE. In anything. When did they ever appear as rivals?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I think they came in conflict on the question of the repeal of the fugitive slave law.

Mr. BLAINE. When, before or after the time stated, was Mr. Webster driven from power by Mr. Sumner?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. When Mr. Webster left the Senate, was not returned.

Mr. BLAINE. The Senator forgets the history of his country. Mr. Webster had gone out of the Senate and taken the State Department under Mr. Fillmore. He retired with all the honors of that State upon his head. Mr. Robert C. Winthrop, who was appointed pro tempore, was beaten by Mr. Sumner, and Mr. Robert C. Winthrop was a different man.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Mr. Webster was not returned to the Senate after 1850.

Mr. BLAINE. Not returned! He was not a candidate. When the Senator speaks about Mr. Webster being defeated in the Massachusetts Legislature for the Senate, he is talking of his imagination and not of history.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I remember to have read somewhere about Mr. Webster at that time; I do not remember particularly——

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Webster died——

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I do not wish to be interrupted so repeatedly.

Mr. DAWES. Let me correct the Senator.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. Webster died while he was Secretary of State.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. EATON in the chair.) The Senate will be in order.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Webster died when he was Secretary of State. There never was an hour since I was a boy when Mr. Webster was not in office that I know of. There never was an hour when he was driven from power for any cause whatever; and I was curious to have the Senator make the statement what it was that drove Mr. Webster from power and brought Mr. Sumner into power. Mr. Sumner came into power in Massachusetts at a subsequent period and upon clear and distinct grounds, where Massachusetts stands to-day——

Mr. JONES, of Florida. How long subsequent?

Mr. DAWES. Where Massachusetts stands to-day and where she will stand in this coming contest.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I would prefer, Mr. President, that the Senator from Massachusetts should make his own speech, and I will try to get along with mine.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, I beg the Senator——

Mr. JONES, of Florida. No man living, I imagine, has greater respect for Mr. Webster's memory than I have, and I would not do him the least injustice before the people; but I remember to have read somewhere—I think I read it as coming from Mr. Phillips—that when he when to Faneuil Hall, in that very memorable place, the words which I shall repeat were uttered by him. He was making a great appeal, as we know, to the whig party, and said he: "I am a whig, a Massachusetts whig, a constitutional whig. If you break up the whig party, where shall I go?" This appeal was not listened to and the whig party was broken up, and it was the last he belonged to. It is known that he went from here, I think, and made that appeal to his own whig friends. All I meant by the remark was that while Mr. Webster and Mr. Sumner did not differ, as I understand, in reference to the provisions of the Constitution, they differed in regard to the question of slavery that was then agitating the country, and differed materially. That is the whole of it.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, I want to apologize to the Senator for having interrupted him. The Senator intimated to me that it would not trouble him at all to be interrupted, but if I have done so I ask his pardon. There is great impropriety in disturbing a Senator in making a speech, and I owe him an apology. I certainly should not have been led into it if he had not indicated that I was at perfect liberty to do so.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. But, sir, the other day my friend from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] happened to use the word "confederacy." I do not know in what sense he employed it; he can better explain that himself. A great deal has been said about the word "compact;"

but it was employed here twenty different times in this great speech of Mr. Sumner, and I read it for the purpose of showing that there were certain powers in the Constitution that this Congress could not carry out by legislation.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What are those powers, if I may ask the Senator?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I will come to them after awhile. Mr. Sumner instanced this as one of them:

The citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States.

That he writes down as a compact.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That Congress cannot enforce?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. And these paragraphs:

A person charged in any State with treason, felony, or other crime, who shall flee from justice and be found in another State, shall, on demand of the executive authority of the State from which he fled, be delivered up, to be removed to the State having jurisdiction of the crime.

No person held to service or labor in one State, under the laws thereof, escaping into another, shall, in consequence of any law or regulation therein, be discharged from such service or labor, but shall be delivered up on claim of the party to whom such service or labor may be due.

He went all through these provisions, and he went on to try to prove that they gave no authority to legislate. This I say affords subject of discussion about which lawyers might differ. I do not pretend to say that Mr. Sumner was correct in all the positions he took in that matter; I do not defend his judgment at all; but I have quoted from his speech in order to show that the Constitution is full of debatable ground upon which and about which men who are equally honest may differ, and that it is not a subject for passion, for crimination, or for denunciation because they do.

The section which I referred to, instead of a grant of power to Congress, was held to be a compact between the General Government and the States, the fulfillment of which rested with the good faith of the sovereign bodies who had entered into it. The Constitution was always held to be an instrument of delegated powers, establishing a government of limited authority though supreme to the extent of that authority. It is made up of direct and positive grants of power to the Congress, the Executive, and the judiciary of the United States; second, restrictions upon the powers of all departments of the General Government; third, of inhibitions upon the States to prevent them from exercising powers which would clash with those delegated to the Union; and fourthly, a class of powers which Mr. Sumner called compacts, to be found in section 1, article 4 of the Constitution.

Now, sir, if there was anything better settled than another in regard to our Federal system it was that the inhibitions contained in section 10, article 1 of the Constitution never were intended to confer any power on the Congress of the United States. From the time of the adoption of the Constitution to the period of the ratification of the recent amendments, it was well settled that an inhibition in the Constitution of the United States on the power of the States gave to Congress no additional power, but that when rights became affected by the disregard of such inhibitions they could only be vindicated by an appeal to the judicial department. No one ever pretended that when the Constitution declared that no State should impair the obligation of contracts, make any ex post facto law, or grant any title of nobility, that power was thereby given to Congress to carry the authority of this Government into the local concerns of the States.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Would it interrupt the Senator if I asked him a question, not to make an argument, on that point?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I yield.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, on that point I should like to ask my honorable friend a question, as I know he can answer it if anybody can. If under this very tenth section of article 1, which says that no State shall pass any bill of attainder, &c., or coin money, grant letters of marque and reprisal, make anything but gold and silver a legal tender, Congress should pass a law which should say that any person who should undertake to coin money in a State without the authority of Congress should be punished, would not that be a constitutional law?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I am not here as a judicial authority or oracle. I can only give a horseback opinion about it; but I would question very greatly the constitutionality of such a law under that provision of the Constitution. It might or it might not be sustained by the judiciary; but I say that Congress has never attempted, as far as I can understand, to infer any authority from these negative provisions. There is another provision in the Constitution, as is suggested to me by my friend from Georgia, [Mr. HILL,] under which they might have that power; but these are inhibitions on the State. No State shall do these things. No State shall pass any law affecting contracts. No State shall grant a title of nobility. No State shall pass an ex post facto law. The inhibition is against a State, a sovereign member of the Union, so to speak, and was intended to operate upon the State in her sovereign or in her law-making character.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. If I yield further I do not know when I shall be able to get through. The gentleman who has this bill in charge has given notice that he desired an early vote, and the Senator from Vermont has indicated a disposition to reach the same end, from what I heard him say the other day. If I thought I had time I would be very glad to hear the Senator, because I know he never speaks without affording us all instruction.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should certainly afford instruction on this occasion, because I was only to ask a question which my honorable friend was to answer and we should get instruction in that way, indirectly through my means. I do not wish to interrupt my honorable friend unless it is perfectly agreeable to him.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I am not making such a speech as Senators usually interrupt.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then I beg my honorable friend's pardon. I will certainly not interfere with him if it is in the slightest degree disagreeable to him.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. It was early known that cases would arise which would call for the application of the principle of these provisions, but the fathers of the Constitution knew full well that it would endanger the safety of the whole system if Congress should attempt to legislate directly against the authority of the States or its officers.

I will say here, Mr. President, that when this question was discussed in the convention at Philadelphia, and in the Federalist, Mr. Hamilton said, in the clearest and strongest terms, that if you retain the old idea of a confederation you will retain a form of government which of necessity will involve coercion on the part of the General Government to make the States comply with its provisions; it is not the intention of our new system to have a government other than one which will operate upon individuals. One of the strong arguments he made was that a government of States would involve war and bloodshed and trouble, because there was no method left but compulsory methods directed by one government against another in order to compel the delinquent member to enforce the stipulations of the compact; hence the necessity for a constitutional system which would enable the Government of the Union to enforce its authority against the people, but not against the authorities of the States.

With respect to all claims of power between the States and Federal Government, and the enforcement of the provisions of the Federal Constitution restraining the powers of the States, no remedy or appeal was ever thought of except what was given by the judiciary act of 1789, which enables any person whose rights are affected by State laws unwarranted by the Constitution of the United States to have them reviewed by the highest judicial authority of the Union.

That was the doctrine of the great expounder from Massachusetts. It was his great argument on that subject which distinguished him more than any he ever made in his life when he took the ground that in all cases of conflicting powers between the States and the General Government the Constitution of the Union had established an umpire in the judicial arm of this Government which should pass upon and settle the question. That was his idea, not that Congress by positive legislation nor by the enactment of laws should undertake to settle it as against the officers of the State, but that when private rights became involved or affected by State legislation which was unconstitutional under the laws and Constitution of the Union the citizen whose rights were affected by it had the peaceful remedy of appealing to the highest tribunal in the Union to have his rights vindicated and restored. That was the constitutional remedy.

Sir, the absurd doctrine that the officer of one government acting in obedience to the authority of its laws can be punished by penalties and tribunals created and established by another never until a recent day received the sanction of any authority in this country. About whatever else parties differed, whether the tariff or slavery, sectional or national issues, they all were agreed that this is a Government of delegated powers, supreme, it is true, to the extent of its delegated authority; and operating with other governments over the same population, it was not competent to settle disputed questions of jurisdiction between the two, or enforce the authority of either by pains and penalties directed against the officers who were intrusted with the execution of the laws. Mr. Sumner in 1852 stated the true doctrine on this subject. "While the nation," said he, "within its wide orbit is supreme, the States move with equal supremacy in their own." But from the necessity of the case the supremacy of each in its own proper place excludes the other. The difficulty ever has been and is now not only in drawing the line which separates State from Federal power, but in determining the authority which should fix it. If it be said that one government ought to have the power to decide upon the limitation of its own authority, how shall it decide so delicate a question when it must affect the rights and powers of another government whose supremacy within the sphere of its just authority is acknowledged? The laws of the United States, it is said, passed in pursuance of the Constitution are the supreme law of the land. But laws not warranted by the Constitution are void. When the statutes of either government are directed only against its citizens, any usurpation of power can be curbed by the high judicial authority of the Union.

But, sir, when the laws of either undertake to punish the officers or agents of the other for acts or omissions in the line of their duty it is a subversion of our whole Federal system, and sooner or later will prove ruinous to it. Why is it that the officers of the States are bound by oath to support the laws and Constitution of the United States and the officers of the United States are not bound in like manner to support the laws of the States? It was expected that State officers would have an agency in administering United States laws, but it never was intended that United States officers should administer State laws, or that punishment of any kind should be prescribed by this Government against officers of the States for any violation of duty imposed by the statutes of the States.

The democratic party, not of the South alone, but of the country, has uniformly held that the whole election code prescribed by this Government is unconstitutional. Its leading public men have made no concealments before the people on this subject, and have always avowed the intention of repealing it if their party came into power. When the Constitution was before the people for adoption grave fears were entertained that the Government proposed to be established would overstep the bounds of its authority and invade the local concerns of the States, and it was seriously asked what would be the remedy for such an evil. At that time the Virginia resolutions were not thought of, but the friends of the new Government were not wanting for an argument which put at rest the doubts and misgivings of the people. And what was the argument? It was that whenever the law-making power of the Union went outside of the Constitution and usurped power which was not delegated to it the people and the States could send to Congress new men who would repeal the obnoxious laws and restore the just equilibrium of the Constitution. No one ever imagined that in a case of that kind the veto of the President would ever be interposed. He occupies his office to execute, not to make laws, and, as General Grant once said, the best way to get rid of a bad law is to show up its defects in its execution, so that the people may demand its repeal by their representatives. Would it have been tolerated in the days of the alien and sedition laws, after the storm of indignation which they excited had swept over the land, that the President by his veto might have arrested their repeal? What would have been thought of the presumptuous functionary who, forgetting the wishes and sufferings of the people, should have attempted to prevent them from obtaining relief according to the forms of the Constitution? But we have been told that this is revolution. Revolution forsooth! Why, sir, this is one of the safeguards against revolution. You cannot make a revolution with rose water. You must have a little genuine human blood. All legislative power, not a part of it, is vested by the Constitution in the two Houses of Congress. How that power shall be exercised is a matter with which the Executive has nothing to do. Now, sir, we have been told that the number of troops all over the country is so small that it is worse than ridiculous to imagine any danger to the rights of the people from them. It is not pretended that the Army is too large. No one asks for its reduction; but, sir, I would consider the people more safe and secure with an army of two hundred thousand men and this law repealed than with one of ten thousand while it remains in force. It is not the force of numbers which we fear, but the ingrafting of a dangerous principle into the Constitution.

The payment of twenty shillings—would not be missed from my fortune, but by acceding to the principle upon which it is demanded will make me a slave.

We do not measure the enormity or injustice of an outrage by the number of the perpetrators. The greatest crimes against the life of society and law may be committed by a single wrong-doer. The argument of the Senator from Maine would lead us to the conclusion that the moral qualities of an act are to be tested by the number concerned in its commission, and not by its effect upon the rights of the party affected by it. Sir, there are some things in life which to touch them is to destroy them. It has been said a woman cannot be liberal with her virtue, a soldier with his honor, or a nation with its liberty. The presence of an infidel at the altars of the living God would cast a shadow over the cause of the crucifix. No one would think of selecting a Mormon prophet as a guardian for his daughter whom he wished to have instructed and guided by the law of Christian marriage. Sir, the Army is small, it is patriotic and useful, but it is large enough, under the direction of a bad man, to trample on your Constitution. No soldier can be quartered on the citizen in time of peace, and this great principle of individual security could be violated as well by one soldier as by a thousand.

Now if there existed a law authorizing the quartering of troops on the citizens in time of peace, what answer would it be to a demand for its repeal that the Army was small and scattered over a large area of country? Would not the principle be violated and the Constitution endangered just so long as the law continued? And so it is in cases of election. I have seen soldiers of the United States marched and counter-marched over my State, and if the Senator from Maine wants to look into the records of the War Department he can find evidences there showing that the troops in my State as late as 1876 were ordered from the forts on the seaboard hundreds of miles in the interior, to be present at the elections of the people. I assert the fact here that at the election of 1876 nearly a company of troops were ordered from Fort Barancas, Florida, to Marianna, Florida, and were present in that little town during the election of that year. I met them on the way there, and never shall I forget the feelings of humiliation that came over me when I learned the true object of their mission.

But military interference did not end with the election at the polls. Well do I remember the scenes in my own State. After the election I saw an officer in full uniform, with his side arms on, remain in the presence of the State officers until they had canvassed the returns from the various voting places in my own county, where there was not the slightest reason to apprehend trouble of any kind. And when the time came for the enactment of the drama of fraud, when the courage of the faithless officers who had determined to falsify the voice of the people of the State had to be supported in some way, when the consciousness of the great wrong they were about to commit filled the air around them with imaginary dangers and their souls stood aghast at the terrors of the great crime, a large part of the Army, with a general officer, was sent to sustain them and give a reluctant sanction to those proceedings which ended in robbing the whole American people of their highest and dearest right. In the course of a week it was easy to concentrate at the capital of my little State an armed force of three hundred men to shield the preconcerted villainy of a returning board and strike down the vital principles of popular freedom.

We have been told that our reputation is suffering in the estimation of foreigners from the exaggerations of the democratic party respecting the use of the Army. It is a pity that this sensibility for our republican character was not earlier manifested. Some good might have been done if at the time the popular voice of America was crying out for recognition, when 19 majority of the electoral college and 300,000 majority of the people had elected a President, and all Europe stood on tip-toe to see if he would be seated—if at that time the Senator from Maine, with half the eloquence he displayed the other day, had warned his party friends of the danger which was in store for our reputation on the other side of the Atlantic, he would have performed a service worthy of his great talents and his standing and consideration in the country. For my part I attach but little consequence to European opinions of what we do here; but if ever there was an event in our history which shocked the public sentiment of Europe it was the disregard of the voice of the majority in 1876 by the Senator's own party. The South, as usual, is brought to the foreground of this great contest. Every political anatomist in the republican party has been turned loose upon this half-living body. For years tortured and butchered by the most inhuman treatment, she sank down to the lowest degree of exhaustion, mangled and bleeding.

After surviving the cruel experiments of the republican dissecting-table and the hacks and scars of the rude operators who, without either feeling or science, cut to pieces limb after limb, it was to be hoped that time at least would be given her to recover from the wounds already inflicted before being subjected to a series of new operations from the same death-dealing hands. To say nothing of what has taken place in the other House, of which I cannot speak, here at least the performance has been remarkable. First came the Senator from Maine, with his fine, sharp instrument, which, with the grace of an O'Trigger, he used to the delight of his friends. One could hardly help feeling that if he had to die by the hand of another the skill of such a performer would relieve death of some of its horrors. He conjured all the living powers of wrath with the dexterity of a magician, went down to the lowest depths of passion and hatred, and like Mark Antony of old held aloft the blood-stained garment to incite his countrymen to deeds of violence and revenge. And what is the justification of all this? He complained of the power of one section of his country in this and the other body.

Sir, is the time never to come when sectional feeling shall cease? Can there be found no other issue to divide parties than that which is taken from the bloody conflicts of the past, which must always endanger the best interests of the country so long as they are relied upon to control public sentiment? An impartial man listening to the debates here of late might well have supposed that we were the representatives of two distinct countries or people, and that we had nothing in common but the privilege of abusing or misrepresenting each other. Instead of the public being attracted here by the discussion of some great question affecting the interests of the suffering people of a common country, your galleries are filled with excited multitudes who find something like the same kind of entertainment here that the populace of Rome once enjoyed in witnessing the feats of foreign gladiators. Why is it not possible for us to discuss the measures of legislation now pending in a calm and dignified manner? Why should the unhappy South, which has suffered so much and which is part and parcel of your country, be the object of attack and vituperation? It ought to be the desire of every true statesman to serve with equal devotion every part of his country.

If the Senator from Maine could only be induced to employ his great powers in cementing the ties of union and fraternity between the sections of this great country instead of reopening the wounds of the past, his name would live in the grateful memories of millions as a benefactor of his race. However much you may quarrel with the tastes and opinions of the South, it is no part of the business of legislation to make them conform to your own. God for His own wise purposes has diversified this continent with a variety of His best gifts. In soil, in climate, in population He shows you that you cannot hope for uniformity in all His great works. Why should you then "bite the chains of nature?" If you cannot govern a free and ardent people after the fashion of feudal times, and bend their proud spirits by severe penal laws, take wisdom from experience and govern as you can. Depend upon it that no law which is opposed by the moral sense or the public voice of the community can be of any value except to irritate and oppress, and irritation and oppression will not add to your power or dignity or glory. There was a time when even law-abiding and Union-loving Massachusetts did not conceive it to be incompatible with loyalty and allegiance to this Government to oppose and denounce laws of the United States which bore hardly on her people. Sir, the laws which you have enacted for the South, and which her people complain of, are just as offensive to the people there as were the fugitive-slave law and the embargo law to Massachusetts.

You may say that the people of the South have not the same right to complain. This I deny; and I will not acknowledge that because by the power of your Constitution and the resources of the country you re-established over them the authority of your Government you thereby acquired the right to keep them in perpetual bondage. They are to-day part and parcel of the great community of American freemen. Twelve millions of people would not be lightly treated in any body but this. Now that you have grappled them to you with hooks of steel and are embarked for weal or woe on a common voyage of life and liberty in the old ship of the Constitution, they intend to do their duty and help keep her afloat. Many of them concur with a large portion of the people of the North and believe that the interests of the whole country require the repeal of these obnoxious laws.

I have said but little in regard to the method of the present repeal, because I do not doubt the right of the House to send us this bill. British precedents were read to show the great injustice of allowing the House of Commons to tack legislation on appropriation bills. But, sir, these precedents do not apply. In the first place the royal negative has been practically abandoned in Great Britain for more than two hundred years. And secondly, the Lords in England not having the right to negative money bills, if legislation could be put on such bills it would take away absolutely the right of the Lords to reject such legislation if standing alone. Here the Senate has a negative on all money bills as well as the right to amend them; and when legislation is put on a money bill the right of the Senate is not thereby taken away, as it would be in England under the same circumstances. We have been told that the Commons of England did not refuse supplies except when the Crown withheld the concession of some right which belonged to the people under the constitution, and that such refusal never extended to a change of the laws of the kingdom.

The early contests in that country between the people and the fierce princes of the Plantagenet and Tudor lines turned mainly on the right of the monarch to obtain money without appeal to Parliament. As regards a standing army the great contest over its establishment did not begin before the seventeenth century. The most despotic princes of all the early lines of kings were utterly powerless to oppress the people by military force. They had nothing to rely upon but a militia, which was occasionally brought into service as much to gratify their own warlike ardor as the ambition of the King. During the Middle Ages the check chiefly relied upon by the people of England to restrain the prince was the check of physical force. It is true that he was often permitted to indulge his cruelty upon individual victims, but the oppression of masses never failed to meet with resistance. Henry VIII, powerful as he was, was not interfered with when he sent the noble and accomplished Buckingham to the block, but when he attempted to levy one-sixth of the goods of his subjects without the authority of Parliament, the people rushed to arms and crushed his power. No fair precedent can be drawn from those rude days which will apply to a refined state of society, when wealth and power have become so much more important than ever before. With the advance of society and the increasing inclination of the people to pursue the peaceful vocations of life, the historian tells us that the time at last arrived when the profession of arms had to be made a distinct calling in the state.

Then it was, sir, that the real work for constitutional freedom began. Then it was that the Puritan fathers, losing all hope in the success of the people against their oppressors, sought an asylum here among rocks and savages from the excesses of that power which some of their descendants seem inclined to uphold. From the time that James I ascended the throne to the day when James II threw the great seal of England into the river Thames the contest over the right of the King to keep on foot a standing army, without the authority or permission of Parliament, was the all-absorbing subject of dispute. This darling object descended from the first to the last of the Stuarts, and never was abandoned until, after two revolutions, a deluge of blood, and the establishment of a new dynasty, it passed away with the last heir of the ill-fated house which had staked its fortunes upon its accomplishment. For years a dark conspiracy was on foot, unknown to the people, which had for its object the destruction of all public freedom in Great Britain.

The scheme was nearly complete and the chains were already forged for the tender limbs of liberty when one of those providential occurrences took place which the vulgar call accident, that frustrated the dark design of the tyrant and aroused the sleeping people to a realization of their danger and the necessity of exertion. Eleven years had been permitted to elapse without the meeting of a Parliament, and the interval was employed in perfecting the details of oppression. The star chamber, the high commission, the council of York were all completely reorganized and put in the highest state of efficiency for still bloodier and darker work than they were ever before called to perform. The regular courts of justice at Westminster, which were religiously confided in as the most sacred depositories of freedom and personal security, were packed with corrupt judges to perform their allotted parts in the hellish plot of destroying forever the liberties of their country. And, worse than all, the ministers of religion, (false and perfidious,) and with them altars of the living God, were enlisted in the work of infamy, and, abandoning the service of Heaven, lent all the authority and force of their high calling to the machinations and powers of hell. Such was the confidence of the tyrant in the completeness of his preparations and the success of his designs that he departed from the original plan of operations and, fatally for him, but fortunately for us and all mankind, determined to begin the work of enslaving the people in that high-spirited land on whose soil my friend from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] first saw the light of day.

No more parliaments were to be called until the spirit of the people was broken, and then only to record the will of the King. The judges had already decided that taxes might be levied by the Crown. The star chamber and high commission were ready for the work of blood, and the people were paralyzed in the presence of these terrible preparations, when Charles the First decided to destroy the religious freedom of Scotland by compelling her people to give up their own system of worship for the forms and ritual of Henry the Eighth. It was not supposed for a moment that the demands sent to Edinburgh, which was then farther from London (calculating by the facilities of travel) than Berlin is now, would produce the least discontent or interfere for a moment with the execution of the plan of Strafford and Charles in creating a standing army without the authority of Parliament.

But they little knew the temper of those bold Highlanders in whose bosoms were mingled the fiercest passion for battle and the warmest feelings of devotion for the memory and teachings of John Knox. As Macaulay tells us:

> They had butchered their first James in his bed-chamber; they had slain James the Third on the field of battle; their disobedience had broken the heart of James the Fifth; they had deposed Queen Mary and led forth her son a captive.

And they swore by the covenant that they never would give up their religious freedom at the bidding of Charles the First. It was the invasion of England by a Scotch army at this time that saved British liberty. The King had enough of mercenaries to enable him to carry out his purpose in time of peace and make himself absolute; but he had no army to meet the Scots, and he was thus forced by necessity, after eleven years, to reassemble the House of Commons in order to get a sufficient force to defend the kingdom. Parliament was assembled; the people were safe. And from that time to the present—except for a time during the Commonwealth—the people of England, through the House of Commons, have controlled the army. Their right to destroy or increase it has never been questioned, by their power over the supplies. And it was the preservation of this great right, after submitting to two revolutions, which saved them from absolute monarchy, such as you now see in the fairest portions of Europe. If ever the time comes that the Executive can employ the Army in defiance of the wishes of the people's Representatives, all freedom is at an end.

This is not simply a question of legislation on an appropriation bill. It lies deeper than that. The question is whether Congress has the power in making provision for the support of the Army to couple any conditions with the grant. If it has not, then surely the citadel of freedom has been left in a very unguarded state, and the lesson of the great English struggle against arbitrary power has been lost upon us. The Constitution does not permit us to make provision for our Army for a longer period than two years. The practice is to vote supplies only for one year. Why was the limit of two years fixed? In order to make the fate of the Army depend upon the will of each Congress. A new House of Representatives comes into life every two years fresh from the people, and no military force, even in time of war, can be continued without its consent. Authority is given to support a navy, and an appropriation for that purpose might be made for ten years in advance. Why? Because all experience teaches us that liberty never was destroyed by naval power. The Constitution, therefore, has placed the security of the public liberty in the hands of the people's Representatives. Have they not the right to say when called upon to exercise the trust imposed upon them by the Constitution with respect to the Army whether or not it shall be employed for any purpose connected with the election of members of their body? Can anything be more appropriate than for the House of Representatives to say, when required to give their consent to the continuance of the Army, that it shall not interfere with the election of members of that House? The power of the House of Commons in England has often been carried to the extent of punishing returning officers for making false returns, a power never claimed here.

It has been said that the President is threatened and that his veto power is in danger. These topics are out of place here. It will be a sad day for this Government when the two Houses of Congress hesitate to do what they regard as their duty for fear of encountering the hostility or opposition of the President. And when did this tenderness for executive feeling and power come over the hearts of our republican friends? You brought to this bar for the first time in our history a President of the United States for no other crime than the exercise of a power which every President from Washington had exerted as a lawful one. You took from him the command of the Army, which is given to him by the express words of the Constitution, and lodged it in the hands of his subordinate.

And now, because Congress proposes to repeal the law which gives him power to employ the mailed hand of the military in the elections of the people it is revolutionary. One, sir, would suppose from what we have heard that the democratic party of the country has never been engaged in any work except the work of revolution and destruction. No credit is ever given to the illustrious services of its long line of illustrious followers in all the high places of Government, but no occasion is permitted to pass which offers an opportunity for impeaching its loyalty and devotion to the Government. As one of its humblest advocates, against this injustice I solemnly protest. The democratic party, like every other human organization, has its faults, God knows it has, "but they are redeemed by splendid virtues." And when I speak of that party I do not refer to an excrescence which has drifted into life by the waves of sectional passion, and which has fed and prospered upon the discords of the people. I mean a party whose principles came into life with the dawn of liberty on this continent, which has withstood the assaults of time like the promontory that is lashed in vain by the billows of the ocean; which, with a Jefferson and a Jackson at its head, has engraven its achievements on the hearts of succeeding generations; and which will yet add to the list of its victories by the destruction of everything which impairs the enjoyment of constitutional freedom. Controlling, as it now does, both Houses of Congress, it resumes the mantle of power by repealing those laws which infringe the liberty of the people.

In this we make no war upon what you call the results of the great civil struggle. You told the world that upon your part it was waged to preserve and perpetuate the Union according to the intent of the Constitution. The business of coercion and blood is now over. The great armies have been dispersed and are now mixed into civil life. The maxims of war are no longer applicable, and having at such heavy cost restored the authority of the Government over the whole country, the business of statesmanship is to make it secure for all time by a wise American policy. Depend upon it the free spirit of this country will never tolerate the arbitrary, repressive system of Europe. However much you may disparage your countrymen of the South, they have rooted in their natures the same love of liberty and hatred of oppression which everywhere distinguishes the Anglo-Saxon race. And this spirit, which for narrow ends and purposes many may undervalue or decry, is the very best safeguard of our noble institutions. So long as it lives the sanctuary of the Constitution will not be profaned by sacrilegious hands. At times it is true, it may wander away a little from the bounds of its elevated orbit, and with jealous eagerness to guard the citadel of freedom seek to confine the arm of authority to too limited a sphere; but such little irregularities cannot impair its value or utility. It is the quality of freedom to be outspoken and bold. With the passing mischiefs of its extravagance compare the inestimable blessings it has bestowed upon man.

It was this bold spirit of freedom which aroused the human mind from the torpor of ages, shook the foundations of oppression and tyranny, dispelled the darkness of ignorance, and filled the world with rays of eternal truth. The grand inquiries it has created have revealed the true foundation of all human rights. What is it that enables the eastern despot to hold with unquestioned power the life and property of his miserable slave? The instincts of liberty will at times arouse the tyrant's tranquillity and warn him that the day of vengeance may be nigh; but the security of despotism and the danger to freedom are always to be found in the despair and inactivity of the people. Compare not the sullen and inaudible murmurs of the oppressed with the manly remonstrances and the defiant tone which springs from freedom and the consciousness of its power. This very agitation which you have miscalled revolution is the natural outgrowth of your free republican system. In proportion to the mildness of government and the intelligence and virtue of the people will be the jealousy and apprehension of all invasions of their reserved rights. Blame not, therefore, this watchful and anxious regard for the public liberties. The best security you can have for the purity and duration of your Government is in the disposition of the people to confine its power within just bounds. The genius of your institutions is unfavorable to the operation of harsh laws. It is a mistake to suppose that the security of liberty is in proportion to the weight of the penalties they impose. It has been well said that in England, where torture was unknown, robbery was seldom followed by murder, but in France when the highwayman was broken on the wheel the traveler seldom escaped with his life. What was it but the mildness of the English law that prevented murder in all cases following robbery? The authority of Mr. Burke has been invoked. How happy would it be for mankind if the teachings of this great statesman were followed as much as they are admired. He pointed out in vain to Great Britain the remedy for American discontent. It was not followed and an empire was lost because the pride of power could not be made to yield to the demands of justice. His remedy was peace. "Not peace through the medium of war; not peace to be hunted through the labyrinth of intricate and endless negotiations; not peace to arise out of universal discord fomented from principle in all parts of the empire; not peace to depend upon the juridical decisions of perplexing questions or the precise marking the shadow of boundaries of a complex government. It is simple peace sought in its natural haunts; peace sought in the spirit of peace by restoring the former unsuspecting confidence of the colonies in the mother country."

Sir, we have been told on the floor of the Senate that the South has come back to these halls to disintegrate and destroy; that having failed by arms she now resorts to strategy to accomplish the same end. And where is the evidence of this? Is it to be found in the desire which is shown by liberty-loving men all over the North to repeal those terrible laws which you framed against us in the hour of our weakness, our suffering—I nearly said despair? Sir, it was expected that the spirit of justice would for a time be overridden by the spirit of revenge. It was expected that great harshness and suffering would follow the overthrow of the arms of the South; that families would be left desolate who were once independent; that tender women upon whom the winds of heaven had not been permitted to blow severely would have to toil in the open fields for their daily bread. These things were expected, and they were borne with a patience and a fortitude which would have done honor to Roman virtue in Rome's best days. The whole South a few years ago presented nothing but one vast scene of desolation and of suffering. Such distress and humiliation never before followed an unsuccessful struggle except that produced by the sword of Cromwell in unhappy Ireland.

Property, credit, government, everything which goes to make up individual and general prosperity, I might say ordinary comfort, was swept away. A few thousand bales of cotton, which had escaped the torch and the blockade, and the lands were all that was left. The "smartness of debate" will say that all this was penalty of secession, but I have no argument to address to him who has no heart to feel for human misfortunes or sufferings when they follow from the mistakes and errors of humanity. The devoted and self-sacrificing Christians who live amid the perpetual snows of the Alps to extend the hand of kindness and safety to the imperiled traveler never stop to ask him whether curiosity or error made him an object of relief. All must admit that the condition of the South after the war was most deplorable and required the nicest hand to adjust the affairs of the people. And how was this important interest then dealt with? Nearly one of the first laws passed after the peace was one to levy an export tax of $60,000,000 on the little cotton which was there, and barely enough to procure food and clothing for a starving people. Local governments were set on foot on the most economical scale to preserve order. The black and white population was beginning to accommodate themselves to the new order of things, and the best feeling existed between them.

And here, sir, I wish I could draw the veil of oblivion over what followed. General Grant, with a fairness which did him much credit, declared that such was the peaceful state of the South at that time that a single soldier of the United States was sufficient to keep order in a district where a regiment of confederate volunteers wearing the scars of a hundred battle-fields could be found. Why was this opportunity for lasting peace and unity neglected? You might have profited even by the examples of pagan nations in the adoption of an enlightened policy. I quote the words of a great orator, "Look at the warlike Roman, with the sword in one hand and the constitution in the other, carrying into subdued provinces all the rights and privileges of the imperial city. And look at his great rival, the noble Carthagenian, at the foot of the Alps ranging his prisoners around him and by the politic option of captivity or arms recruiting his legions from the very men whom he had literally conquered into gratitude." Pagan as they were, these rude masters of ancient polity laid the foundations of government in the immutable principles of honesty, truth, and justice which are planted in the human heart.

We have been told in the air of triumphant prophecy that the South has been for a time trusted with the business of self-government, and has failed to come up to the expectations of her judges. She has been, it seems, since the advent of the present executive government on trial for her life: and one would suppose from what was said here the other day that the short relaxation she has enjoyed from the grasp of military power was due to the voluntary and disinterested counsels of the Senator from Massachusetts and his friends. It was expected, it seems, that when the bayonet was taken from her throat, instead of using her liberty to prevent the return of oppression, she ought to have rushed into the arms of her enemies and repaid by the basest ingratitude and desertion the life-long devotion of her friends.

No fair man can contemplate the state of the South at present and compare it with its condition under the republican local rule without feeling the great change for the better which has taken place, not only for one race but for both. It is seen, sir, in public credit, in the thrift and enterprise of the people, in the character of the public officers, in the administration of the laws, and especially, sir, in the new-born zeal for public liberty and the determination to preserve it. For what ends are governments instituted among men? To protect life, liberty, and property, and enable every man to pursue his own road to individual happiness. But it is said that such is not the kind of government we have at the South, and the management of our local affairs has been severely criticised by those who know nothing of our condition beyond what they have learned from misrepresentation and the calumny of partisan witnesses.

Sir, I care not what may be said to the contrary, the establishment of democratic rule at the South and the overthrow of the rotten governments which so long existed there did more for the prosperity, peace, and happiness of that section than anything which could have happened. Why, then, should any one quarrel with the local condition of affairs there who is not affected by it, and when it is so satisfactory to the people who are directly concerned in the maintenance of good local government? The framers of our Constitution thought they had provided sufficient safeguards against the officious, intermeddling propagandist spirit which, not satisfied with what it best understands and in abiding where it is best known, must obtrude itself always where it is least wanted, to create discord, dissension, and ruin.

The harmonious action of this Government must depend very greatly upon our honest observance of its principles. I feel, sir, that I have no right to question or criticise the domestic policy of Massachusetts. She has vast interests which are tender and peculiar, all lying within the scope of her local authority, and I am very sure that I would not feel justified in raising any alarm if she were to return to any of her errors of by-gone days. Looking at what she is and what she was, I am profoundly impressed with the wisdom of our twofold system of government; for in my judgment she owes much of her wealth and power to her local institutions and laws. I cannot permit this occasion to go by without expressing my regret at the tone and manner of some Senators toward the people of the South. It is to me most remarkable that an American statesman, anxious to extend the fame and to uphold the character of his whole country, should try to parade before the world what he regards as the shortcomings and errors of his own people.

The eye of the foreigner does not measure the national character by States and sections. He looks at the country as a whole, and those who are anxious for good reputations abroad ought to reflect upon what will be thought of us when the authority of an American Senator is cited to blacken the American name. For my part, sir, I know not what kind of service may be before me during the period I shall remain here. I know how inadequate my poor powers are to the performance of the high duties of this body; but, sir, if ever the time comes when for want of better employment I shall attempt to use the little ability with which I am gifted in casting reproaches upon any part of the people of this great country, I hope that my tongue may cleave to the roof of my mouth.

Sir, there is really no substantial ground for sectional differences at this time. Fourteen years have elapsed since the cause of the South went down in the flame of battle. We cannot destroy the past for that is beyond the power of the Almighty, but the future is yet within our control. How long it shall be in our power to control it depends upon ourselves. Depend upon it, you cannot keep up this sectional warfare with safety to the future interests of the country. No man lives who desires more than I do the perpetuity of our great Republic; but, sir, if parties and public leaders can find nothing else to divide upon except the memoirs of the late civil war and the prejudices it has engendered, the battles for the Union were fought in vain. I say it in all the sincerity of a heart anxious for real national amity. If you cannot accept the South as she is, and permit her to act and speak in these Halls as her interests and feelings prompt her, for what purpose has representation been given her?

The superior powers—

may concede peace with honor and with safety, but the concessions of the weak are the concessions of fear.

You cannot break down all the barriers which nature has erected between the remote parts of a great country. The genius of our Government is distinguished for its flexibility rather than the uniformity with which it expands itself. It was intended more for detached than connected empire. It never was supposed that its powers would be great enough to unify and assimilate all the various shades and phases of human life and character which are to be found living under it. On the contrary it was expected that its temper would be suited to all sections and climates, and that while it could withstand the cold and freezing elements of the North it would also be suited to the melting and dissolving warmth of the South. And this adaptability to the varied interests and conditions of life is what distinguishes it from all other governments on earth. Day by day the tide of emigration is closing up the vast area which separates us from the Pacific Ocean, and the time is not far distant when numerous new States will be demanding admission into the Union. Who can tell what will be the state of your politics fifty years hence? Depend upon it, this southern question cannot live forever. A time will come when it must be closed. Why not close it now?

The whole country is suffering from distress, and the fairest portion of the land invites capital to go there, but politicians proclaim it to be in a state of siege, and intercourse and settlement are interdicted. You say that the black population of the South is not represented in the other House because men of color are not elected to Congress. I know of no provision in the laws or Constitution which entitles that class of persons to distinct representation. You increased the number of members from the South after you gave the ballot to the black man, but surely this was not done from any motive of kindness toward the white population. The concession did not have the effect intended, but this is not the first instance where the result of a measure disappointed the calculation of the lawgiver. A great benefit has ensued to the section, and you are entitled to the same credit that would be due to a person who administers a poison to destroy his victim and it happens to cure him of a terrible disease.

The misfortune of all your laws relating to the unhappy South is that they attempt to break down the landmarks of nature and arrogate to human power what God himself has never attempted to appropriate. There are limits to the range of human wisdom and arrogance in the political as well as in the natural world. Science and art have done much to improve and elevate the condition of man, but there are barriers to their labors which the wisdom of Providence will not permit them to pass. And so it is in the political world. Congregated here beneath the lofty dome of this grand Capitol, with the sovereign power of a great people lodged in our hands, we may vainly imagine that the authority of our laws can uproot the foundation of our social system.

As man preceded society, so society preceded government, and as the one must conform to the impulses and tendencies of individual life the other can never for any great length of time set itself above the wants, feelings, or interests of society. The people who ask the repeal of these laws are your own fellow-citizens. Whatever may have been the differences of the past it is your duty to forget them here. Much has been accomplished in the work of restoring harmony to the country and much remains to be done. Be assured that the memory of harsh laws will greatly overbalance any temporary advantage which may flow from them. Do not, I beseech you, proceed upon the false notion that it is wise to foment and perpetuate sectional strife. Even though you be the stronger party in the end it will not avail you, for it was the observation of a great statesman that conciliation was the true policy of nations whatever be their weakness or their strength, and that occasions might arise in the history of the most powerful State when those who are too weak to resist its authority might prove strong enough to compass its ruin.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I wish to give notice now that I shall offer the amendment I hold in my hand, which is just the amendment that, by the leave of the Senate, I withdrew this morning; and I do not offer it now to be pending; I simply give notice of my intention to offer it. I withdrew it in deference to the opinion of Senators who desired first to have a vote taken on striking out the sixth section unembarrassed by any amendment, and with that view I merely submit it to be offered at the appropriate time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator wish it printed?

Mr. BLAINE. I desire to have it printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order to print will be entered.

Mr. BLAINE. My intention in offering this amendment——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator wish to have the amendment reported to the Senate?

Mr. BLAINE. I should be glad to have it reported, though I suppose it is familiar to the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the end of section 6 it is proposed to insert:

And any military, naval, or civil officer, or any other person, who shall, except for the purpose herein named, appear armed with a deadly weapon of any description, either concealed or displayed, within a mile of any polling place where a general or special election for Representative to Congress is being held, shall, on conviction, be punished with a fine not less than $500 nor more than $5,000, or with imprisonment for a period not less than six months nor more than five years, or with both fine and imprisonment, at the discretion of the court.

Mr. BLAINE. My design in offering this amendment was to test the sincerity of those Senators who are desirous of having no coercion used at the polls at the time of electing Representatives to Congress. It occurred to me, as I endeavored to state to the Senate a few days since, that the Senators who express alarm at the overriding of liberty by the Army of the United States are fighting a mere chimera; they are alarmed at an enemy that does not exist; they are speaking of a peril that is not present or possible; and they are entirely neglecting a frightful and ever-present source of danger to the ballot throughout the Southern States. In this case I speak of "the Southern States" because I do not believe that the remarks which I am going to make apply to the Northern States, whether they be under democratic control or under republican control.

I hold in my hand a report of a committee of this body. I might detain the Senate for a long time in reading testimony, of which I shall only give one or two specimens. Edgar J. Douglas testifies——

Mr. BUTLER. Where?

Mr. BLAINE. He resides at Statesburgh precinct, Sumter County, South Carolina, and I quote the following from his testimony:

Question. State what you saw at that place in the way of armed men, interference with voters, &c.?

Answer. On the night before the election I saw white men, members of the democratic party, coming in from all parts of the county to Statesburgh. They came in wagons, buggies, and on horseback. During the night they kept up a great firing, in volleys and single shots. On the morning of the election I was making my way to the polls very early, when I was overtaken by a large crowd of white men behaving themselves very disorderly. I was to act as supervisor of election. I took my place in the building where the election was to be conducted. A while afterward J. J. Dargan, after seeing a large crowd of colored men come up to vote, asked his men to close up around the polls. They staid there for two hours, playing drunk and hollering and pulling everybody around there, and threatening, and one white man in the crowd cut two colored men with knives.

That was at one poll. I find here——

Mr. BUTLER. Will the honorable Senator give me the page from which he read that?

Mr. BLAINE. The testimony I read at that moment was at page

312 of the report. On page 423 I find the testimony of H. W. G. Wilson. He testified that he noticed some men rather backward about coming up to vote. The Senator from Wisconsin whom I do not see in his seat, the senior Senator, [Mr. CAMERON,] said in an interrogative way: "Colored men?" and the answer is:

Yes, sir; well, there were some told me that there were several standing around that were afraid to come on account of the guns that were there. There were a great many guns.
Q. State where these guns were.
A. In the hands of white men.
Q. How many?
A. I do not know, but it varied from fifteen to twenty during the day, sometimes more and sometimes less.

At the precinct of Kingstree—the Senate will pardon me for reading these extracts, because they are an illustration of the necessity of my amendment—

Some of the men stopped and got scared. Then they marched down and came by the court-house and hollered, "File left," and they filed left. I was in front of them. They marched up the steps, and as they got up there Mr. Hanna was sitting on a box, and they said, "Get away from here, God damn you; what business you got here?"

And then followed a scene of very great disorder, a regular series of violent acts, in which a large number of men were taken out and threatened in this form:

Now form a line and we will shoot you pretty quick.

This was at various and divers polls throughout the State of South Carolina, at which there was no more freedom of election than there would be in a mob anywhere. I understood the honorable Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. WILLIAMS,] whom I regret I do not see in his seat at this moment, to say this morning that it was part of the liberty of elections to have an old-fashioned shindy and a drunk.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the honorable Senator——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from South Carolina address the Chair? Does the Senator from Maine yield?

Mr. BLAINE. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. I simply arose for the purpose of asking the Senator from Maine if he does not know that within the last three days an acquittal has been ordered in the United States court at Charleston, by the presiding judge, upon just such testimony as that?

Mr. BLAINE. I believe owing to a technical defect in the indictment.

Mr. BUTLER. No, sir.

Mr. BLAINE. I think so entirely. Nothing whatever has transpired in the court in the least degree conflicting with this testimony, in my judgment.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator is entirely mistaken.

Mr. BLAINE. That is a question of fact upon which of course the honorable Senator has a right to have his judgment, and I mine.

Mr. BUTLER. It was upon precisely such testimony as that which the honorable Senator has read, which was given to a jury consisting of a majority of republicans, that an acquittal was ordered.

Mr. BLAINE. We shall see about that fact in due time. However, I merely state what I believe to be the case. The honorable Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] said he was ready to vote on this amendment immediately, and the honorable Senator from Texas [Mr. MAXEY] said that the amendment is in conflict with the Constitution, and that the Constitution forbids it because one of the articles of amendment says that the right to bear arms shall not be infringed, and therefore I understand the Senator from Texas to maintain that at all times a citizen of the United States has the right to bear arms.

Mr. MAXEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Maine yield?

Mr. BLAINE. I do.

Mr. MAXEY. Did the Senator from Delaware state that he would vote for the Senator's amendment?

Mr. BLAINE. No; he said he was ready to vote against it without any argument whatever. He did not dignify it with an argument. I understood the Senator from Texas to say that this was in conflict with the amendment to the Constitution, and that Congress had no right whatever to say that any man should not go armed.

Mr. MAXEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLAINE. I understand the Senator to maintain that the Congress of the United States has no right to say that a juryman in a Federal court shall not take his arms into the jury-box, that a Senator here shall not bring his arms into this Chamber, that a judge on the bench shall not take his shot-gun into court. I understand the Senator to maintain that.

Mr. MAXEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Maine yield?

Mr. BLAINE. I do.

Mr. MAXEY. I was not aware before that a jury in a Federal court was under State law. I said that elections were under State laws.

Mr. BLAINE. But these are United States elections for United States officers. These are United States elections. We are not pretending to talk about what you may do in State elections; and we are enlightened to-day, for the first time I believe in the history of this country, by the honorable Senator from Kentucky, with the information that Representatives in Congress are officers of the States. Does the honorable Senator from Texas maintain that a Representative in Congress is an officer of the State from which he comes? That is the ground laid down by the Senator from Kentucky to-day. I undertake to say that there is no pretense in any law in the statute-book of the United States, placed there by the republican party, of interfering with an election of a State. What we ask is that Representatives in Congress shall be elected by the free vote of the people of the respective districts, and there has never been such a travesty on truth, there has never been such a satire on fact, there has never been such a pretense to righteousness so utterly confounded by fact and so utterly ridiculed by history as for the Senators on that side to stand up here and demand a free election. Why, that is what we have been struggling for—a free election. There has not been a free election in five Southern States that I can name since the democrats have had power. There was no more a free election in South Carolina for the Congress now in session than there would be in a mob of violent roughs that had undisputed possession of a poll in the lower wards of the city of New York—not a particle more.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, will the honorable Senator permit me to suggest one thing to him? How long have these laws been upon the statute-book? I ask the Senator how long these laws have been on the statute-book of the United States?

Mr. BLAINE. Different periods. Twelve or fourteen years, some of them.

Mr. BUTLER. I should like to ask, then, if they were not upon the statute-book when these "travesties," these mockeries of election, took place in South Carolina?

Mr. BLAINE. Since the democratic party came into power and trampled them under foot and overawed supervisors and drove them from the polls and defied the authority of the United States, certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator may make these statements——

Mr. BLAINE. I make this statement on the sworn testimony of witnesses whose veracity was not questioned where they testified.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator may make these statements as much as he pleases, but, without intending to be disrespectful personally to him, I say that they are absolutely false as to South Carolina.

Mr. BLAINE. I do not make any solitary statement upon my individual authority. I assert that when the Senator says they are false he is confronting the sworn testimony of numerous citizens of his own State whose veracity was not questioned before the tribunal where the testimony was delivered.

Mr. BUTLER. Yes, Mr. President, but——

Mr. BLAINE. That is what I state.

Mr. BUTLER. A jury in South Carolina has recently sustained what I say.

Mr. BLAINE. That is the case down in Louisiana, a jury has done something or other there. I observe there was a perfectly peaceful election in Louisiana, only forty or fifty men were slaughtered; that was all, and a jury, I believe, has acquitted some of the murderers there and wiped all that out.

Mr. JONAS. Will the Senator permit me to make a statement?

Mr. BLAINE. Certainly.

Mr. JONAS. Mr. President, the trials in Louisiana were conducted upon the very identical testimony in that report, and the witnesses who testified before the committee were produced before a jury selected by the exclusion of those who could not take the test oath. That trial was conducted by a district attorney who had as his text-book the report of the Teller committee, which he examined as he put the witnesses on the stand to try to get from them the same evidence which they had given to that committee, and it was shown that he had sent that text-book, an advance copy of which he had, to the witnesses beforehand to refresh their memory. The parties accused were tried on the testimony of all these witnesses and before a jury upon which probably was not one democrat, upon which was not one man who could not take the test oath, and that jury acquitted those prisoners, and found that that evidence was false. And I state further, so far as the State of Louisiana is concerned, as to every investigation which has taken place before the courts, that the people of Louisiana have come to that pitch now, Mr. President, that they prefer to have these questions investigated before a packed jury in a Federal court rather than before a committee such as has been sent out recently, a partisan committee by the two Houses of Congress.

Mr. BLAINE. While the honorable Senator is on the floor——

Mr. JONAS. I think the fact is demonstrated that every charge made by the witnesses before that committee was false.

Mr. BLAINE. While the honorable Senator is on the floor, and is so ready to give information, will he please state what became of the witnesses who were mobbed and taken from a boat when on the way to court to testify?

Mr. JONAS. I saw that statement in a paper, but it was never substantiated.

Mr. BLAINE. I never knew before that it was denied.

Mr. JONAS. Those witnesses were supposed to come from the parish of Caddo——

Mr. BLAINE. I am perfectly willing to yield to the Senator for a question. I do not yield my time for a speech.

Mr. JONAS. I thought the Senator asked me a question, and I am giving an explanation. I saw that it was stated that those witnesses were brought from the parish of Caddo; that there were two colored men brought down who were taken from a boat. I say that the cases which were on trial from the parish of Caddo were cases of law only;

cases of the construction of a State law as to whether the commissioners, who were the only people indicted from the parish of Caddo, had properly interpreted the State election law or not, and there was no occasion for colored witnesses, and no occasion for witnesses at all, except those who were to interpret that law; and there has been no substantiation whatever of the report that two witnesses were taken from a steamboat and made away with.

Mr. TELLER. With the consent of the Senator from Maine——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Maine yield?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. TELLER. The honorable Senator from Louisiana [Mr. JONAS] must have carelessly read the testimony before the committee, and probably did not hear the testimony before the jury at all. The facts with reference to those two witnesses were that they were subpœnaed by the United States court for the purpose of giving testimony with reference to the Caledonia affair, an occurrence that took place on the eve of the election at Caledonia, commencing before the election had closed. That is one of the cases in Louisiana where armed men appeared at the polls. There was some conflict of testimony as to the time when they came there. There is no conflict of testimony as to the fact that a large number of white men had arms in their hands before the polls closed. There is testimony, unquestioned and uncontradicted, that a number of persons were killed before the polls were closed, and the testimony shows that they hunted those people not only all that night but all the next day, and a deputy sheriff testified that he had made a report in which he estimated that twenty persons had been killed.

Mr. President, that is not the only case. There are a great many more cases in Louisiana where the testimony is unquestioned and uncontradicted that there were armed men at the polls and that men were slaughtered, and the governor in his message says that the troubles in Tensas Parish grew out of political matters. He makes that statement.

Mr. BLAINE. The logic of the honorable Senator from Louisiana, and I think to a large extent of the honorable Senator from South Carolina, amounts to this: here were ten or twelve or fifteen or twenty men murdered, their mangled remains found; testimony was adduced before a congressional committee showing the fact; six months after the Senator from Louisiana gets up and says Mr. A B was entirely cleared of that murder. He might have been, but that does not show that C D or E F or G H did not commit the murder. The whole of the logic of the Senator is like unto that by which the man was cleared from the charge of stealing a purse. There was only one man who saw him take the purse, and he produced a hundred who did not see him take it. That is the logic of the Senator. Bringing up some miscreant and clearing him of this crime does not show that the crime was not committed. And the governor acknowledged it, the governor of your choice acknowledged that great outrages had been committed in this parish and that murders had been committed by the wholesale.

Mr. JONAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Maine yield?

Mr. BLAINE. I will for a question from the Senator. I do not yield for a speech.

Mr. JONAS. I only wanted to correct the Senator and to ask him to produce the evidence that the governor says anything of the kind.

Mr. BLAINE. Governor Nicholls.

Mr. JONAS. The governor said troubles had occurred in some of the parishes.

Mr. BLAINE. Does not Governor Nicholls acknowledge that there were men murdered in the parish of Tensas?

Mr. JONAS. Not for political reasons.

Mr. BLAINE. There is another qualification the Senator gets in.

Mr. JONAS. I deny that any one was murdered for political purposes.

Mr. BLAINE. The honorable Senator from South Carolina yesterday, in reference to the elections in Charleston County, advanced the novel theory—as I think he himself will conclude upon reflection—that the polling places had been made very far apart and very few in number in order that repeating might be prevented. Every other State in this country that has striven to prevent repeating has adopted the plan of having numerous polling places with a small area, with a strict registry, where every man entitled to vote at that particular poll should be personally known to the officers. That prevents repeating. That prevents it in the city of New York to a large extent.

Mr. BUTLER. Will my friend permit an interruption once more?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BUTLER. I want to say for his information when he refers to the laws of other States, the registration laws, &c., that in the constitution adopted by the republican convention on the reconstruction of South Carolina, in 1868, there was a provision that the Legislature should provide for the registration of the qualified voters of the State. I desire to inform the honorable Senator that the republican Legislatures of South Carolina from that time up to 1878 studiously avoided providing for that registration, for the express purpose of preventing that registration which the honorable Senator says is so common in other States.

Mr. BLAINE. Now, before I read, I wish to ask if the honorable Senator knows one James B. Campbell?

Mr. BUTLER. I know him very well.

Mr. BLAINE. Is he a reputable man?

Mr. BUTLER. Well, he is.

Mr. BLAINE. That is all I desired to know. Mr. Campbell says upon his oath, referring to the democratic Legislature:

> They reduced the number of precincts so that the voters (most of them poor and having to walk) would, in many instances, have to go twenty or forty miles to get to the polls.

Mr. BUTLER. Does Mr. Campbell state that?

Mr. BLAINE. He does state that under oath.

Mr. BUTLER. What Mr. Campbell?

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. James B. Campbell. I am reading his testimony verbatim et literatim et punctuatim. I will read it again:

> They reduced the number of precincts so that the voters (most of them poor and having to walk) would, in many instances, have to go twenty or forty miles to get to the polls.

Now, I will give you some more of Mr. Campbell's testimony:

> In my own county there was a very flagrant instance of that near Charleston, in one of the divisions of the county formerly known as Saint Andrew's Parish, which consisted of mainland and James Island, that is opposite Charleston. There were six precincts in the parish. They reduced them to one. They left one voting precinct on James Island, at Dill's Bluff, where there had been less votes taken than at any other of the precincts, showing that it was not populated very much, and could not be easily approached.

Mr. Campbell goes on to say:

> Well, I denounced this in the senate when I discovered it, (I discovered it accidentally,) and they immediately restored every one of the precincts on my motion, without any opposition.

Now I beg the attention of the honorable Senator from South Carolina:

> They immediately restored every one of the precincts on my motion, without any opposition.

Mr. Campbell proceeds further:

> Nobody said a word. A day or two afterward the bill came back from the house with these amendments rejected, and then it appeared that it was a part of the machinery. General Gary, representing the democratic committee at Charleston, appeared before the senate and announced that they desired to have the bill passed, whereupon they did pass it. I said I would go before the community and denounce the fraud, and I did that. General Gary said he did it at the instance of the chairman of the democratic committee of Charleston, a member of the house of representatives.
> Q. Was that Mr. Buist?
>
> A. Yes, sir.
> Q. Did you hear any discussion in the house on the bill?
> A. No, sir.
> Q. Do you know what reasons were given there for its support?
> A. I knew what reasons were given in the senate, and Mr. Buist stated them to me in person, saying that if they would pass that bill and Governor HAMPTON would appoint men as commissioners that they would name, that they would carry Charleston County. That was the reason.

Governor HAMPTON did appoint the commissioners that they named. I regret that he is not in his seat when I make that statement. I believe he did appoint the commissioners, and under the law of South Carolina, which required an impartial division between the two parties of the overseers of elections, or whatever their title may be, the republicans were not permitted to have a representation of a fair character on that board.

Mr. McDONALD and Mr. BUTLER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Maine yield; and if so, to which Senator?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield to either or both of the Senators.

Mr. McDONALD. I say there is no such provision in the law of South Carolina.

Mr. BLAINE. There is not? I have got it here and I will read it for the honorable Senator's edification.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President——

Mr. BLAINE. In one moment; one at a time:

> It shall be the duty of the governor, and he is hereby authorized and empowered, at least sixty days prior to any such election, to appoint two boards of commissioners of election, consisting of three members each for each county; both political parties shall be represented. One shall be appointed and designated as commissioners of election for members of Congress and presidential electors; the other as commissioners of election for State and county officers.

That appears in evidence.

Mr. McDONALD. The boards of commissioners only are required by the statute of South Carolina to be so constituted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. BLAINE. Yes, sir.

Mr. McDONALD. The statute of South Carolina does not require the two parties to be represented in the judges of election.

Mr. BLAINE. It says that both political parties shall be represented.

Mr. McDONALD. Not in the judges of election.

Mr. BLAINE. Then I have the admission of the honorable Senator from Indiana that Governor HAMPTON did not appoint any except of one party. Is that what I understand? That he was not obliged to appoint from the other party?

Mr. McDONALD. In appointing the commissioners of the counties he did in every instance appoint one republican and two democrats.

Mr. TELLER. Oh, no!

Mr. BLAINE. The testimony is directly in the teeth of that statement.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, that is another one of the Senator's statements.

Mr. BLAINE. That is the point the Senator from Indiana raised. If he is through I will hear the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. BUTLER. I simply want to relieve the honorable Senator of some little trouble. I know personally the commissioners of election in Charleston County, and I undertake to say that one of them was a republican.

Mr. BLAINE. How many were there in all?

Mr. BUTLER. Three.

Mr. BLAINE. The testimony goes on to show here that a great many men who professed to be republicans, and were democrats in disguise, were appointed.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President——

Mr. BLAINE. That in that way nominal republicans were appointed, and that they thus got the whole of them on the democratic side.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the honorable Senator permit me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. BLAINE. Yes, sir.

Mr. BUTLER. I merely want to give the honorable Senator a little more information. One of the commissioners of election was Colonel Montgomery who was for four years—I think I state correctly, certainly for two years—the presiding officer of the republican senate of South Carolina under the reconstruction laws. That man was one of the commissioners of election appointed by Governor HAMPTON at the last election.

Mr. BLAINE. Now I will give the honorable Senator some more information in regard to his own State. I will read some testimony on that point.

Mr. BUTLER. In reference to Mr. Montgomery?

Mr. BLAINE. No, not about him. I do not know anything about Mr. Montgomery?

Mr. BUTLER. But I do.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

Mr. BLAINE. Nor do I know what particular point he has to do with this matter.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senators will cease. This dialogue is getting to be entirely disorderly. Does the Senator from Maine yield?

Mr. BLAINE. Does the honorable President mean that the Senator from Maine is in disorder?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No, sir; but I mean that this dialogue is not in order. If the Senator from Maine yields to the Senator from South Carolina he will let the Senator from South Carolina make his remarks and conclude. We have three Senators here on the floor at one moment.

Mr. BUTLER. I beg pardon if I have offended against any order of the Senate.

Mr. BLAINE. I was not doing it, I am very sure.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. BLAINE. As long as he chooses.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. BUTLER. The honorable Senator I understand to charge that the statute law of South Carolina required that the commissioners should be appointed by the governor from each political party, and that Governor HAMPTON had not done that. That is what I understand to be the charge against Governor HAMPTON.

Mr. BLAINE. I did not charge anything against Governor HAMPTON. I charged that this testimony said that was so.

Mr. BUTLER. Ah!

Mr. BLAINE. Now, what does the Senator object to by that? Did I not state that the testimony in this book charged it? Do I profess any personal knowledge except the sworn testimony? Does the Senator understand me to profess any personal knowledge other than what I derive from this official report?

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I did not understand the Senator to state that he got his information from that testimony.

Mr. BLAINE. I think I shall satisfy the Senator before I get through that I got it from this testimony.

Mr. BUTLER. I merely desired to satisfy the Senator on one point and to record the statement that one of the commissioners was a pronounced republican.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Maine yield?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to call attention——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will wait until he gets an answer.

Mr. BLAINE. I have three times advised the honorable President that I yielded to the Senator from Colorado.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair had not heard it before.

Mr. TELLER. I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the character of republicans who were appointed on this commission or board. The honorable Senator from South Carolina says that Mr. Montgomery was a republican. At one time in his history he had acted with the republican party. At the last election he was not in sympathy with the republican party; it was understood that he did not vote their ticket; and he had no connection or sympathy with the party at all. It is in evidence by a democratic member of the board, Mr. White, who was chairman of the board, if I recollect, that this commission, composed as they say of two democrats and a republican, met and solemnly resolved that no republican manager of elections should be appointed at all. If that is not pretty good evidence that Mr. Montgomery was not a republican at that election, then I do not need any.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President——

Mr. BLAINE. One moment. I will just enlighten the Senator from South Carolina with a little more testimony.

Mr. BUTLER. I cannot be responsible for the character of the republicans in South Carolina.

Mr. BLAINE. I will just give a little testimony and I am only speaking from the testimony. I am not asked for my personal knowledge of the question. Here is the answer made by John L. West, a witness:

Question. Did you make any application in behalf of the republicans for an appointment of commissioners of election in the various counties? If so, state what you did, and the result of your application.

Answer—

Under oath—

I did make such application. By direction of the republican State executive committee, I corresponded with the county republican chairmen of each county in the State, requesting them to send to the State committee their choice as commissioners to represent them at the election. On the 4th day of September, I think that is the date, we had the list completed, and I took it down to the executive office to present it to Governor HAMPTON, through his private secretary. I was informed by his private secretary that the governor was absent, I think, at Cash's Valley. I was referred by him to General Kennedy, chairman of the democratic State executive committee. He said the appointments were discretionary with General Kennedy. I asked, "Does not the law require the governor to make these appointments?" He repeated that the matter was left discretionary with General Kennedy.

Q. Did you understand him to say that General Kennedy was to make the appointments, or was to recommend the appointments to the governor?

A. He said the appointments were discretionary with General Kennedy. I remember his exact words. Prior to seeing the secretary I had gone into the office of the secretary of state, and learned that during his absence they received and forwarded his mail; and I learned from the secretary's clerk that most of the commissions, if not all, had been made out for the commissioners. He showed me the list. I saw the list of republicans. I remonstrated against those appointments, stating that they were not representatives of our party. I told him that I held the only list. He said he had no voice in the matter. Subsequently, on asking of the private secretary from what source these recommendations came, I was told they came from the democratic committee.

Mr. BUTLER. Who testified that?

Mr. BLAINE. That is John L. West, testifying that the democratic committee recommended the appointment of republican commissioners. I will give the Senator a little more of the testimony.

Mr. BUTLER. Very good.

Mr. BLAINE. The question is asked:

The recommendations as to who should be the republican commissioners came from the democratic executive committee?

I do not know who asked this question. It might have been my honorable friend from Indiana, [Mr. MCDONALD,] who was surprised at that kind of performance. At any rate the question was asked, and the answer was:

Yes, sir. Of the thirty-two recommended by the republican executive committee there were but six or seven appointed. The others were appointed first, because HAMPTON had promised to appoint them before the list presented by us had been submitted.

Q. What was the character of the republican commissioners appointed, so far as you know?

A. So far as I could learn from correspondence with the chairmen of the different county committees, many were not republicans at all, were democrats; many who were not professed democrats were under democratic influence; many who were acknowledged republicans were illiterate.

There has been a great deal of talk about republicans having illiterate men to take charge of affairs in the South. In this case the few the democrats took who were unquestioned republicans, this colored man himself testifies, were so illiterate in many instances as to be unable to read or write, and consequently they were entirely unfit to represent any party in such a position.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President——

Mr. BLAINE. Wait a moment. I maintain that so far as the testimony goes it shows a deliberate and willful and systematic fraud upon the right of suffrage. On top of that, when these commissioners were entirely in the hands of one party, when the other party went to the polls those polls were surrounded. I have heard a good deal of talk on the democratic side about the cordon of bayonets around the polls. Up to this time testimony is lacking on the part of Senators who have seen those cordons of bayonets. The honorable Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] voted I think he said once between a line of bayonets, but I think he will remember that it was during the war, flagrante bello, when Delaware was at least a little under suspicion.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I beg the Senator's pardon, with permission of the Chair.

Mr. BLAINE. I was not referring to the honorable Senator now on the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. SAULSBURY. I know the Senator from Maine was not referring to me; but he made a reference to my State, and, as I understand, intimated that we were a little disloyal.

Mr. BLAINE. I did not say "a little."

Mr. SAULSBURY. I understood the Senator to make that accusation. I say that, so far as the people of Delaware were concerned, there was no obligation which they owed to this Government of the United States that they did not perform as cheerfully and as freely as any people in the United States. We paid every tax that was assessed upon us, we met every draft for troops——

Mr. BLAINE. I am not questioning the loyalty of Delaware. All I know is that Abraham Lincoln regarded it as a place where it would be safe at least to have a little watching done.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I do not know whether Abraham Lincoln or the Senator from Maine——

Mr. BLAINE. The Senator from Maine has nothing to do with it.

Mr. SAULSBURY. When imputations or accusations of disloyalty are made against my State, I repel them now. I know that the people of that State met every obligation. I lived in the State; I drew the resolution myself repelling the idea of secession from the Legislature of the State. I know as a citizen of the State what took place in that State, and I know that every accusation, emanate from where it may, which charges disloyalty upon the people of Delaware or unfaithfulness in her State organization to the Government under which they lived is neither true in fact nor in theory, I do not care where it emanates.

Mr. BLAINE. I do not desire any issue with the honorable Senator on that point. His colleague spoke of marching up through a cordon of bayonets to deposit his vote. All I desired to call attention to was that I think the honorable Senator will not state that he has done that since the war closed.

Mr. BUTLER. I have seen it done, if the honorable Senator will permit me to say so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Maine yield? The Chair begs to say to Senators that the rule is very explicit, that if a Senator desires to interrupt the Senator who is on the floor he must request the Chair to ask leave to do so, and the Chair submits the request to the Senator who has the floor whether he will be interrupted or not.

Mr. BLAINE. I will say once for all to the honorable President that Senators may interrupt me just as much as they please.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will suspend a moment. If the Senator who has the floor yields the floor to a Senator to make a remark he has no more right to interrupt that Senator than the Senator had to interrupt him, without that Senator's leave. If he yields to a mere question, that is another thing; but if he yields the floor to a Senator to make a speech in the midst of his own speech he has no more right to interrupt him without the leave of that Senator than the latter had to interrupt him without his leave.

Mr. BLAINE. The honorable President, however, will permit me to say that with some little observation in regard to presiding over deliberative assemblies, for a slight interruption the whole series of questions as, "Does the Senator yield" and "If the Senator does not yield does the other Senator yield" sometimes rather obstructs than facilitates the order of the body.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It certainly interrupts a spicy dialogue, but it does not interrupt the regular order of proceeding.

Mr. BLAINE. The rules do not contemplate that the presiding officer shall take part in a spicy dialogue.

Mr. President, there has been a great deal of chassezing, if I may use the phrase, around one particular historic fact about the use of the troops at the polls. There is my honorable friend from New Jersey [Mr. RANDOLPH] who delivered an elaborate speech the other day and summoned us to all the precedents of the past in the history of his patriotic and honored State. There was the honorable Senator from Maryland, I do not know whether he is in his seat, the junior Senator—yes, I see he is—who invoked the spirit of Charles Carroll in his eloquent remarks. Neither the Senator from New Jersey nor the Senator from Maryland, although they are the two of all others who should have called attention to this fact, ever thought of reading altogether the most flagrant violation of civil rights, if violation you choose to term it, that ever was attempted by soldiery. It was an order issued by a major-general of the United States Army to a general under his command. He is now the governor of New Jersey; and the Legislature that was dispersed under that order was the Legislature of Maryland. In citing the precedents both the Senator from New Jersey and the Senator from Maryland forgot to remember, or remembered to forget, that General George B. McClellan was the hero of that achievement.

Mr. RANDOLPH. May I answer the Senator?

Mr. BLAINE. Certainly, if the President will permit me.

Mr. RANDOLPH. The Senator from New Jersey, speaking for himself and not for the Senator from Maryland, has this to say: that he presumed that this enlightened body of Senators did not want to have repeated to them what had been already iterated and reiterated elsewhere upon this very subject. That was one reason.

Mr. BLAINE. That principle of exclusion might have taken a great deal more out of the Senator's speech.

Mr. RANDOLPH. There is another reason. When Governor McClellan, then General McClellan, issued the order that the Senator from Maine now speaks of, he was acting under the orders of a republican administration, and as a faithful and loyal soldier he did that which he was directed to do. It is only another evidence, Mr. President, of the necessity for having the military subordinated to the civil power, in my judgment. The fact that so good, and so faithful, and so loyal a man as Governor McClellan now is, and was then, so law-abiding a man as he, should have been constrained to the issue of that order, which I certainly never have indorsed, is only an illustration of the necessity of prescribing by law the proper rule which none shall be at liberty to violate.

Mr. BLAINE. On what authority does the Senator from New Jersey state that General McClellan issued this order by direction of any man superior to him?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Because he was under the direction, as the Senator from Maine knows, of the Commander-in-Chief of the Army.

Mr. BLAINE. Of course he was. He was under the direction of the Commander-in-Chief of the Army, and in that sense he never fought a battle, if the Senator carries out his logic. Upon what authority does the Senator from New Jersey state that in issuing that order General McClellan any more acted by specific direction of President Lincoln than when he fought the battle of Antietam?

Mr. RANDOLPH. I have stated that he did it under authority. Does the Senator from Maine deny that?

Mr. BLAINE. It is not for me to deny; it is for the Senator to substantiate.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I have asserted it.

Mr. BLAINE. It is for the Senator to substantiate a great public fact, and no private opinion of that kind will weigh against a public record.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I deny the right of the Senator from Maine or any other Senator on this floor to put in question my assertion.

Mr. BLAINE. Ah! the Senator cannot drift it off in that way. I asked him in regard to a great public act which he states was done by the authority of President Lincoln directing his commanding general. I ask him his authority, and then he asks me if I am questioning his veracity. The Senator cannot escape in that way. The question of personal veracity is not here; it is a question of great historic truth, and the Senator has no right to obtrude a question of personal veracity. That is not in the case.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I have made my statement.

Mr. BLAINE. Show the public record.

Mr. GROOME. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Maine yield?

Mr. BLAINE. I do.

Mr. GROOME. When I was summing up the outrages committed on the people of Maryland by the military arm of the General Government during the war I mentioned among the chief of them the arrest of the Maryland Legislature in 1861, an act which was utterly unjustifiable and for which there was no possible pretext, because before the arrest of that Legislature it had been proposed, upon a petition from Prince George's County, that an ordinance of secession should be passed by that Legislature, and upon the very day that the proposition came into the Legislature the committee on Federal relations reported against it, and by a vote of 53 to 13 it was decided that they had no authority to pass such an ordinance, indicating thereby in the plainest manner that there was no danger from any action of the Maryland Legislature looking to an attempt to sever the relations of the State of Maryland to our Union.

Mr. BLAINE. May I, with the permission of the Senator, ask him a question now?

Mr. GROOME. One single moment till I finish, sir. I want to say that so far as I am concerned (and I hope it is the view of every Senator on this floor) I denounce military usurpation just as strongly, just as firmly, just as determinedly, whether the usurper be a democrat or a republican. I stand upon the principle, and I stop not for one moment to inquire whether my blow, when I make my denunciation, falls on the head of an honored democrat or upon the head of a republican.

Mr. BLAINE. The Senator need not take up the afternoon. I yielded for a question.

Mr. GROOME. Well, I am done, sir.

Mr. BLAINE. Now, if the Senator will answer my question, can he state whether General McClellan knew that the Legislature had decided by 53 to 13 to remain loyal when he ordered its arrest and disbandment?

Mr. GROOME. I can only answer that it was a matter of public notoriety and general knowledge.

Mr. BLAINE. I noticed the other day in looking over the honorable Senator's speech—I may have done him injustice in not seeing that he referred to this—that he omitted to quote this while he quoted a great many other documents. I do not think he quoted the letter of General McClellan; I do not think any democratic Senator on this floor has quoted it, and lest injustice might be done to the honorable governor of New Jersey, of whom certainly I would not speak in any other than respectful terms, for personally our relations have always been kindly, I will read his letter:

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF THE POTOMAC,
Washington, September 12, 1861.

GENERAL: After full consultation with the President, Secretaries of State, War, &c., it has been decided to effect the operation proposed for the 17th—

That rather looks as though General McClellan had "proposed it" in advance and entered subsequently into council with the Secretaries of War and State and the President. He goes on to say:

Arrangements have been made to have a Government steamer at Annapolis to receive the prisoners and carry them to their destination.

Some four or five of the chief men in the affair are to be arrested to-day. When they meet on the 17th you will please have everything prepared to arrest the whole party, and be sure that none escape.

How well General McClellan happened to know the democrats of the Maryland Legislature at that time; he was not going to trust one of them outside and at large.

It is understood that you arrange with General Dix and Governor Seward the modus operandi. It has been intimated to me that the meeting might take place on the 14th; please be prepared. I would be glad to have you advise me frequently of your arrangements in regard to this very important matter.

If it is successfully carried out it will go far toward breaking the back-bone of the rebellion. It would probably be well to have a special train quietly prepared to take prisoners to Annapolis.

The Legislature was then in session at Frederick.

I leave this exceedingly important affair to your tact and discretion and have but one thing to impress upon you—the absolute necessity of secrecy and success.

With the highest regard, I am, my dear general, your sincere friend,

GEO. B. McCLELLAN,
Major-General United States Army.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. BLAINE. Certainly.

Mr. MORGAN. The date of the order the Senator has just read is September 12, 1861. I ask him to glance a few lines immediately above, on the same page of the same book, and see whether he will not find the following:

Secretary of War to General Banks.

WAR DEPARTMENT, September 11, 1861.

GENERAL: The passage of any act of secession by the Legislature of Maryland must be prevented. If necessary, all or any part of the members must be arrested. Exercise your own judgment as to the time and manner, but do the work effectually.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

SIMON CAMERON,
Secretary of War.

Mr. BLAINE. To whom was that addressed?

Mr. MORGAN. General Banks.

Mr. BLAINE. Not to General McClellan?

Mr. MORGAN. No.

Mr. BLAINE. You do not show any order to General McClellan.

Mr. MORGAN. It was an order to General Banks.

Mr. BLAINE. He was a subordinate. General McClellan seemed so anxious then to have a finger in the pie that he stepped in. This order went from the Secretary of War to General Banks. If General McClellan had not heartily approved and been anxious to get into it, he would not have stated what he did in his order. Does not the honorable Senator from Alabama see that?

Mr. MORGAN. I really do not.

Mr. BLAINE. He is the only Senator, then, who does not.

Mr. MORGAN. I think there are a great many who see it as I do, a great many who see it as the Senator from Maine refuses to see it, when he knew perfectly well that this was the authority under which General McClellan acted.

Mr. BLAINE. Will the honorable Senator from Alabama state that a private communication from the Secretary of War to a subordinate brigadier was the authority on which the major-general commanding the Army acted?

Mr. MORGAN. In the letter the Senator from Maine read General McClellan says that after full consultation with the President, the Secretaries of State, War, &c., it had been "decided to effect the operation proposed for the 17th?"

Mr. BLAINE. Yes.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Now, may I ask the Senator from Maine a question?

Mr. BLAINE. Of course.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I should like to know whether the Senator from Maine cannot find in the opening sentence of the letter of General McClellan a full answer to the question he asked me a little while ago as to where this authority came from?

Mr. BLAINE. I cannot.

Mr. RANDOLPH. You cannot?

Mr. BLAINE. No, and I will read it again to show why you cannot. He says:

After full consultation with the President, Secretaries of State, War, &c., it has been decided to effect the operation proposed for the 17th.

He is writing to General Banks. Perhaps he and General McClellan had been talking about it, and General McClellan, probably wanting his back stiffened a little, carried the question to the White House, and there had the consultation. But the honorable Senator from New Jersey will not say that that proves that McClellan received the order or that he did not originate it.

But I do not intend to be further diverted. The question I rose to discuss was this: If Senators intend in good faith that the bayonet shall not be present at the ballot-box, that the bowie-knife shall not be present at the ballot-box, that the revolver and shot-gun shall not be present at the ballot-box, let them say so. If you do not say so, the people of the United States will understand that you want to warn the Government of the United States off the ground where a Federal election is being held, and that the power of the United States being warned off, you will take care, as was taken care last year in South Carolina, by violence and threats and weapons and blood, to see that the democratic party carries the election. If you mean to have a peaceful election, say that no man shall go near those polls with shot-gun, revolver, or bowie-knife. Do not say that the United States alone, the party alone competent to keep the peace, shall not be there, but that every bloody-minded ruffian who wishes to assault an innocent and honest voter shall have free and absolute liberty to do as he chooses.

Mr. President, I was struck yesterday with the speech of the honorable Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DAVIS,] whom I do not now see in his seat. I was struck by the graceful manner in which he poised first on one side and then on the other, and at the very remarkable exactness with which he finally lighted on the democratic side of the fence. I sincerely wish the honorable Senator were here, I should like to ask him a question. He says that we should stop all this agitation—that, I suppose, was addressed to the democrats, for the republicans did not begin it. He says we should stop all this and attend to something for the relief of the country. The honorable Senator has been here now for over two years; this is his third year. What bill has he proposed for the relief of the country? What Senator is listened to with more respect than he is? What Senator can command the attention of the Senate more than he? And when he tells us to stop all this and go to work legislating for the good of the country, we are waiting to hear what the honorable Senator proposes. But I deny to him—I again sincerely regret he is not here that I could deny it before him—I deny to him the right to carry the traditions and the fame and the glory and the grandeur of Abraham Lincoln into the democratic camp. He may go there himself; he may sit on the side of the Chamber where he is the only man who gave Mr. Lincoln a support, but he cannot carry Mr. Lincoln's principles, or his great fame, with him. Had Mr. Lincoln lived, as the honorable Senator was saying yesterday, some things might have happened and other things might not have happened. But I can tell him of the things that might have happened that would most have surprised Mr. Lincoln would have been a Senator on this floor elected by the democratic party of Illinois over a Union general who was a republican and coming here with that record behind him to represent the principles of Abraham Lincoln! No, sir, the honorable Senator has the right to go where he pleases and when he pleases; he has the right to address to the living what arguments he chooses and whatever he may think proper; but he has no right, with the record of the great man of these last ten centuries made up into history, to drag him into the mire of the party to which, in all the mutations of American politics, Abraham Lincoln was opposed to the death.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. WALLACE. I ask that the vacancies upon the Committees on Military Affairs, Mines and Mining, and Transportation Routes to the Seaboard, be filled by the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks leave to submit a motion at this time that the vacancies in the committees he has designated may be filled by the Chair. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The Senate has heard the motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair appoints the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. HAMPTON] to fill the vacancies on the several committees named.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at five o'clock and twenty minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, April 23, 1879.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

SMOKING IN THE HALL.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to have read the latter clause of Rule 65.

The Clerk read as follows:

Smoking is prohibited within the bar of the House or gallery.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has thus far refrained from directing the attention of members of the House to this subject, in the hope that without being reminded of the rule they would see the necessity of abstaining from smoking in the Hall of the House; but to-day the Chair has been requested not to delay any longer to remind members of the existence of this rule. Those who do not smoke complain that members smoke in their seats on the floor. The Sergeant-at-Arms and his deputies will hereafter notify gentlemen who are seen smoking in the Hall that it is in violation of the rules.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. OSCAR TURNER. Mr. Speaker, in the New York Herald of the 19th of April last, there appears a letter from their correspondent dated 18th of April, purporting to give an account of the debate in the House of Representatives on that day, in which he says "Mr. TURNER, a Kentucky democrat, arose several times and shook his fist at Mr. McKINLEY and Mr. BURROWS," and makes still further severe comments upon the action of "Mr. TURNER" in interrupting Mr. MCKINLEY and Mr. BURROWS, members of this House, which I do not care to repeat and make part of the record. Now, I desire to say that I was not present during the remarks of either Mr. MCKINLEY or Mr. BURROWS, being in a committee-room, and I did not interrupt either of them in any way whatever, as both of these gentlemen know. My relations with members of this House have always been pleasant during the short time I have been here. I have never violated parliamentary usage and that courtesy which exists among gentlemen, in my life, and I do not wish to be placed in a false position before the country. I should not have noticed the letter, but it was shown to me by some friends, who thought it referred to me. If the correspondent alluded to my colleague, Mr. THOMAS TURNER, who is in his seat and who is a "democrat from Kentucky," he ought to have said so; and I hope he will correct his reference. I hope that hereafter he and other reporters will remember that there are two "TURNERS" from Kentucky, both democrats, and will do me the favor to designate which they refer to by name. [Laughter.] Mr. Speaker, I should not have referred to this matter at all but for the fact that the article to which I have referred has been copied in Saint Louis papers, which are papers of importance, and circulate all over my district and State. These papers have been sent to me by friends, inquiring what circumstances of an unusual character had occurred to so excite me. I owe an apology to the House for thus consuming its time.

Mr. THOMAS TURNER. Mr. Speaker, the action of my respected colleague and kinsman makes it incumbent on me to rise to a question of personal privilege for the first time, which otherwise I should not have done. Let me assure him that nothing that such correspondents say of us can injure us where we or they are known.

I am the "Mr. TURNER" alluded to in the correspondence to which my colleague has referred. It reads thus:

> The House was tolerably disorderly to-day; but it was noticed that Mr. CONGER, the eminent Michigander, was refreshingly quiet. Mr. TURNER, a Kentucky democrat, took his place, but could not fill it. He arose several times and shook his fist at Mr. MCKINLEY and Mr. BURROWS, and howled.

I also find in the Saint Louis Globe-Democrat of the 19th instant that the special correspondent of that paper uses this language:

> Mr. TURNER, of Kentucky, who had been shaking his long arm and brawny fist, shouted, "You are a damned liar," in response to something uttered by Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan.

And the same issue of the Globe-Democrat contains a lying editorial based on the communication of its correspondent, written I suppose by its shaved-head culprit editor fresh from the jail where he was recently confined for defrauding the Government. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. Speaker, it is utterly untrue that I shook my fist at either Mr. MCKINLEY, of Ohio, or Mr. BURROWS, of Michigan, or any one else at any time.

The plain unvarnished facts are these: The member from Ohio, [Mr. MCKINLEY,] in quoting from a speech of my colleague, Mr. BLACKBURN, stopped in the middle of a sentence, and when asked by Mr. BLACKBURN, who was presiding over the committee, to read the balance of the sentence, so as to show its true meaning, declined to do so, saying he had not the speech before him. Mr. BLACKBURN then proposed to furnish the speech, and sent it by a page to the member from Ohio, with pencil-marks indicating the part of the sentence omitted, and the member from Ohio declined to read the balance of the sentence, and afterward, when castigated by Mr. BLACKBURN for his unfairness, attempted to exonerate himself by saying he had read all that was in the printed extract before him; and at this point I, in that earnest and emphatic manner which is a part of my nature and which I cannot repress, [laughter,] asked him, if he meant fairness, why, when he made and printed the extract, he had not excerpted the whole sentence.

I understood the member from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] to say in his speech that all the democratic members were traitors and conspiring to overturn the Government. I hope that in the noise and confusion I misheard him. I was a Union man in a section where to be such was not the road to Government contracts or political preferment, but entailed poverty and the sacrifice of public position. When, shortly after, the member from Michigan asked the unanimous consent of the House to continue his remarks beyond his allotted time I objected, and supported that objection by a statement that one who had indulged in such language was not entitled to the courtesy of the democrats of the House or of the country. I stand by what I said and am responsible for it here or elsewhere. [Laughter.] I did not say the member from Michigan was a "liar" or a "damned liar." I have too high a regard for personal and parliamentary amenities and decorum to indulge in such language. The correspondent who wrote this was trying to promote the member from Michigan, and had not honor and moral sense enough to understand that he was placing that member in a more unenviable light than he was me—in the position of having been publicly denounced as a "damned liar" and tamely submitting to it. I would rather have been the denouncer than the poltroon who would submit to it—if it had occurred. [Laughter.]

Besides this, during the last session the correspondent of the New York Tribune stated that I was intoxicated on the floor of the House. No correspondent, or man, or woman ever saw me intoxicated on the floor of the House or elsewhere. At the time that charge was made I had not seen or tasted a drop of spirits for three days, [laughter,] and was not aware that any could be obtained within the walls of the Capitol. [Renewed laughter.] Some other correspondent charged me with shaking my fist in the face of the member from Pennsylvania, [General WHITE.] This was not true. In the midst of an exciting debate, when many members were addressing the Chair at once and the presiding officer had ordered them all to take their seats, and the member from Pennsylvania and others did not obey the order, but kept on speaking, although not entitled to the floor, I advanced near to the Speaker's stand and General WHITE, and in an emphatic manner demanded that the Speaker restore order; that he should call the Sergeant-at-Arms and cause him to compel those out of order to obey him and take their seats. And I succeeded in having this done. The gentleman from Pennsylvania and I are and were good friends; and he will bear witness that I did not shake my fist at him or menace him, [laughter,] but was in a perfectly good humor, though determined to have order restored.

It perhaps would have been better if the framers of the Constitution had confided the selection of members of Congress to these correspondents and to the owners of the venal sheets they represent than to the people; but as that has not been done these correspondents and their employers must "accept the situation." [Laughter.]

None of these correspondents have any personal motives to slander me; and if they have erred unintentionally and are gentlemen, they will make the amende. But if the force of habit disables them from refraining from falsehood, [laughter,] or if they are required by their employers to lie and their pay is graduated and increased according to the scale of their mendacity, [renewed laughter,] it may become necessary in order to protect the members and the respectable correspondents, and most of them are gentlemen of culture, intelligence, and veracity, that we should deny the privilege of the reporters' gallery to these hired political Hessians and slanderers who have thus attacked the members of this House without regard to truth. [Laughter and applause.]

REVOLUTIONARY PENSIONS COMMITTEE.

Mr. WHITEAKER, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee of Accounts;

Resolved, That the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions and the War of 1812 be allowed a clerk during the sessions of this Congress to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House at the same rate paid other committee clerks.

COMMITTEE ON MANUFACTURES.

Mr. WISE, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee of Accounts:

> Whereas the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture certifies that his committee will require the services of the clerk appointed by him all the time and that he will have no time to devote to the Committees on Manufactures and Militia; Therefore,
> Resolved, That the House authorize the chairman of said committee to select a clerk and that he receive the same per diem pay as the clerks allowed by the Committee of Accounts out of the contingent fund of the House.

NEGRO EXODUS.

Mr. HASKELL. Mr. Speaker, I hold in my hand a communication from the governor of my State in reference to the late negro exodus from the South, giving a few facts as to their condition, and I ask unanimous consent of the House that it be read at the Clerk's desk and be referred for the information of the Committee on Appropriations to be taken into consideration in connection with the bill on that subject presented the other day by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. COX. Yes; I object.

CLAIMS BEFORE 1861.

Mr. VANCE. Mr. Speaker, I was unable to be present on Monday last on account of illness, and I now ask by unanimous consent to present some bills for reference.

There was no objection.

Mr. VANCE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1344) to repeal section 3480 of the Revised Statutes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

ILLICIT DISTILLATION.

Mr. VANCE also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1345) to authorize the circuit and district judges of the United States courts to fine and imprison at discretion in case of conviction for illicit distillation in lieu of the punishment now required by law, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

TAX ON STATE BANKS.

Mr. VANCE also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1346) to repeal so much of the internal-revenue law as requires persons in State banking associations to pay a tax of 10 per cent. on the circulating issue of any State bank, and to punish national banks for accepting a usurious rate of interest; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

EDWARD KOLB.

Mr. VANCE also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1347) for the relief of Edward Kolb, of Washington City, District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

SIOUX CITY AND PEMBINA RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. BENNETT, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1348) granting right of way and depot grounds to the Sioux City and Pembina Railroad Company through the public lands of the United States from Beloit, in the State of Iowa, to the Missouri River, in the Territory of Dakota, at or near the mouth of White River; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

ADMISSION TO THE FLOOR.

Mr. FARR. Mr. Speaker, I ask by unanimous consent that the speaker of the house of representatives of the State of New Hampshire be admitted to the floor during the remainder of this week.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

MORNING HOUR.

Mr. DUNNELL. I now demand the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is the morning hour, which begins at thirty minutes after twelve o'clock m., and the call of committees for reports rests with the Committee on Appropriations.

NATIONAL LAFAYETTE AND BANK OF COMMERCE OF CINCINNATI, OHIO.

Mr. BUCKNER, from the Committee on Banking and Currency, reported back a bill (S. No. 218) changing the name of the National Bank of Commerce of Cincinnati, Ohio, to the National Lafayette and Bank of Commerce of Cincinnati, Ohio, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill, which was read, provides that the name of the National Bank of Commerce of Cincinnati, Ohio, located in the city of Cincinnati, in the county of Hamilton and State of Ohio, shall be changed to the National Lafayette and Bank of Commerce of Cincinnati, Ohio, whenever the board of directors of said bank shall accept the new name by resolution of the board, and cause a copy of said resolution, duly authenticated, to be filed with the Comptroller of the Currency, provided that such acceptance be made within nine months after the passage of the act, and that all expenses incident to such change, including engraving, shall be borne and paid by said bank.

The second section provides that all the debts, demands, liabilities, rights, privileges, and powers of the National Bank of Commerce of Cincinnati, Ohio, shall devolve upon and inure to the National Lafayette and Bank of Commerce of Cincinnati, Ohio, whenever such change of name is effected.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BUCKNER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CRAVENS. If the call of committees has been gone through with, then I desire to offer a resolution in reference to civil-service reform.

The SPEAKER. The call of committees has not been concluded.

Mr. CRAVENS. I ask unanimous consent at this time, then, to submit some resolutions.

The SPEAKER. That cannot be done at the present time.

DEPOSIT OF COIN IN THE TREASURY.

Mr. WARNER, from the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 564) to amend certain sections of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to coinage and the deposit of coin and bullion in the Treasury for certificates, with the recommendation that the bill be printed so as to show the words intended to be stricken out and the words intended to be added, and then that the bill be recommitted.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection, and the bill will be reprinted as indicated by the gentleman from Ohio and recommitted to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, not to come back on a motion to reconsider.

DEPRESSED CONDITION OF LABOR COMMITTEE.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I have been directed by the select committee to inquire into the causes of the present depression of labor to submit the following resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the select committee to inquire into the causes of the present depression of labor be permitted to sit during the recess of Congress, and that they be allowed to subpœna and examine witnesses; and that to defray necessary expenses incurred, the sum of $3,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated out of the contingent fund of the House of Representatives.

Mr. CONGER. That should go to the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan submits a point of order that this makes an appropriation and should have its first consideration in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, it is an ordinary resolution from the committee having charge of this special subject.

The SPEAKER. The proposition then is to pay out of the contingent fund of the House. The resolution does not appropriate the money, as the money is already appropriated subject to the order of the House.

Mr. CONGER. It gives this committee leave to sit during the vacation and confers upon that committee additional power. I suppose it is open to objection.

The SPEAKER. It comes in here properly as a report from the committee on the regular call of committees. Does the gentleman make further objection?

Mr. CONGER. I have nothing further to say.

The SPEAKER. This comes regularly as a report from the committee and the question is on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. WILSON. Let the resolution be read again.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. CONGER. I thought this was a simple resolution and when it was read I was misled as it did not appear that it came in as a report from any committee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair suggests that the resolution should state "to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House."

Mr. WRIGHT. Let it be so modified.

Mr. McCOOK. Let me ask, Mr. Speaker, whether an appropriation was made to pay the expenses of such an investigation in a former House?

The SPEAKER. The expenses of that committee were provided for in the appropriation bill.

Mr. McCOOK. Perhaps the Chair is correct.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is under the impression that the payment of witnesses and other expenses of that committee were provided for in the sundry civil appropriation bill.

Mr. McCOOK. If so, I see no necessity, then, for an appropriation now.

The SPEAKER. The probability is that amount has been exhausted.

Mr. RICE. I think there was no appropriation made.

Mr. COX. Has any report been made by that committee?

Mr. RICE. I think there was no appropriation made, but the committee was authorized to sit during the recess.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk estimated for the expenses of that committee, and the amount was embraced in the appropriation for the contingent fund of the House. The contingent fund was increased to an amount necessary to cover the expenses of that committee.

Mr. CONGER. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether the testimony taken by the previous committee has yet been printed?

Mr. RICE. The testimony taken before the last committee has been printed.

Mr. CONGER. Has any report been made by that committee?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is advised that the testimony has been printed. The gentleman from New York [Mr. Hewitt] of the last Congress was allowed the privilege of filing the report. Whether it has been filed or not the Chair is unable to say.

Mr. BAKER. I desire to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania a question.

Mr. COX. Was any appropriation made for printing that report?

The SPEAKER. It came out of the general appropriation for printing.

Mr. BAKER. If the gentleman will permit me I should like to know what necessity exists at this time to authorize this committee to sit during the recess. It seems to me that question had better come up at the close of the session rather than now. Then the House will be able to determine whether or not there is any occasion for it.

Mr. WRIGHT. I can answer the gentleman. If there has been a committee appointed by this House intrusted with the consideration of any subject worthy of investigation that is the one provided for in the pending resolution. In order to examine into the whole matter it becomes necessary there should be witnesses called and the opinions of men taken with regard to the causes of the distress and depression of labor in this country at this time. This is a very small sum, not much larger than we pay a clerk appointed to a committee or a man in the employment of the House. It is always the case whenever there is a motion made here or an offer to do something in the way of inquiry in regard to the distress of the country, opposition is made to it. This morning you could pass a bill to change the name of a national bank; that is sacred; but when we follow that with a resolution to bring witnesses before my committee to make examination into the subject of the distress and depression of labor in the country it is met at the threshold with opposition. I tell you, sir, t is wrong, that there is an attempt to suppress an inquiry into the business affairs of this country as far as they affect this question. If it does not take the $3,000 I can tell the gentleman that fund will be carefully taken care of. There is no speculation in it, but it is for an honest purpose. It is right and proper that the inquiry into that important matter should be made, and I insist upon the passage of the resolution.

Mr. BAKER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him another question?

Mr. WRIGHT. Yes, sir.

Mr. BAKER. My question is whether or not if the House authorizes this committee like the wandering Jew to travel all over this land this sum of $3,000 will be sufficient, or whether it is just the first drop in the bucket that they will be holding out to the Treasury to be filled in order to meet their wants.

Mr. WRIGHT. Well sir, if we have a wandering Jew who can ferret out this great and important question in a way that will have a tendency to relieve the sufferings of the laboring-men of the country, the time has come to commission that wandering Jew to see if it cannot be ascertained how it is and why it is the laboring-men of this country are undergoing the trials and tribulations they are undergoing at this moment.

Mr. BAKER. I wish to say I have no objection to the gentleman going on his wanderings, but I should regret very much that we should miss the genial countenance of my friend from Pennsylvania and those of the other members of his committee during the session of Congress. I trust they will remain with us and prosecute their labors, and when we are near the close of this session of Congress——

Mr. WILSON. What objection have you to giving this authority now?

Mr. BAKER. We do not know it may be necessary. The committee may accomplish all they desire without traveling over the country. And if when the session is near its close we find it is necessary to send this committee over the country, I trust I will be found as willing as any one that the light of their countenances should beam over all parts of the country.

Mr. WRIGHT. I desire to ask the gentleman from Indiana a question. When does he suppose that the present session of this Congress will end? And let me ask him another question.

Mr. BAKER. One at a time. Let me answer your first question.

Mr. WRIGHT. I ask him if he supposes there will be in this session a single act passed that will benefit the country?

Mr. FORT. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks when this session will end. As soon as this House passes the appropriation bills it can adjourn.

Mr. BAKER. I believe there is no need of our being in session more than forty-eight hours if that side of the House will attend to the business for which they were brought here. But if they go on as they have been going on, I apprehend the period during which under the Constitution we can sit here will expire before we disperse without anything being accomplished to relieve the depression of labor.

Mr. WRIGHT. Let me say to the gentleman that this session of Congress should never have been called; and since it has been it is merely for the passage of laws that benefit a class, and a class only.

Mr. BAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania believe there is no need of appropriations to carry on the great Departments of the Government? Is that what he means?

Mr. WRIGHT. To carry on the Departments of the Government?

Mr. BAKER. I understood the gentleman to say there was no need of our being called together. And yet the last Congress left the Government in a condition that, if this Congress had not been called together and if the necessary laws are not enacted by the present Congress, it would perish for means of support. And yet he says there was no need of the extra session of Congress.

Mr. HEILMAN. It seems to me that this is a proposition to rob the Government of $3,000. I hope my friend from Pennsylvania will have the good sense to let the financial question alone. The thing is regulating itself very fast. I can say that the business of the West, manufacturing interests and all, is improving rapidly; and if Congress will let the financial question alone it will regulate itself. [Applause.]

Mr. DUNNELL. I hope there will be no serious objection to the passage of the resolution reported by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. The amount of money asked for is very small. The depression of labor in this country has been serious and long-continued. I am not very certain that any light will be discovered by the committee; but I certainly hope that this side of the House will not object to the appropriation of that small sum of money, and that we will have a report. Let me express the hope that this committee, when thus authorized to investigate, will have force enough in itself to give us a written report. The committee of last year did not do itself or the House justice, by failing to report the result of its investigations. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will assure this House, I have no doubt, that he will give a report.

Mr. WRIGHT. Certainly I will.

Mr. DUNNELL. That is what I want, and I hope there will be no objection to the resolution.

Mr. WRIGHT. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. MONEY. I ask that the resolution may be again read.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. RICE. I desire to make a brief explanation in response to the remarks of the gentleman from Minnesota.

The SPEAKER. The previous question has been ordered. But if there be no objection the gentleman from Massachusetts will be permitted to make a brief explanation.

There was no objection.

Mr. RICE. I was a member of the committee of the last Congress to inquire into the causes of the depression of labor, of which Mr. Hewitt, of New York, was chairman. I think there was no appropriation made for the expenses of that committee. They were paid, however, from the contingent fund of the House the expenses actually incurred. The testimony was reported to the House. The chairman of the committee had so many other engagements on the Committee on Appropriations that he was unable to complete the very thorough report which was under preparation. He obtained permission to complete that report and have it printed with the testimony; and when that report is finished I believe that the member from Minnesota will have no occasion to complain that the duty of the committee has not been faithfully and fully performed.

Mr. DUNNELL. I am glad the gentleman from Massachusetts has had the opportunity of saying this much. I was, perhaps, too severe in my language, not remembering for a moment that the gentleman from New York [Mr. Hewitt] who was chairman of this committee in the last Congress had great labors imposed upon him as a member of the Committee on Appropriations.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the expenses of the committee were paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Mr. COX. The House refused to pay the expenses of the committee when the matter was brought before the House; and I wish that the whole matter could be stopped. It does not do any good.

Mr. PRICE. Not a bit of good.

The SPEAKER. Nevertheless, the witnesses were paid out of the contingent fund.

The question was put upon the adoption of the resolution; and on a division there were—ayes 95, noes 54.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered, only fifteen members voting therefor.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The call of committees for reports having now been concluded, the unfinished business pending before the House will be taken up. The Clerk will read the first resolution pending.

DISTRIBUTION OF DOCUMENTS.

The Clerk read the resolution presented by Mr. GARFIELD on the 19th of March, as follows:

Resolved, That the House documents of the Forty-fifth Congress not yet distributed be delivered to members of the present House.

Mr. DUNNELL. I offer the following as a substitute for the pending resolution:

Resolved, That the books and documents hereafter received in the folding-room of the House of Representatives be placed to the credit of the present members of the House with the following exceptions: One book or document of each kind shall be subject to the order of the members of the last House, and all bound volumes of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the Forty-fifth Congress, all the memorial addresses except one on the life and character of the late members of the Forty-fifth Congress, and also those except one on the life and character of Professor Henry, shall be subject to the order of the members of the last House.

I trust that the substitute which I have just presented will meet the views of the House. I have shown it to some gentlemen who objected to it when it was first introduced, and on a more careful reading they are satisfied that it does justice to members of the last House while it substantially gives all books hereafter to be put into the folding-room of the House of Representatives to be subject to the order of members of the present Congress. I hope there will be no objection to it, and I ask for its adoption.

Mr. THOMPSON. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DUNNELL] submitted this amendment to several gentlemen on this side of the House, and after a consultation among members those interested in this matter have agreed to accept it. We think that the retired members ought to have some of the books, and this resolution will give them only what is their right; therefore we accept it, and I hope there will be no opposition to the amendment.

Mr. VOORHIS. I would suggest to the gentleman that the books which have been given to those members who have gone out of office have been put into the market, and it appears to me that the proposition of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DUNNELL] is to put all the documents now in the folding-room of the House of Representatives into the market instead of giving them to the people of those districts to which the members belonged.

Mr. DUNNELL. It is hardly fair to assume that the last Congress was less virtuous than this House, or that this Congress will be better than its predecessors.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 96, noes not counted.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The resolution, as amended, was then adopted.

Mr. DUNNELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PRINTING OF A DOCUMENT.

The Clerk read the next resolution, offered by Mr. PRICE on the 27th of March, as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed 5,000 copies of public act No. 90, third session, Forty-fifth Congress, entitled "An act making appropriations for the payment of arrears of pensions," approved January 25, 1879.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. PRICE moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The next business in order during the morning hour is the call of States and Territories for resolutions under Rule 52.

TREATY WITH FRANCE.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President be respectfully requested to consider the expediency of entering into a convention with the government of France for the negotiation of a treaty which shall secure a more equal interchange of the products and manufactures of each country and serve to cement closer relations of amity, trade, and commerce.

Unless some one desires to discuss the resolution, I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered, and under the operation thereof the resolution was agreed to—ayes 82, noes not counted.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NAVAL ACADEMY.

Mr. WILSON submitted the following resolution, upon which he called the previous question:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be requested to report to this House the condition of the Naval Academy as it regards the probable number of midshipmen who will enter the Navy during the present year; the entire number of midshipmen in the Navy, whether or not the number is sufficient for the service; and his opinion as to whether or not the presidential power of appointment of cadets should be restored.

The question was taken upon seconding the previous question; and upon a division there were—ayes 34, noes 15.

No further count being called for, the previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. WILSON. By unanimous consent I will strike out so much of the resolution as calls for the opinion of the Secretary of the Navy as to whether the presidential power of appointment should be restored. I desire simply to ascertain the condition of the Naval Academy.

There was no objection, and the resolution was modified accordingly.

The question was taken upon agreeing to the resolution as modified; and upon a division there were—ayes 31, noes 66.

No further count being called for, the resolution was not agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. I do not know whether it is in order, but if it is I desire to offer another resolution.

The SPEAKER. That is not in order. The Chair will read the proviso to Rule 52:

Provided, That no member shall offer more than one resolution, or one series of resolutions, all relating to the same subject, until all the States and Territories shall have been called.

The Chair is advised that the practice which has heretofore prevailed has been to allow a member the privilege of offering but one resolution at a time, as this call is rarely ever reached.

Mr. WILSON. That is very acceptable to me. I will ask unanimous consent that the resolution I offered be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

There was no objection, and the resolution was referred accordingly.

ROBERT T. BLAYLOCK.

Mr. VANCE submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives be directed to pay out of the contingent fund of the House of Representatives one month's pay to Robert T. Blaylock, a page in the House in the Forty-fifth Congress.

AN ADDITIONAL PAGE OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. STEPHENS submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Doorkeeper of the House be authorized to employ an additional House page on the floor to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House for this session, making the number of pages twenty-nine instead of twenty-eight.

The question was upon the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. STEPHENS. Allow me one word in regard to this resolution. During the last Congress the Doorkeeper of the House was authorized to employ one additional page. The number allowed by law is twenty-eight. In the appropriation bill for the next fiscal year the number is fixed at twenty-nine. This little boy is now on the floor of the House serving as a page, and I ask that during this session he may be paid out of the contingent fund of the House. Hereafter the number of pages will be twenty-nine.

Mr. BAKER. With all respect for the gentleman from Georgia, I would suggest that this resolution should go to the Committee of Accounts.

Mr. STEPHENS. I have no objection to that if the House desires it; but I think the resolution had better be passed now.

Mr. BAKER. No harm will come of sending the resolution to the Committee of Accounts.

Mr. STEPHENS. I would rather that question would be submitted to the House.

Mr. BAKER. It would have to go over if I desired to debate it.

The SPEAKER. Not necessarily, if the gentleman from Georgia demands the previous question.

Mr. BAKER. As I was on the floor objecting to the resolution, I have a right to debate it, as I understand the rule.

The SPEAKER. Did the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] yield?

Mr. STEPHENS. I had not yielded the floor. But I want no question upon the matter; I will let it go the Committee of Accounts.

Mr. BAKER. As I understand the rules——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia had the right to demand the previous question.

Mr. BAKER. I do not understand the rule to be that by demanding the previous question the privilege of any member to have the resolution put over by rising to debate it can be cut off.

The SPEAKER. The rule will be read, and the gentleman will then see whether he has that right or not.

Mr. BAKER. I simply speak from recollection.

The Clerk read as follows:

It is a common practice, when a resolution is submitted, for the mover to immediately demand the previous question, which, if ordered, will prevent debate and bring the House to a direct vote on the resolution, thus avoiding the necessity of its lying over, as would be the case if debate should arise.

The SPEAKER. That is the practice under the rule.

Mr. BAKER. I desire to have Rule 52 read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Reports from committees having been presented and disposed of, the Speaker shall call for resolutions from the members of each State and Delegate from each Territory, beginning with Maine and the Territory last organized, alternately; and they shall not be debated on the very day of their being presented, nor on any day assigned by the House for the receipt of resolutions, unless where the House shall direct otherwise, but shall lie on the table, to be taken up in the order in which they were presented; and if on any day the whole of the States and Territories shall not be called, the Speaker shall begin on the next day where he left off the previous day: Provided, That no member shall offer more than one resolution, or one series of resolutions, all relating to the same subject, until all the States and Territories shall have been called.

The SPEAKER. The first branch of the rule relates to reports from committees. In regard to the second branch the practice has been uniform, so far as the Chair is advised, to allow the member presenting a resolution to call the previous question. If the House desires debate upon it, it will vote down the previous question.

Some time subsequently,

Mr. BAKER said: I withdraw my objection to the resolution offered by the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS.]

The question was upon adopting the resolution.

Mr. STEPHENS. I will state again the object of the resolution.

Mr. FORT. I hope that the gentleman will allow the resolution to be referred to the Committee of Accounts. If that committee reports favorably, there certainly will be no objection to it.

Mr. STEPHENS. That is just what the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BAKER] desired, and afterward withdrew his objection to the resolution.

Mr. FORT. I know that, but I think the resolution should be referred.

Mr. STEPHENS. Let it go to the Committee of Accounts, then.

The resolution was accordingly referred to the Committee of Accounts.

EXECUTIVE INFORMATION.

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That it shall be in order, immediately after the reading of the Journal every morning, for any member of the House to offer a resolution calling on the Executive or any of the heads of Departments for information, and said resolution shall be acted upon by the House at once without debate.

Mr. CALKINS. I make the point of order that under the rules this resolution must lie over one day.

The SPEAKER. The Committee on Rules already have this subject under consideration.

Mr. BAKER. I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DAVIS] does not object to the reference.

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. Let it be referred.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Rules.

CALL OF THE ROLL.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. I offer the following resolution, on which I call the previous question:

Resolved, That in calling the roll of the House the Clerk shall call only the surname of members, with the prefix of "Mr.," except where there are two or more of the same surname, in which case the full name of such members shall be called.

Mr. FORT. Does not this go to the Committee on Rules?

Mr. CONGER. I object to the consideration of this resolution to-day.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. I insist on my right to demand the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman's right.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. But if it is the desire of members, I will consent that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Rules.

Several MEMBERS. That is right.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. FORT. I would have no objection to considering it now, but I think the resolution ought to be modified by striking out the words, "with the prefix of Mr." I do not see the necessity of that.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Rules.

CLAIMS AGAINST NICARAGUA.

Mr. ACKLEN. I offer the resolution which I send to the desk, and on its adoption demand the previous question.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That a select committee of five members of this House be appointed by the Speaker, which committee shall have power to sit during the recess, to inquire into all claims of citizens of the United States against the government of Nicaragua for indemnity for lives of relatives taken, wounds and other personal injuries inflicted, and property taken, injured, or destroyed, which claims have heretofore been filed in the Department of State and now remain pending and unsatisfied; and said committee shall ascertain and determine what amounts and to what persons the government of Nicaragua is liable to make compensation on account thereof, and report the same, with the evidence in reference thereto, to Congress at its next session; and said committee shall give such public notice as it may deem necessary of the times and places when and where it will sit to hear said claims and testimony in support of the same, and shall have power to send for persons and papers, and administer oaths. It shall also obtain and use all proofs relative thereto on file in the Department of State, and such other evidence as any party in interest may produce and offer that it may deem pertinent thereto. It shall have power to employ a clerk and a stenographer, and the necessary expenses of said committee shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House on the vouchers of the chairman of said committee.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. Speaker, has not the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired, and this resolution will go over.

Mr. ACKLEN. I merely ask that the resolution be printed and that its consideration go over until to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. It will go over until this class of business may be again reached.

Mr. ACKLEN. As I understand, it will come up as unfinished business in the next morning hour.

Mr. CONGER. Let it come up when this class of business is again reached.

The SPEAKER. That is the only proper time.

Mr. ACKLEN. I understand that if the resolution goes over it will come up as unfinished business in the next morning hour.

The SPEAKER. The rules regulate when the resolution will again come up.

Mr. CLYMER. There are a great many other members upon the floor who desire to introduce bills, and if the presentation of bills is to be general I should not object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CLYMER. I move the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of proceeding with the consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. BLACKBURN in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine is entitled to the floor.

Mr. FRYE Mr. Chairman, is there any foundation for these wholesale charges against Federal officers in their conduct of elections in the city of New York? Was there a condition of affairs in that city which rendered the intervention of the United States necessary? Has there been a wasteful expenditure of money in the attempt to correct election abuses there? Do the facts demand, as the other side insists, the repeal of the laws known as election laws, or do they fully justify their retention? These and kindred questions should be answered, not in any spirit of partisanship, but in truth and fairness. The safety of the Republic depends upon the purity of the ballot. Let us, then, view the great city, its condition, its population; glance hastily at its political record, and examine the remedies resorted to for its cure from political disease.

New York City has a population of about 1,100,000. It is sixteen and one-half miles long by an average of two and a half in width. Sixteen States only have a larger population than this city. About 45 per cent. is of foreign birth. Nearly one-half of the population reside between the Battery and Fourteenth street, on an area of 2,408 acres. About 55 per cent. of the people reside in 25,000 tenement houses, containing each four families and upward—605,000 in 25,000 houses. The Seventeenth ward in 1875, with an area of fifty-two one-hundredths of a square mile, contained more inhabitants than Louisville, Kentucky, or Cleveland, Ohio. Fourteen cities only in the United States contained more. The Eleventh, Thirteenth, and Seventeenth wards, with an area, including streets, of a little less than one square mile, had a population of 200,000, which, leaving out streets, would make 1,000 to the acre. Only seventeen States in the last presidential election cast more votes than this city. It polled more votes than Vermont, New Hampshire, and Rhode Island.

There were lodged at station houses in 1871, 136,743 persons; in 1872, 147,215 persons; in 1873, 183,854 persons; in 1874, 221,968 persons; in 1875, 217,552 persons; in 1876, 186,876 persons. There were arrested in 1871, 83,672; in 1872, 82,589; in 1873, 88,538; in 1874, 92,112; in 1875, 91,363; in 1876, 92,830.

With this great army of vagrants, criminals, depraved and desperate men; with a foreign population of males over the age of twenty-one, according to the census of 1875, of naturalized citizens, 141,179, aliens, 48,305, very many of whom know absolutely nothing of our institutions or the principles of our Government, are the mere dupes of designing, wicked politicians, in a city two-thirds of the time under the absolute dominion of the democratic party, that party which here to-day, by its demands for legislation on these two appropriation bills, allies itself with and indorses ku-klux, white-leaguers, tissue ballots, repeaters, false and fraudulent naturalization, ballot stuffing, and every other device for the destruction of all purity of the ballot, what may we expect? Let the past briefly speak.

ELECTION FRAUDS.

1837: A committee of the assembly in their report declare that "they were a disgrace to the State and a manifest wrong to the country."

1844: Through them alone the State was lost to Henry Clay.

1856: Another committee declare that the election is not at all the will of the people.

1858: Another committee declare "of late years fraud and simulating at the ballot-box have become extensive and enormous."

1860: In one election district, for 63 names registered no person could be found to represent them. Two Irish boys, sons of a widow, one six and the other eight, were registered. In the Twelfth ward 500 out of 3,500 names were fraudulent; Seventh ward, 935 names fraudulent, and so on.

1862: General Wadsworth, the Union candidate for governor, was defeated by Horatio Seymour, and it can be safely asserted that false registration, repeating, and an unscrupulous count in the city gave him more votes than he had majority in the whole State.

1863: The notorious Judge McCunn was elected by a deliberate manipulation of the votes.

1864: In the campaign of Lincoln and McClellan marvelous frauds had been set on foot by forged soldiers' names, officers' certificates, false papers bearing names of sick, disabled, and dead soldiers. Some of the parties concerned were arrested and tried before a military commission in Washington. The city was full of southern sympathizers, deserters, bounty-jumpers, thieves, and other desperate characters. The agents of the confederacy were in strong force on the Canadian border and in constant communication with their spies and allies in the city. Application was made to the authorities at Washington for protection, and General Butler with six thousand troops was sent forward. The election was peaceable.

1866: Tweed ring in full power, and its will law. Every form of fraud and violence was resorted to. And this in spite of the fact that Kennedy was at the head of the police. Careful examination of the registry lists disclosed over fifteen thousand names not to be found at the places they claimed to register from. This was the time when the republicans endeavored to hold a meeting in the City Park to be addressed by General Butler, Horace Greeley, and Governor Curtin. That attempt is historical. Such a scene was never before witnessed in New York. A howling, raving mob of democrats ruled the hour.

NATURALIZATION, 1866.

Up to this time naturalization had been reasonably legitimate, confined to two courts, the superior and the court of common pleas. Prior to this year the average number naturalized annually in these courts from 1857 to 1865, both inclusive, was fifty-six hundred and eighty-two—many more in the common pleas than in the superior; but Judge McCunn was to preside in the latter this year, with James M. Sweeney, clerk, and Judge Cardozo could be used in the former. Cardozo made citizens at the rate of eight hundred a day on some days—swore them in in squads; a single runner brought before him in one day nine squads, aggregating fifty-two, and swore them all through; at another time this same man brought in twenty, vouched for them all. The result was that these two courts made 13,023 citizens, the average before having been, as I said, less than six thousand. Let it in this connection be remembered that in 1844 in Louisiana—Judge Elliot presiding—four hundred certificates were granted in one day; that the attention of Congress was called to this glaring abuse of power; that a committee investigated and reported that it was impossible such a number could have been legally naturalized in a day. On their report the judge was impeached, convicted, and removed.

1867.

Frauds were stupendous; illegal registration and repeating seemed almost to be the rule. A careful revision of the lists was made, and thousands of names were found fraudulently entered—in the Eighth ward alone over fifteen hundred. Companies of men from New Jersey and Pennsylvania voted. Rum ran in streams; and riot, assaults, and murders were the order. The courts were started, and, as the Tribune said, they ground out citizens "at the rate of one thousand a day, with no more solemnity than and quite as much celerity as is displayed in converting swine into pork in a Cincinnati packing house." In the superior court alone nearly eleven thousand persons received their certificates.

1868—CAMPAIGN OF GRANT AND SEYMOUR—HOFFMAN DEMOCRATIC CANDIDATE FOR GOVERNOR.

False registration, forgery, fraudulent naturalization, repeating, and every fraud and crime against the elective franchise culminated. The courts were in league with the democrats to destroy the last vestige of purity at the ballot-box.

JUDICIAL CONDITION.

The court of common pleas, with honest judges, went out of business practically. The superior court, for this business, practically went into the control of Judge McCunn, fraudulently elected, now a candidate for re-election. The supreme court, never before having anything to do with naturalization, was presided over by Judge Barnard, also a candidate for re-election. These two judicial scoundrels stripped off their coats and prepared for business. Barnard, on the 6th of October, declared that he would attend to no other business than this until the next term. The ready courts must be provided with blanks, so that there should be no hitch in proceedings. The following table will show no neglect in this direction:

Superior court, October 2, received 10,000 certificates; October 3, received 10,000 applications; October 8, received 10,000 certificates; October 15, received 10,000 certificates; October 16, received 20,000 applications. Total applications, 30,000; total certificates, 30,000.

Tammany's headquarters for naturalization were at No. 1 Center street, in a lager-beer saloon. They were provided with a red ticket, forty thousand in number, reading thus:

No. ——.

Please naturalize the bearer.

M. D. GALE,
Chairman Naturalization Committee, Tammany Hall.

And this, presented to the clerk of court, was an order on Tammany for the fees.

PROCEEDINGS IN COURT.

I call your attention to the testimony of M. R. Leverson, a member of the United States bar, an intelligent man, (Reports of committees, third session, Fortieth Congress, volume 3, pages 120 to 140, inclusive;) and allow me to read portions of his graphic description:

Question. You were in the courts witnessing the naturalization of persons desiring to be naturalized?

Answer. Yes; I first went into a room in the basement of the old city-hall building, which used to be the sheriff's office. When I first went into it in the day-time there were about four gangs of four clerks to each gang, one of whom acted in what may be termed the capacity of foreman to each gang.

The foreman had before him a list of names and addresses, and he would keep the other three at work, giving to each man a name and address which that man would fill into one of the forms before him. There were on the table two or three piles of papers. One of them was a pile of blank forms, affidavits, &c. The first form was one in which the applicant is required to swear that he has arrived at the age of twenty-one years; that he has resided in the United States three years next preceding his arrival at that age, and has continued to reside therein to the present time; and that he has resided five years within the United States, &c.

The three clerks would fill in each the name furnished to him as that of the applicant. It would be filled in as that of the applicant in three places, and the clerk would then sign the name of the applicant in each instance. In every case which I saw each of the clerks filled in the name of Patrick Goff as that of attesting witness for the applicant, without a single exception. The name of "Patrick Goff" was inserted as the witness by each of the three clerks, inserted as the name of the person who was well acquainted with the applicant, &c. The clerks did not sign the name of "Patrick Goff," but put it "Patrick Goff—his mark." The clerks wrote the name of Patrick Goff and made the mark also.

Q. Without his being there?

A. Yes. Whether Patrick Goff exists or not I do not know; at any rate he was not there, nor any one of the applicants whose names were signed. This was common to nearly every case. The mode in which the process was gone through in Judge Barnard's court was this: as the men came up they would hand in their papers—this form of affidavit—and it would be handed to the clerk by the usher, who would call out the names. It is a presumption on my part that they call the names of the persons who in that paper are represented as applicants and witnesses, because of course I could not tell that of my own knowledge. All I can tell with certainty is that the clerk purported to call out the names from the paper. On one occasion a man named Lush, or Lusk, was called forward while Judge Barnard was in court, and the clerk said to him, "Get your witness to sign his affidavit." The man looked about the court. I was at that time at the extreme end of the court, and I heard him say in a voice which I supposed was heard by the judge and the clerk, "I don't know who he is, your Honor." The clerk would call out the names of persons so rapidly that I could not take them down. I commenced to do so at first, but it was performed too rapidly for me to follow it, but I made a mark on some papers which I had with me for each name called.

I do not think that while I was there there was any one occasion when the number was less than one hundred and ten, the lowest number mentioned in my report, in a batch. The average was about one hundred and forty to one hundred and fifty in a batch. When they came up they would be divided in groups around four or five Bibles; each Bible would be held up by four, five, or six men in the center, and the others would either touch it or stretch out their hands toward it on being directed so to do by the clerk or the judge, I am unable to say which. While they were being called up to touch the Bible, or in effect to stretch out their hands toward it, the clerk would call out the names. There was a double calling of the names: the first time to get them within the bar and the second for the purpose of getting them to touch the Bible. As the clerk called out the names he would hand the paper, being the affidavits before mentioned, to the judge, turning each paper over as he handed it, so that the place for the judge's signature might be presented at once to him to save time. The judge would make some mark, which I have no doubt you will find on the records when you have them produced, as his signature to the indorsement, being in fact the fiat for the naturalization. No evidence of any kind was taken by the judge, nor was any oath of any kind administered to the applicants prior to the judge's signing the papers in this way, which he did as fast as the clerk could hand the papers over to him. When they were all through in this way the judge then administered the oath in words which I took down at the time and which I will adopt from this report: "You, the several applicants, swear that you are twenty-one years of age; that you arrived in this country three years before attaining that age and have resided five years in the United States, and for the last year in the State of New York." He swore them in a batch to that form. He would then say, "And you, the several witnesses, swear that the contents of your several affidavits are true."

The judge repeated this form of oath, and every man was supposed to kiss the book. The batch ran from one hundred and up to two hundred; and I remember on one occasion when I counted over one hundred and eighty in a batch. A clerk at the gate of entrance for the bar called the names of the applicants and witnesses in the order in which the papers came to his hands, and on the persons called coming forward they were arranged within the bar, often one witness for four or five applicants at a time. When a number were thus arranged their papers were handed to the clerk, who stood at the judge's left hand, who, as he finished off the lot already in hand, took up the fresh batch. An applicant and a witness being now called by this clerk, and answering to their names, the judge would direct them to hold up their right hands. Very frequently the left would be held up, and the usher would have to help the man to put up his right hand instead of his left. The judge then proceeded to swear the parties in the following words: "You solemnly swear, in the presence of the ever-living God, that the affidavits which you have severally subscribed are true: so help you God."

The testimony of Colonel George Bliss, jr., found in the same volume, page 185, fully corroborates this witness. Colonel Bliss has since been United States district attorney. He timed the Judge and found that in one five-minute space he made thirteen American citizens, full-fledged, "all residents for five years, all men of good moral character," all well disposed, &c., and in another five-minute space he accomplished the marvelous task of turning out fifteen! Allow me also to read from the testimony of Henry Lyle commencing on page 460, same volume:

Question. State what you know of certificates of naturalization being issued by Judge McCunn, of the superior court, and in the supreme court by Judge Barnard.

Answer. I was engaged in that business during the months of September and October, 1868. I saw that everybody almost was going into it and I took a hand at it. I had an office at 33 Chatham street in this city. I staid there most of the time during the day and at night would go up town to Thirty-second street at a liquor store there where parties would send me names of persons to be naturalized. The next day I would fill up the applications, go before the judges, and put the men through. During the month of October I came down in the evening and put the men through before Judge Barnard, of the supreme court, who held the night sessions. I would sign the names of the applicants to the blanks; sometimes I would sign the applicant's name and sometimes he would himself, or if anybody else happened to be around he would sign it. I would take the papers down to the court and give them to the clerk. He would call my name and I would then go around and swear to the truth of the affidavits before the judge. After that I would go around to the clerk's desk; if the man was not there I would take the oath of allegiance, or if the man was too old to go through, otherwise the man himself would go around.

Q. How many certificates of naturalization did you procure during these two months?

A. I cannot tell, but I judge from six hundred to one thousand; that I would swear to. Sometimes I would swear to twenty or thirty, and sometimes fifty a day. I signed different names, just as it happened to come into my head. Sometimes I would sign my own name; at others that of Henry Laurence, or Lines, or any name.

Q. Do you know of any others engaged in the same business?

A. Yes, sir. One was Patrick McCaffrey; another was John Gallagher—he is in the street department, I believe; a man at 189 King street, and also John Verway, conductor on a Ninth avenue railroad car; he resides at 439 West Thirty-sixth street. I know William Thurben, who is also engaged in that business; he is a conductor on the Bleeker street line and resides somewhere in the Nineteenth ward. There is also John Moran, who resides in the Twenty-first ward. Also Chauncy Gray, who resides at the Putnam Country House, corner Twenty-sixth street and Fourth avenue.

Henry Lyle is simply a sample—one of a hundred.

I call your attention now to another representative case, one of many, as detailed in the testimony of Robert Murray:

Question. State your residence and official position.

Answer. I reside in the city of New York. I am marshal for the United States for the southern district of New York, and have occupied that position since the 20th of April, 1861.

Q. State if you have any knowledge of the issuing and sale of fraudulent naturalization certificates in the month of October, 1868.

A. In the early part of October there was a rumor in town that naturalization papers could be purchased at certain localities in this city for $2 apiece. I directed two of my deputies, named Jarvis and Dwyer, to ascertain if that rumor had any foundation in fact. They reported to me, in a few days afterwards, that those papers could be purchased from a man named Rosenberg, at No. 6 Centre street, and also that they could be purchased at No. 13 Centre street. He and I sat down and made out a list of four or five or half a dozen fictitious names. He went over to Rosenberg, at No. 6 Centre street, (witness subsequently employed Major Simms, his deputies being too well known.) Major Simms reported to me that he called on Rosenberg and represented to him that he resided in Yonkers, Westchester County; that he had some four or five friends there who wanted to become citizens of the United States; that they were poor men and could not spare the time to come to the city to go through the courts of law, and he inquired of Rosenberg if there was not any way by which he could fix it for him. Rosenberg replied, "Yes, give me the names, and I will have the papers for you to-morrow morning." Simms replied that he might want quite a large number, but that the list was imperfect at that time, and that he would call and see him again. He called there the second time and handed him this list of six or eight names, and he was told to call in the morning, and that the papers would be ready for him. He did call in the morning, and the naturalization certificates were handed to him. Simms paid Rosenberg $2 apiece for them. They were brought to me, and I made Simms mark them with his initials, and I think I marked them myself. The next day I sent a young man by the name of Butts with a list of three or four names—fictitious names—and I directed him to go there to No. 6 Centre street and purchase naturalization papers there. He reported to me that he had had an interview with Rosenberg, and that Rosenberg agreed to furnish him the papers the next morning. The next morning Butts handed me the certificates. I compared them with the list of names which I had furnished to him the day previously, and I found that they corresponded. I made Butts put his initials on the certificates, together with the date of them, and I put my initials on them also. The day after I made out another list of names of four or five or perhaps more, and sent a man by the name of Livingston, with instructions to go over and see Rosenberg and inquire if he could purchase naturalization papers. He reported back to me that the papers would be ready the following morning. The following morning Livingston handed to me these naturalization certificates. I compared them with the list of names which I had handed to him the previous morning, and found they corresponded. I made Livingston put his initials on them, together with the date, and I think I also put my initials on them. The next day I sent a man by the name of Reynolds over there to inquire whether he could purchase naturalization papers, and we made out a list of them together of fifteen or twenty names. I simply sent Reynolds there to have corroborating proof, for I meant to arrest Rosenberg that day; and I directed Reynolds to have no conversation with Rosenberg; to state to him that perhaps he might want four or five hundred of the certificates; that perhaps he could not furnish the list of names, as time was very short, and to inquire whether he could have certificates in blank. Reynolds reported back to me that he had had an extended conversation with Rosenberg, and that Rosenberg agreed to furnish him with five hundred of the certificates the next morning, at a dollar and a half apiece; that by taking a large quantity of them he would make a reduction of fifty cents; then he made a counter proposition, that anything else than one hundred would be charged $2 apiece, and over one hundred a dollar and a half apiece. He had quite a long conversation with him, and went into the details of the business. After Reynolds came back and reported to me, I sent another man over there by the name of McDonald, and directed him to do the same thing as Reynolds. He reported back to me substantially the same conversation that Reynolds had reported, that these men would furnish any quantity of these papers—one hundred for a dollar and a half apiece, but any quantity less than one hundred at $2 apiece. I considered then that I had the whole case complete. I went to the district attorney and made necessary affidavit and information, and then got out the warrant and arrested Rosenberg that afternoon at three o'clock.

HOW MANY WERE NATURALIZED?

In the supreme court there were filed in the clerk's office as sworn to certificates as follows:

Date.	Number.	Date.	Number.
October 6	6	October 16	721
October 7	8	October 17	633
October 8	379	October 19	955
October 9	668	October 20	944
October 10	717	October 21	773
October 12	723	October 22	675
October 13	901	October 23	587
October 14	523
October 15	857	Total	10,070

But 75,000 blank applications had been obtained in this court from time to time. An examination by the congressional committee and the testimony of the clerk of the court proved conclusively that there were issued 27,068 certificates when no application was on file. Thus the number naturalized in this court was 37,178.

SUPERIOR COURT.

One of the clerks, Westlake, swore to the number naturalized each day; there being in twenty days in October the enormous number of 26,226, or a daily average of 1,311. Meeks, a deputy clerk, testified that Westlake had given the above from actual count; and Gillespie, assistant naturalization clerk, certified under oath to the correctness of the statement.

From these two courts in the month of October, 1868, there were undoubtedly issued at least 63,000 certificates.

STANDING WITNESSES.

In the supreme court twenty-one witnesses appeared for 2,749 applicants; and the same witnesses also acted their part in the superior court. Take these specimens: Patrick McCaffrey in the month of October, in the supreme court, swore to the good moral character, length of residence, &c., of 251 persons; and in the superior court of 252 persons; in all, 503. John Ward performed like duty in the supreme court for 324 persons; in the superior court for 195 persons; in all, 519. John Moran was witness in the supreme court for 455 persons; in the superior court for 299 persons; in all, 754. James Goff, and Patrick, his brother, certify to 666 in both courts.

Patrick McCaffrey was one of James O'Brien's deputies, and by him discharged for extortion. John Moran had served a term in State prison. The Goff brothers were notorious thieves, and both Barnard and McCunn, as criminal judges, must have known them well. As soon as the business of the court was over James stole a watch, chain, and two diamond rings. It was testified that one of these Goffs had four thousand of these certificates for sale.

Now, under the act of Congress of 1802 applications for naturalization must be made in open court, and the court must be satisfied that the person applying had during his residence "behaved as a man of good moral character, attached to the principles of the Constitution of the United States, and well disposed to the good order and happiness of the same;" and in no case could proof of residence be made by oath of applicant.

WHO ARE ENTITLED TO BECOME CITIZENS.

First. Those who came here over eighteen years of age and had resided here five or more years, and had made previous declaration of intention.

Second. Those who came under eighteen years of age and had resided here five years. These were not required to make previous declaration of intentions.

Third. Honorably discharged soldiers twenty-one years of age and residents of the United States for one year.

How shall all this be shown? By affidavit? Not at all. The common-law oath must be administered to both applicant and witnesses. "You solemnly swear that you will tell the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, so help you God." Then should follow an oral examination of applicant and witnesses as to residence, character, attachment to the principles of the Constitution, as to disposition to the good order and happiness of the country, &c.

In 7 Hill, New York Reports, page 137, Judge Dean held that under the statute the residence of the applicant must be proved by the oath of some party other than the one applying, and that affidavits were inadmissible and could not be received.

In The People vs. Sweetman, (3 Parke's Criminal Cases,) Judge Pratt held:

The laws of Congress require the application to be made to the court and the proof of five years' previous residence must be taken in open court. It must also be common-law evidence, taken by the oral examination of the witnesses; previously prepared affidavits are not competent.

Now, in both the superior and the supreme courts the applications were previously prepared out of court, subscribed and sworn to in court, and before Judge Barnard no oral examination was had at all and both applicants and witnesses were sworn in squads to the truth of printed forms of blank affidavits. In Judge McCunn's court the only oath administered was:

You solemnly swear that these affidavits by you subscribed are true.

The answers to the few questions put were not under oath. Right here, again, I wish to call your attention to the case of Judge Elliot, who was impeached and found guilty for naturalizing four hundred persons in one day. Notice the language of the congressional committee:

It was physically impossible, involving as it must the administering of twelve hundred oaths and the examination of eight hundred witnesses as to age, qualifications, residence, and moral character of the applicants.

And yet each of these judges must have averaged three thousand oaths and examined two thousand witnesses daily! Mirabile dictu! The army in Flanders could not have beaten this swearing.

This terrible picture would not be complete without brief references to "false registration," "repeating," and "ballot-box stuffing." A few instances of each must suffice. William H. Hendrick, with the sanction of Colonel Bliss, district attorney, was employed by a captain of repeaters, headquarters Peter Mitchell's liquor store. There was a gang of about fifty men, divided into squads of four, six, eight, and twelve. Each man received a card giving him his name and residence; on this he registered at one registry, then returned to headquarters, received a new name and residence, and so on. These men registered and voted, each from five to thirty times. It may be well to remark that Peter Mitchell was a candidate for the assembly.

Alexander Ostander, an attorney at law, investigated on election day; saw squads of men; thin slips with names and residences; saw them vote at one polling-place, then go to another and repeat, then to another, and so on.

William H. Greene, a patrolman, saw a gang of men, known to him personally, register from William M. Tweed's house, from Patrick Kernan's, the coroner's, and from Edward Shandley's, police justice. Some of them were challenged, but promptly took the necessary oaths. Most of these men were thieves; the leader, who registered from Kernan's house, was one Lawrence, alias "Wilson," alias "Nibbs" or "Nibbsey." This gang of eight was followed up, and it was found that they had registered one hundred and sixty on fictitious names. They were arrested, their books seized, revealing the fact that they had registered in two hundred and twenty places. On the evening of their arrest a writ of habeas corpus was served on the officers in charge, directing their bodies to be brought before Judge Barnard, no time being allowed for return, none being made. They were taken to Barnard's residence. They remaining on the side-walk, Mr. Howe, an attorney, took the writ, wrote on it, "The prisoners being charged with no offense on the annexed return, I order them discharged," gave it to a servant girl, who passed it to the judge, then in bed, obtained his signature, and the prisoners were discharged.

And lest there might not even then be votes enough to overcome the honest voters of the country portions of the State, "counting and canvassing" was indulged in to an unlimited extent. This was William M. Tweed's favorite method, less expensive, less liable to detection, and more certain of success. Under its operations the only thing necessary to know was the number of votes required. Hence the famous Tilden circular. Mr. Tweed, in his last confession, Report of Special Committee of the Board of Aldermen, pages 133 and 134, throws light upon this:

Question. Now, Mr. Tweed, when you were in office did the ring control the elections in this city?

Answer. They did absolutely.

Q. How did you control the election?

A. Well, each ward had a representative man who would control matters in his own ward, and whom the various members of the general committee were to look up to for advice how to control elections.

Q. What were they to do in case you wanted one man elected over another?

A. Count the ballots in bulk, or without counting them announce the result in bulk, or change from one to the other, as the case may have been.

Q. Then these elections were really no elections at all?

A. The ballots made no result. The counters made the result.

Again, he was asked if he ever gave any directions in any ward to falsify the results, and frankly said he had in every ward in the city. On pages 225 and 226 he is inquired of especially as to this election of 1868, whether the inspectors of election lumped the votes and declared them without counting, and replied that he thought they did; that means were taken to overcome the vote of the rest of the State by that of the city.

But time fails, and these incidents must serve merely as illustrations of a record perfectly appalling. False registration and repeating seemed almost to be the rule; hundreds registered from houses where only two lived; scores from buildings having no existence; an army from vacant lots, stables, beer-gardens, and houses of prostitution. What a picture! This a republic? This self-government? When the disgraceful story was published our whole nation trembled; its ruin was predicted in the English Parliament, and this election was the evidence. New York City was a reproach, and her best citizens of both parties fully appreciated it. These election frauds, increasing year by year, had not been quietly acquiesced in. The New York Assembly had enacted laws to prevent and to punish again and again, but corrupt courts, packed grand juries, bribed sheriffs, subservient policemen, the almost unlimited power of Tammany, the despotism of Tweed, the entire lack of conscience or moral sense in the democracy of the city, their intimate copartnership with grog-shops, gambling-hells, houses of prostitution, and all other dens of vice; their adoption of thieves, perjurers, assassins, State-prison convicts, and all the criminal classes, had rendered every such attempt futile. But this immunity had made them reckless, and their crime of 1868 was so gigantic, so full of peril to the Republic, that the whole country was aroused. The Union League Club appointed a committee to investigate—William E. Dodge, Horace Greeley, Moses H. Grinnell, Isaac Sherman, Marshall O. Roberts, Isaac H. Bailey, and John H. White, names sufficiently well known. They, November 13, 1868, issued an address, from which I will make a few selections.

To the people:

By these, among other measures yet to be developed, the plot to change by fraud the vote of the State was carried to completion. Commenced under color of law, with the connivance of courts of justice, by the issue of fraudulent certificates which were used for a fraudulent registry, furthered by the illegal voting of tens of thousands, and by gangs of industrious repeaters, and then by delayed returns and counts based upon reports obtained by secret circulars. The plot was also indebted for its accomplishment to the encouragement afforded by the proclamation of the mayor and to the deputies of the sheriff with void warrants, illegal arrests, threats, and violence. It is perhaps possible that we are without a remedy against the stupendous fraud thus perpetrated against the people of this city, of this State, and, as regards the electoral vote, against the nation. It may be that our State and congressional legislation, anticipating no such crime, has proceeded upon the supposition that our judges and other officials would be uniformly the protectors of the franchise, and never the tools of conspirators against its purity. It may be that for two years we must submit to the wrongful rule of usurpers who have effected a temporary triumph over the men honestly chosen by the people, and this in the face of proofs that compel the belief that the democratic majorities were obtained by fraud. But if this be so, and we find ourselves without redress or indemnity for the past, it is due to ourselves and our children, to the nation and the world, that we enter our protest against the wrong, and that we obtain by all proper means ample security for the future. It has been our acquiescence in the lesser and partial frauds of the Tammany ring in former years and the impunity with which that ring has plundered and disgraced our city, that has emboldened the preparation of this gigantic conspiracy to control the government of the State and nation. Nothing can be more clear than that a similar acquiescence on our part, now that the conspiracy has succeeded, would tend to make fraud in elections a disease chronic in the body-politic, spreading from city to city and from State to State, until our Republic should have become as rotten as the municipal government of this metropolis. When a fraudulent election is engineered by party conspirators, under the assistance and protection of convenient judges, the returned vote no longer indicates the will of the people, but simply the audacious designs of a desperate faction who regard politics as a game where truth and honor have no place.

Indeed, the success of the rebellion would not necessarily have dealt a more deadly blow at the honor and prestige of the Republic, and of republican institutions throughout the world, than a general debasement of the franchise similar to that which now confronts us, subjecting the entire State to the control of a local ring unparalleled in infamy. Already is the fear forcing itself upon honest men of all creeds and parties that, with individual local judges ready to abet or afraid to resist the most flagrant plot against the purity of elections and the sovereignty of the people, appeal to our court for protection to life and liberty and property may soon become as idle as those of the victims of the secret tribunal to the masked judges of the Inquisition.

This recital of the inception, growth, and ultimate strength of "fraud upon the ballot," of the attempts and complete failure of a well-disposed State to destroy or even restrain it, it seems to me ought to satisfy every intelligent lover of the Republic of the absolute, imperative necessity for interference by the United States, both by legislation and by a rigid enforcement of its laws. The perpetuity of republican institutions demanded both.

In December, 1868, Congress passed a resolution to investigate the alleged frauds in New York, by a vote of 134 ayes to 35 noes; and Hon. William Lawrence, of Ohio, was made chairman of a very efficient committee for that purpose. The investigation was thorough and exhaustive; the evidence taken is accessible to you all in the Congressional Libraries, and is terribly convincing. The committee recommended legislation, in consequence of which and of suggestions of Mr. Davenport, made from time to time—the results of his experience in the enforcement of the earlier acts passed—Congress enacted the laws of May 31 and July 14, 1870, February 28, 1871, and June 10, 1872, making certain necessary amendments to the naturalization laws, providing for the appointment of a chief supervisor of elections in each judicial district of the United States; also for two supervisors in each election precinct, one from each party, in cities of twenty thousand inhabitants and upward, on application of two or more citizens, and of two supervisors for each county or parish in any congressional district, on application of ten citizens. Nearly all of this legislation is now found under title 26 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, entitled "the elective franchise," sections 2002 to 2131 inclusive, a vital portion of which it is now proposed by gentlemen on the other side to repeal.

Is the demanded repeal in the interest of free and pure elections, or is the law as it stands calculated to give every citizen entitled to it a right to vote, and does it insure to him that his vote shall be counted as it was cast? It seems to me the inquiry need go no further; and as these questions are answered our action on this bill, or rather on any bill properly and legitimately before us proposing the repeal of these statutes, should be determined. Surely gentlemen will not seriously undertake to raise and discuss the constitutionality of these laws now. That question was thoroughly considered when they were enacted. Besides they have stood the test of years of trial in the presence of bitter hostility, with all the courts open to the settlement of the question. Can any gentleman point to any decision against them in that regard?

In the case of the United States vs. Quinn, (Blatchford's C. C. Reports, volume 8, page 48,) Judge Woodruff, one of the most accomplished and learned judges in the country, held "that the section of the act in question, (act of May 31, 1870,) which assumes the power of Congress to make it an offense against the laws of the United States to fraudulently register, is a constitutional enactment." I should judge, from the frequent use made on this floor of the recent decisions of Judges Fruidman and Blatchford, that they went to the root of the whole matter and overturned all the law and all the facts, but they go only to the sufficiency of the record in naturalization. They overrule only that one point, so inconsequential that I have not even alluded to it in showing the utter falsity and fraud of the naturalization of 1868. The papers and the facts hereafter to be offered in evidence in the "Coleman" case will conclusively show that his registration was illegal.

Again, in the last Congress, in the case of Dean vs. Field, the democratic side planted itself squarely on the count of the supervisors of election, and on the strength of it gave Dean his seat. No, gentlemen, these laws must be weighed in the balance of experience, and to that I now ask your attention. In May, 1871, John I. Davenport was appointed chief supervisor in that judicial district including the city of New York, and at once entered upon the great work assigned him. Against him was arrayed the most powerful and unscrupulous combination ever known to the politics of this or any other country, but Davenport could not be terrified, cajoled, bribed, or driven. Bright, active, intelligent, vigilant, from investigations made, thoroughly acquainted with the ways of Tammany, he went into the fight con amore and came off conqueror; and now the vanquished foe to decent, well-ordered, and pure elections demands his decapitation and the repeal of the laws he succeeded in enforcing. Is this suggestive of the thought that history repeats itself? The task set before the supervisor was—

1. To obtain possession of from twenty-five to thirty thousand false and fraudulent certificates of naturalization issued from the supreme and superior courts in the month of October, A. D. 1868, then in use in the city, the balance having been sold in packages in New Jersey, Connecticut, and other sections of the State of New York.

2. To discover and prevent false registration whereby thousands claimed to reside in dwellings which were in fact brick-yards, vacant lots, parks, stables, gambling-houses, houses of prostitution and assignation.

3. To break up gangs of repeaters, numbered by the hundreds, each of whom was registering and voting from ten to thirty times.

4. To discover the immense number of living men voting upon the names of the dead.

5. To make a correct roll of the unpardoned criminals and convicts.

6. To prevent false counting and canvassing.

The work was herculean, but the workman was, too. Davenport commenced his operations with enthusiasm, prosecuted them with great earnestness and unflagging zeal. He encountered opposition but always triumphed over it. He was prosecuted before the courts in 1874. The presiding judge not only acquitted him but commended his ability, integrity, and decision in the administration of the duties of his office. In 1876 a congressional committee known as "the Caulfield committee" investigated him, and in the end were delighted to have him called off. Subsequent to the election of 1876, another committee, Hon. SAMUEL S. COX, chairman, made an investigation which resulted in his entire vindication. During the last Congress another was ordered, Hon. William P. Lynde, chairman, on which I had the honor to represent the minority. Witnesses were examined for two or three weeks to so little effect that no report was ever made. Two days before final adjournment of that Congress Mr. Lynde read to me his views, an argument in favor of the repeal of the election laws, but they were never submitted to the Judiciary Committee nor to the House. The only action had was, leave "to print and recommit." I shall have occasion to refer to these investigations again. All these obstacles had no more effect than the débris floating on its surface has upon the ocean.

There were from forty to sixty thousand false and fraudulent naturalization certificates to be followed up and destroyed. It was very difficult to determine how many of these were in use in the city, thousands of them having been sent into Connecticut, thousands into New Jersey and the river counties of New York, ten thousand having been delivered to Jim Fisk for distribution along the line of the Erie road; but the registration was carefully scrutinized, compared year by year; certificates of 1868 to be indexed; records of courts examined; holders of papers personally interrogated; threats, arguments, and entreaties used with the voters, until in 1876 there were registered under certificates issued from the supreme and superior courts for October, 1868, less than ten thousand persons. In the accomplishment of this no complaint had ever been made against Mr. Davenport's processes, and, comparatively speaking, no obstacles had been thrown in his way. Prior to the election of 1878, the supervisor having become thoroughly master of the situation, knowing every holder of these papers, all the facts touching their falsity, determined to close them out. There was no secrecy about it, no disguise; his purpose was published in the daily press; he notified a committee of Tammany of it and sought their co-operation, which at first they seemed inclined to give, but subsequently refused and on the contrary bitterly opposed. In the month of August he caused notices to be served upon these holders personally, also published them, informing them of the fraudulent character of their papers, that they would not be permitted to register under them; that if they would surrender, whenever they were entitled to naturalization they should receive their certificates free of cost; again served a like notice in September and again in October. Before registration was over, from three to four thousand of these papers had been surrendered, with affidavits that the surrender had been freely made; that the certificates were fraudulent, and each affidavit signed by the party affiant. Undoubtedly thousands more would have been freely given up had it not been for the violent and persistent opposition of Tammany. Just before the election some thirty-two hundred warrants were issued against parties who had registered under these papers. On election-day six hundred and six were arrested, and only twelve hundred and forty succeeded in voting. These arrests were made for illegal registration on warrants. Immediate examination was had before the commissioners. All expedition was used; as little trouble, delay, and vexation was caused to the arrested as was possible. Nearly all were discharged on their own recognizance, and very few if any were prosecuted to judgment before the courts, the authorities regarding them rather as dupes of Tammany than willful violators of the law.

A memorial was presented to the last Congress by the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] complaining of arbitrary arrests, cruel treatment, confinement in filthy pens, intimidation, partiality of supervisors in administering the law, and wholesale arrests of innocent men. The Judiciary Committee, through Messrs. Lynde, FORNEY, and FRYE, investigated, as I said before. Tammany was represented by two able lawyers, Davenport by himself. Tammany had the subpœna of the United States, the largest liberty in its use, all free of cost; brought before us seventy or eighty witnesses, of course about all, and of course the very best samples of the injustice of the law. There were sixty-three of these memorialists, setting forth in words that burn their grievances. Their persons and residences were well known, and yet only eleven of them were put upon the stand. Where were the others? Why did not the able counsel call them? Surely they knew and could swear to the blistering facts presented to the House by the honorable gentleman from New York, [Mr. WOOD.] The papers of forty-two of these men on their face would have convicted them of illegal registration. Does this account for the absence of all but eleven? Davenport insisted that they should all be sworn as witnesses for the complainant.

I have no hesitation in saying, and I do it with the evidence and Mr. Lynde's views before me, that as to intimidation of honest voters, cruelty, partiality, vexatious delays, there is not sufficient evidence on which to convict a man of the theft of a farthing, not sufficient to awaken a decent suspicion in an unpartisan mind. On comparing the statements of these witnesses with their papers, I am satisfied that not more than a score were entitled to vote. Did not Tammany find the best specimens of the six hundred and six arrested men? And for this offense against the liberty of the citizen must this law be repealed? Why, you cannot enforce the law against burglary, theft, murder, or any other crime without arresting some innocent men. Must, then, these laws be repealed? I call your attention to this: from twenty-five thousand to thirty thousand fraudulent certificates on which men had registered in 1868 and voted, in 1878 thirty-two hundred only registered, twelve hundred and forty voted; and all this accomplished with no more complaint or cause for complaint than is found in the evidence taken by our committee. I submit to any candid, fair-minded man, is not a success like this marvelous, and its accomplishment with so little friction, so slight individual, personal injustice without parallel in the history of law and its enforcement?

And now I come to the second great crime against the right of suffrage, "false registration and repeating." Its extent I have already indicated; its remedy was hard to find, and made especially so, first for the reason that the city authorities changed election districts every year, and sometimes twice a year, cutting frequently single blocks, single squares, in half, thus rendering impossible any comparison of registries and poll-lists of any one year with any preceding year; second, for the reason that registration under the law then closed only two days before election, thus giving no time for examination and comparison. To overcome these difficulties Davenport took a copy of the census, all males over the age of eleven—three hundred and thirty-three thousand—under the number of the houses, by election districts, assorted, wrote them on slips, boxed the slips, then sorted them alphabetically by the inside letters down to the last letter, so that it became a directory, an alphabetical list in addition to the house list; then copied the inspectors' books, the registers, and poll-lists, brought them into block books, so as to keep each block by itself; then made maps of every house, building, and lot in the city; also in blocks; corrected them every thirty days. Says Mr. COX in his report:

You cannot build a wing to your house, or change its number or add to its stories or rooms, or change the character or quality of the dwelling, without its being registered by the supervisor.

All vacant lots, parks, stables, houses of bad character, public buildings, &c., appear. So perfect was the machinery that Mr. Davenport says:

I did not care how often they changed the election districts, I could take one block and another block and make my election districts as fast as they could change theirs, and have it within twenty-four hours.

Then the law was changed giving ten days between final registration and election. Every supervisor was required to keep a copy of the registration in his district and return at once to the chief supervisor. False registration and repeating without detection became impossible.

The third and fourth classes of crimes against the ballot were, voting on the names of dead men, the registering and voting of unpardoned convicts. To prevent these the supervisor prepared books containing a record of every State-prison conviction in the county of New York for twenty-five years, with an accurate description of the man, his height, complexion, age, married or single, occupation, crime charged, trial, plea, verdict, sentence, whether pardoned or not; and this record was corrected every thirty days. Also for the same time records of all deaths, with street, number, name, age, nativity, color, occupation, time, place, and cause of death. And these crimes were effectually stopped.

False counting and canvassing was pretty thoroughly checkmated by the law and its enforcement by Mr. Davenport, as the following evidence shows:

By Mr. COCHRANE:

Question. Who has the custody of the records showing these several votes?

Answer. That is published in what is called the City Record, the official paper of the city.

Q. Who has the custody of the original returns?

A. The original canvass of the State officers—the State inspectors send their original canvass to the county clerk, one copy to the county clerk and one copy to the bureau of elections. The supervisors of elections send their canvass to me, and I have the returns from every election precinct, showing not only the supervisors' count, but also showing the inspectors' count; and in that way I have a check on any alteration of the returns thereafter, because I made them take down the count of the State officers, and then take their own count, and wherever there was a variance the man got into difficulty.

Q. You have no personal knowledge, however, as to the correctness of those returns, have you?

A. I have the official returns made under the law. The supervisors are sworn. I did not personally canvass the vote.

Q. Therefore you have no personal knowledge as to the correctness of these returns?

A. No, sir; I had the official reports certified by the county clerk and published in the official paper of the city. That I have here in Washington. That paper is made by law the place for publishing the official canvass.—Davenport's testimony.

But time will not allow me to specify further the means adopted by Davenport to secure pure elections. It does not seem to me that man could devise machinery more perfect, complete, and more certain to secure the desired end. How did it operate in New York? It must be remembered that Davenport commenced under the first election law in 1870; that both law and man were silent and powerless in the odd years and in the election of all officers except Representatives to Congress. Of the election of 1872 the New York Tribune, then good democratic authority, declared it "to have been most thoroughly honest and to have been nearer a pure election than the city of New York had had in years."

Allow me to give a few extracts from the testimony of a leading democrat and prominent official of the city, Mr. William C. Whitney, taken before the investigating committee of 1876, of which the honorable gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] was chairman:

When Mr. Davenport comes to explain to you the elaborate machinery for detecting frauds upon the franchise in New York City which he has devised and set in motion, you will see plainly that the security against frauds of this character is greater than anywhere else in the United States.

Again:

Of course you must understand that this system undoubtedly has the effect of preventing fraudulent voting.

Again:

From what I have seen of the preparation made to prevent fraudulent voting, with which Mr. Davenport is justly to be credited, I do not believe there is as honest an election in the United States as is held in New York City.

Again:

I am entirely familiar with the system that he has put in operation. I think it is very thorough, and if a man succeeds * * * in voting when he has no title to vote he is pretty smart.

Again:

Question. You think that the supervision of the election, under the system of Mr. Davenport, has had the tendency to prevent illegal voting and to give a fair election?

Answer. I think it has. Yes, sir.

Again:

I have heard him (Kelly) express the same opinion * * * that Mr. Davenport has been a very important accessory in preventing fraudulent voting in New York City.

The chairman of this committee, Mr. COX, says:

Whatever may be said about the United States law as to elections or their supervision by United States authority, &c., this must be said, that the administration of the law by Commissioners Davenport, Muirhead, and Allen, the United States functionaries, and their subordinates was eminently just, wise, and conducive to a fair public expression in a presidential year of unusual excitement, &c.

Again:

From the moment the supervisors are appointed, from the moment that the lists are purged, from the moment that the applications are examined, to the very last return of the popular expression, this election shows the calm mastery of prudence. For this due credit should be given to men of both parties, and especially to the corporation counsel, Mr. Whitney, and the United States supervisors.

Now, sir, examine some figures from which correct conclusions are inevitable:

Sixth ward statistics.—For President, 1860, 3,224; for governor, 1864, 3,781; for President, 1868, 5,401; for secretary of state, 1869, 6,286; in May, 1870, for judges of the court of appeals, 6,350. Refer to the census and you will find this ward during this time steadily decreasing in number of inhabitants, but increasing in votes, as the above shows.

The national act of 1870 was enforced at the November election in this ward, and what was the result? For governor, November, 1870, 3,903; for Congress, November, 1870, 2,865. Supervision had affected some the governor's vote and reduced that for members of Congress more than one-half! Now look at the following year, 1871, an odd year, with which United States officers had nothing to do: For secretary of state, 1871, 4,104.

In February, 1871, the United States laws had been made more efficient. Now see the result in the same ward: For President, 1872, 2,485; for Congress, 1872, 2,414.

Eighth ward.—For several years, inhabitants decreasing, vote increasing under the fostering care of Tammany: For President, 1868, 6,803; for Congress, 1868, 6,587; in May, 1870, for judges of court of appeals, 9,512; for governor, November, 1870,* 5,412; for Congress, November, 1870,* 5,067; for secretary of state, 1871, 5,912; for President, 1872,* 5,311; for Congress, 1872,* 5,011.

Wards.	Population.		Registration.		Vote.
	June, '70.	June, '75.	May, '70.	May, '76.	May, '70.	May, '76.
First ward	14,463	14,209	3,559	2,539	3,051	2,387
Third ward	3,715	2,878	1,606	904	1,382	819
Fourth ward	23,748	20,843	5,748	3,559	5,804	3,251
Fifth ward	17,150	15,966	5,880	3,263	4,374	2,947
Sixth ward	21,653	19,880	6,802	2,939	6,350	2,674
Eighth ward	34,913	32,488	10,162	6,414	9,512	5,932
Total	115,142	106,264	33,817	19,618	30,473	18,010

Observe that while the population decreased less than 9,000, the vote decreased more than 14,000; and yet the vote of 1876 was one of the largest ever thrown. Observe further that the decreasing vote is found in the democratic nurseries.

Please examine the party vote in the same wards, the scattering being excluded:

Wards.	Republican vote.		Democratic vote.
	May, '70.	Nov., '76.	May, '70.	Nov., '76.
First ward	629	394	2,422	1,993
Third ward	203	235	933	584
Fourth ward	657	448	5,147	2,803
Fifth ward	627	842	3,747	2,105
Sixth ward	260	524	6,090	2,150
Eighth ward	1,038	2,244	8,474	3,688
Total	3,414	4,687	26,813	13,323

Total poll 1870	110,000
Total poll 1876	171,000

A democratic decrease of more than one half! Is this because the number of democrats has actually been reduced? Not at all. It is only this and nothing more: under these election laws his power of voting has been restricted. One democrat under the old régime was worth as much as two to-day. Of course such an interference with prolific democracy must be unconstitutional.

* United States law enforced.

WHAT DO FACTS AND FIGURES SHOW?

Now, do not these facts and figures conclusively prove that there were no fair elections in New York City for many years, up to and including that of 1868; that false registration, repeating, corrupt naturalization, and fraud of every kind utterly overcame "the will of the people;" that interference by Federal authority was a necessity so far as it could constitutionally be had; that the election laws of 1870 and 1871, and their enforcement by United States officers, has purified elections? Why, then, this sudden democratic "hue and cry" against those laws? Why this determination to repeal the law or destroy the Government? Is it because of their cost? Are they, as the democrats insist, "heaping burdens upon the poor?"

The election of 1868 cost the city of New York $550,000, and what was it this money purchased? A farce! a fraud! That of 1870 cost $450,000; 1871, $375,000. Now the election costs the State only about $150,000. Add to that amount paid by the United States, even years, since the law went into effect, averaging, including all expenditures, chief supervisor and all, not over $100,000 a year, and the result is: Pure election, 1878, costs the United States and State $250,000; bastard election, 1868, costs the State $550,000.

Where are the burdens? No, my democratic friends, lovers of your kind, your cards are not good.

Is it because, as Mr. Lynde says, there were arbitrary arrests in 1878; because too much power is placed in the hands of a partisan supervisor? Why, gentlemen, there were fifteen hundred warrants issued in 1876 and three hundred arrests, all under the supervision of the autocrat Davenport; and yet there was no complaint, according to Mr. COX. Everything was serene and lovely. Is it because a score of men entitled to vote were arrested in 1878 and thus deprived of their rights? Mr. COX says such mistakes must inevitably happen, and they did occur in 1876; and yet everything worked together for good then. Is it because the enforcement of this law operates against the democratic party rather than against the republican? Of course it does. So does the enforcement of any law against crime. Repeal the whole criminal code; open the doors of every prison, jail, and penitentiary in this country; and the republican party would be shortly in a hopeless minority.

One illustration will serve to show in what soil this party of "reform" flourishes.

1862: General Wadsworth, the Union nominee for governor; Horatio Seymour, the democratic. The county of Saint Lawrence, made up of substantial, intelligent, and well-behaved farmers, cast a vote of 13,321. Wadsworth had 9,698; Seymour had 3,623. Thirty-nine election districts in the city, containing a little less population than Saint Lawrence, polled 14,345 votes. Wadsworth, 1,681; Seymour, 12,654.

The inhabitants of these districts were degraded, intemperate, ignorant, and criminal. These districts, as appeared by the police records, contained 2,743 groggeries, 279 brothels, 170 resorts of thieves, 105 policy shops, and gambling-houses and dance-houses in great numbers. They gave Seymour a greater majority than he had in the whole vote of the State of 602,546.

Right here, sir, I wish to call the attention of the committee to the testimony of a man of great experience, Mr. Ottarson, given before the COX committee in 1876. Mr. Ottarson had been a journalist in New York City for twenty-five years, connected with the Tribune from 1841 to 1865, subsequently with the Times and the Herald, the compiler of the Whig or Tribune Almanac, a careful student of social and political statistics:

I do not believe nor do I charge that all democrats are dishonest. But I do mean to say that every dishonest man, every vagabond, gambler, illegal rumseller, tramp, loafer, and bad citizen, in whatever line of business, from burglary down to French pools, is instinctively and practically in favor of Tammany democracy.

Again:

More than thirty years ago the whig and native American majority in the Legislature got up a bill to purify elections. Tammany opposed it. It was enacted. Tammany defied it. As soon as the democrats got a majority the law was repealed. When it was proposed to substitute glass ballot-boxes for the dark sepulchers, so easily packed before the polls opened, Tammany opposed it. When it was proposed to give each party an equal representation in the boards of election officers, Tammany opposed it. When it was proposed to close liquor shops during voting hours to prevent fighting and general disorder, Tammany opposed it. When it was proposed to remove ticket booths far enough from the polling places to avoid crowds and confusion, Tammany opposed it. When minority representation was proposed, Tammany opposed it. When the people found that the democratic leaders had been granting enormous donations or privileges to certain religious organizations and proposed an amendment to the constitution of the State forbidding appropriations to any sect whatever, Tammany opposed it. Whenever and wherever there has been proposed the least possible restriction of liquor selling, or the least attempt toward the enforcement of a regard for Sunday, Tammany has opposed it.

Words of mine would have failed in any attempt to describe Tammany democracy. This witness does justice to the subject. What a spectacle do we behold to-day—a union between the confederate democracy of the South and this Tammany democracy of the North! Have they forgotten history, and that it repeats itself? They have worked together before, worked for slavery and against the rights of man, worked for a despotism and against a republic; the one finally made a mad attempt to destroy the Government, the other cheered it on; the one fought for years to achieve its terrible purpose, the other sympathized, but, coward-like, dared not help. The one sowed the wind and reaped the whirlwind; the other cringed and shivered before the blast. The one mourned over blasted hopes, broken families, ruined fortunes, and a devastated country; the other lamented only the loss of political power. And now once more they clasp hands. The confederacy demands that all protection to the voter shall be withdrawn; that no civil or military officer shall, with armed men, secure to the trembling black citizen his right to the ballot; that kuklux and white-leaguers shall reorganize; that scourgings, beatings, and assassinations shall go unwhipped of justice; and Tammany as before shouts "Amen and amen." Tammany demands that "thieves, vagabonds, gamblers, tramps, loafers, and bad citizens" shall again control elections in the city of New York; that corrupt judges, false witnesses, and perjured applicants shall again swell their majorities; that false registration, repeating, simulating voters, and manipulating votes shall once more overcome the will of the people, and the confederate democracy shout back their amen. Together they demand that their wicked will shall prevail or the Army shall be starved and all the functions of Government shall perish. But the old ship of state sails calmly on. She has encountered in her voyage deeper seas, fiercer waves, angrier storms, more dangerous shores, and has found safety from them all. The Great Pilot is at her helm, and, freighted as she is with the hopes of man, all the powers of darkness cannot prevail against her.

Mr. ROBESON. Mr. Chairman, when I had the honor to speak to this committee on the Army bill, I endeavored in the few remarks which I then had occasion to make to illustrate the fact that that bill was not really designed as a limitation in any way upon the use of the United States Army; and I supported that proposition by the statement that during the last Congress a provision had been put into the Army bill then passed, which effectually restrained the power of the military officers to be present at or take any control of any popular election, and that therefore the words "naval and military" in this bill were nothing but a cover, a specious and thin cover, to the real design of this enactment, which is not to restrain the Army, for that is already done, but to strip from the officers of the courts, the civil representatives of the United States power, their authority for executing the laws of the General Government by summoning to their aid, if need be, the good citizens of their districts, to help them "keep the peace" at the polls.

It has been said that we were willing on our side of this Chamber to vote for the repeal of this law of 1865, provided it was presented in an independent section. And that declaration has, without authority, been perverted to mean that we were willing to vote for the amendment in the Army bill, if it was presented as a separate provision. Mr. Chairman, that is not only a different proposition, but exactly an opposite proposition. That amendment does nothing more than repeal an exception to a restricting law, and the repealing of an exception to a restricting law, so far from repealing the law itself, actually enlarges and increases its scope. I have thought it proper to make these remarks in order that our position might not be longer misunderstood. For myself I say that I am willing, if the gentlemen on the other side choose to present the proposition, to vote for the repeal of the whole restricting enactment of 1865, but I should not dare to go home to my constituents if I said that I was willing to take from the civil officers of the Government, from the civil instruments of the law, their power to maintain good order, quiet, and peace while they were in the exercise of their duties as free American citizens and voters.

With these remarks, Mr Chairman, I dismiss all the discussion that I care to make of the subject-matter of the last bill, and shall now confine myself entirely, as far as I may be able to confine my remarks made in this desultory manner, to the discussion of those legal and constitutional propositions which have been so fully, so ably, so boldly, and I am willing to say so fairly presented on the other side by the distinguished gentleman from Kentucky and his associates. The real question between the gentlemen on the other side and myself is a difficulty which arises on the main propositions of this case; not a difficulty in logic or in argument, not even in verbal propositions; but we differ about our premises, about the principles from which we start. And if it were otherwise I should hesitate myself before I arrived at a different conclusion from the distinguished gentlemen who have so clearly and ably presented the other side of this case. But the difference between us is found in our ideas of the organic principles of our Government, about the design of the men who established it, and the purposes for which it was constituted. These gentlemen seem to argue, and I believe—for such is the influence of early education and habit of thought—they honestly and habitually think that we are living, not under the Constitution of the United States, but under a confederacy of separate sovereignties; whereas I think that we are members of a government established for the government of the people and not of the States, a government which has all the attributes of a government, including sovereignty—a government which acts directly upon the people, upon their rights, and upon their property. It seems to me, if I have read aright the principles and history of our Government, that it was for this very purpose that our fathers abandoned the original idea of the confederation, and appealing again to the people, not to the States, drew from that rich and natural source the powers with which they endowed the Government under the Constitution. And when they turned to that source and took from that natural well their powers of government they took them pure and unalloyed by any intervening element which could impair or weaken; they drew them direct and pure, not through the doubtful vehicle of intervening government or State sovereignty.

If I have read history aright, sir, our fathers found that a confederation of States where the central power was dependent upon the several States for the execution of its laws, the enforcement of its decrees, and the protection of its people was insufficient for the purposes of government; and therefore these men, learned in all the principles of government and law, elevated to a loftier mood by their contact with great principles and the great sacrifices they had made, turned again to the people of the country and from them sought anew the authority upon which this Government was founded, and, clothed with full powers by the people whom they directly represented, they proceeded to establish and ordain a new government with far different, broader, and better-established duties and powers.

Mr. Chairman, the spirit of these earlier leaders of thought and action who, severing with heroic energy the ties which bound them to the Old World, led their adventurous bands to new and hostile shores has not been lost to the nation which they founded. The children of every European race, they were the representatives of every system of European government and religion, and united in themselves much of what was vital and affirmative in them all. They came, as has been most eloquently said, "from the worn and broken crew of the Mayflower, from the ruined bands of Raleigh, from the free communities of the 'hollow land,' from the heavenly companionship of William Penn."

The qualities which dared the dangers of the winter seas and conquered the forests of the New World they transmitted to their descendants with the principles for which they had abandoned the old, and these were not unworthy to receive and maintain them. Themselves the giants of a new creation, their sons were the heroes of a new heroic age, when their day of trial came they were true to their inheritance of power, confirmed in their fathers' faith, and elevated to a higher mood by closer contact with the great principles involved in their struggle for liberty. When they came to settle forever the foundation principle of the government which they established, inspired by a noble ambition of good, they looked far beyond the present, and scorning alike the minor considerations of personal dignity or party policy they admitted the world to a share of their triumph and expanded their earlier idea of mere colonial independence to a broad assertion of the rights of man.

All circumstances combined to inspire, instruct, and aid the founders of our Government. Themselves successful rebels against the wrongs of the most liberal and advanced of European governments, they were so far imbued with its principles, yet so separated from its influences, that they could adopt the good which remained without prejudice or danger. The simple occupations and habits of pioneer life had produced a simplicity of tastes and manners which had not yet been wholly lost under like conditions, and the mighty ocean which rolled between separated them from the landmarks and associations of the Old World, its conventions and its forms, its statecraft and its priestcraft, "its grandeur and its gold."

Acting under His direction "who is the Ruler and Architect of all," and in the fulfillment of their and our destiny, our fathers established a government liberal indeed in its tendencies, simple in its operations, moderate in its requirements, and lenient in its decrees, but firm in its principles, clear in its purposes, and ample in its powers, not only for the wise and beneficent ends for which it was formed, but ample also for its own dignity, action, and preservation. This is the Government which they left to their children for their own benefit and for the benefit of mankind. A nation born of such ideas and established upon these principles, gathered from the vitality of every land, uniting in one community the enterprise and progressive energies of every race, and inspiring it with the kindling associations of every people, with a continent as a heritage and freedom as a birthright, it is fit that we should be as a nation the champion as well as the exponent of the world's advance for ourselves not only, but for all the peoples of the earth.

Let us look at the objects which the founders sought in establishing the Government, as it is expressed in the preamble of the Constitution itself.

What did they mean to do?

To form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity—

Not by the power of State laws or the interference of State officers, but by the force and action of the Government itself. And to—secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, we—

Who?—

we, the people of the United States—

Do what? Do we enter into an agreement between parties? No. Do we join in a league between States? No. Do we make a confederation between governments? No. Is this a compact between sovereignties? No.

We do ordain and establish—

What?—

this Constitution—

For what?—

for the United States of America

This, then, is not a confederation of powers, not a league between States, not an agreement between sovereignties, but a Government established and ordained, constituted by this written Constitution, established and restrained, empowered and restricted by this written Constitution thus ordained.

I admit, Mr. Chairman, that all the powers of this Government are and must be found within the written Constitution. Here is the source from which the river of our power must flow or else run dry. Nothing is to be claimed, nothing is to be exercised except what flows from the powers there declared, the rights there guaranteed.

And if there be any power in these laws which cannot be rationally, legitimately, and logically inferred from the provisions and powers of this written Constitution of the country it should be swept from the statute-book in disdain and dishonor. But, my friends, if there be powers that are necessary for the maintenance of the Government itself, if there be powers that are necessary for its security and preservation, and if these powers be clearly derivable by right and proper reasoning from the Constitution itself or its proper inferences, it is just as much a violation of the Constitution to misconstrue them or deny their force as if you sought to ingraft some foreign power on the Constitution to the injury of the people for whose government and protection it was established.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the first conclusion which I endeavor to deduce from these general propositions is, that the Government established by the Constitution of the United States was a government with all the qualities, powers, and attributes of a government, a government which has citizens, and which acts directly upon those citizens though living in the States, for except those in the Territories or in this District all must live in the States. That it is a government established for the direct purposes of government, clothed with the powers and armed with the weapons of a government, with strength and power for its own action, preservation, and continuance; a fit organization for a people who were to be the leaders and champions of free principles of government and law for themselves not only but for all the peoples of the earth.

If ours is a government established by a free people for the purposes I have recited, and looking to the ends I have suggested, it must have all the inherent qualities of government, including that most necessary, though supreme power, which we call sovereignty, and my first proposition is that our Government is sovereign and supreme upon all subjects upon which it acts. It is a limited government, it is true, a government of limited powers, gentlemen are fond of saying; but let there be no confusion of ideas about this between the gentlemen on the other side and myself. It is a government of limited powers indeed, but limited how? Limited in the number, but not in quality of its powers. It is a government whose powers are limited to certain subjects and acts on certain specific objects with which it deals, but wherever it does deal with a subject, wherever it does act upon an object, there it is a government of sovereign and supreme power. Not only is this declared by the Constitution itself, but it follows from its very nature as a government. No government can be worthy of the name if it does not govern upon the subjects in regard to which it is clothed with power. Let there be no mistake about this proposition. Let it be either admitted or denied. This is a limited government, but limited only in the number of its powers and unlimited in its governmental power over the subjects to which it is legitimately directed. As it is then a sovereignty with sovereign powers upon these subjects, let me make another proposition which cannot be denied; it is this, that whenever it does act upon those subjects its sovereignty is not only unlimited, but exclusive. There can be no sovereignty other than that. If need be I could refer to many decisions of our highest court on this subject. I will, however, detain the committee a moment only to allude to a single case of which we have been speaking so much during the course of this debate. I read from the decision of the Supreme Court in the case referred to:

A government thus established and defined is also for certain purposes a government of the people. Its powers are limited in number, but not in degree; within the scope of its powers as enumerated and defined it is supreme and above the States.

I know that the opinions and decisions of the Supreme Court of this country are not binding authority here; but I know that they are deserving of great weight in the highest legislative body of the country though they are binding upon no man's constitutional ideas, nor do they control his governmental action. I admit this, and I have cited these words only to show that the highest tribunal of this country, entitled to the respect of all thinking men, has so decided this question.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this Government of ours has, under the direction of the Supreme Court of the United States, and by its sanction, exercised the highest attributes of government wherever its necessities required it. It has as a government, and without special delegation for the purpose, exercised the right of eminent domain, the highest exercise of governmental power, the right to take the property of the citizen against his will and appropriate it to government uses. In the city of Cincinnati, after the case had been contested through all the courts and decided by the Supreme Court of the United States, the United States took private property for the purpose of a post-office under the general power to "establish post-offices and post-roads."

Our Government has citizens of its own entitled to and enjoying all the rights of citizenship under the Constitution itself. Under the Dred Scott decision it was held by many that the United States had no citizens except those who were such through their quality as citizens of the several States; but now, under the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which has been accepted and promulgated and which the orators and leaders on this floor have declared they meant to accept, the citizens of the United States now are citizens of the United States by virtue of its Constitution, and citizens of the States because they are citizens of the United States. They are no longer citizens of the United States because they are citizens of the States, but they are now citizens of the United States by virtue of the organic law declared in this Constitution, which makes them citizens of this country wherever they are, and citizens of a State when they happen to reside in a State, because they are citizens of the United States. I read from the fourteenth amendment:

All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States—and of the State wherein they reside.

All persons coming within that described class are citizens of the United States. And what else?—

They are citizens of the United States wherever they are, and citizens of the States, by virtue of their citizenship of the United States wherever they reside in a State.

Then these United States have a government sovereign, supreme and exclusive in its powers wherever those powers act, a government with laws, with citizens, and with property, and with the power to act directly upon its citizens and directly upon their property. These make a State, citizens, and laws; they make a State.

> Men, high-minded men
> * * * *
> Men who their duties know,
> But know their rights, and, knowing, dare maintain;
> * * * *
> And sovereign law, that state's collected will,
> O'er thrones and globes elate,
> Sits empress crowning good, repressing ill.

These constitute a state, and these the United States of America has. This country has a government, powerful, sovereign, and, thank God, permanent and enduring. It has a people, free, thoughtful, conservative, and, thank God, I believe, loyal. It has all the powers of a government, not only for its own establishment and its own perpetuity, but all the powers of a government to secure to every citizen every right which that government gives him.

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CARLISLE] has said, and he will please correct me if I misquote the sense of his proposition, that all the powers of this Government are to be found in the Constitution itself, and that nothing can be enforced by the General Government unless the power to enforce it is specially delegated.

Mr. CARLISLE. Unless the power be expressly delegated or fairly implied from some power which is delegated in the Constitution.

Mr. ROBESON. I will read what the gentleman says:

Whenever it attempts to exercise an authority over any subject it must find a warrant for it either in some express grant or some reasonable implication from some express grant in the Constitution itself.

And my friend has elucidated that subject by mentioning the right to bear arms, the right of liberty of conscience, the right of liberty for the press, the right of the people to assemble peaceably, &c., but all these are negative rights, which the Constitution simply says shall not be abridged. But when you come to a right which is a part of the government of the country, when you come to a right which is to be exercised as an important and affirmative function of the government itself, if there be no right to carry out and execute it, then there is no government. The distinction will be clear to the mind of my distinguished friend, the difference between a right merely guaranteed by negative provision, either in express language or in general statement, and a right which makes a part of the organization and movement of the Government itself.

Can such a right be established in the Government without the necessary implication to enforce and protect it? Do you make wheels to a wagon that are not to turn round? Do you put steam to an engine or motive power to any machinery which is not to be moved? When it is done, do you not find it a reasonable and fair implication from that fact that its movement and its exercise are contemplated?

The gentleman will pardon me a single moment if upon this question I turn again to a decision to which I have once before alluded, the decision of Justice Story in the celebrated case of Prigg against the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania. To the objection that the power there exercised did not fall within the scope of the enumerated powers of legislation confided to Congress, Justice Story answers:

Stripped of its technical and artificial structure the argument comes to this, that although rights are exclusively secured by or duties are exclusively imposed upon the National Government, yet unless the power to enforce these rights or to execute these duties can be found among the express powers of legislation enumerated in the Constitution, they remain without any means of giving them effect by any act of Congress, and they must operate solely proprio vigore, however defective may be their operation; nay, even although in a practical sense they may become a nullity from the want of a proper remedy to enforce them or to provide against their violation. If this be the true interpretation of the Constitution, it must in a great measure fail to attain many of its avowed and positive objects as a security of rights and a recognition of duties. Such a limited construction of the Constitution has never yet been adopted as correct, either in theory or in practice.

In the case of United States vs. Cruikshank, 1 Wood's Reports, which was afterward confirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States, the court says:

It seems to be firmly established by the unanimous opinion of the judges in the above-quoted case that Congress has power to enforce by appropriate legislation every right and privilege given or guaranteed by the Constitution. The method of enforcement, or the legislation appropriate to that end, will depend upon the character of the right conferred.

One other citation which, though not from the Supreme Court, ought to have weight, for it is a citation from one of the founders of our Government, a man whose authority will be recognized at least by gentlemen on the other side of the House. I read from No. 43 of the Federalist an article written by James Madison upon this very subject. Citing the clause of the Constitution which gives Congress the power to make laws to carry out its provisions, he says:

Had the Constitution been silent on this head there can be no doubt that all the particular powers requisite as means of executing the general powers would have resulted to the Government from unavoidable implication. No maxim is more clearly established in law or in reason than that whenever the end is required the means are authorized; whenever a general power to do a thing is given every particular power necessary for doing it is included.

Now, sir, I appeal from the constitutional arguments of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] to-day to the constitutional exposition of these sound principles by James Madison at the time of the foundation of our Government. Again, is there anything to be found in the Constitution of the United States which establishes and confirms the proposition I have made? Yes; and let me read it in the hearing of the committee, for I fear we are apt in the heat of discussion——

Mr. TUCKER. Will the gentleman allow me a moment? Was he not mistaken in saying that he appealed from "the gentleman from Virginia" to the authority of James Madison? Did the gentleman mean to refer to me?

Mr. ROBESON. I appeal from what I understood to be the natural and necessary implication of the gentleman's position to the position established and declared by James Madison. If I have misstated any position of the gentleman, I beg he will correct me.

Mr. TUCKER. I did not desire to interrupt the gentleman. I only wished to say that nothing I have said in this debate conflicts at all with the views which the gentleman has read from the essay by James Madison.

Mr. ROBESON. That would probably be a matter of argument.

Mr. TUCKER. I supposed that the gentleman by mistake said "the gentleman from Virginia" when he meant to say that he was appealing from the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CARLISLE] to the authority of Mr. Madison.

Mr. CARLISLE. I have said nothing inconsistent with the view expressed by Mr. Madison.

Mr. ROBESON. The difference in all arguments between people who deal with subjects fairly is usually a difference in verbal propositions. We quarrel not usually about principles, but ordinarily about our method of stating them. We are not accurate in our definitions nor always fair in our deductions. If the gentleman does not mean the opposite of what Mr. Madison says, then I hold him up as a bright and shining example of justice, reason, and right on the other side of this Chamber—a gentleman who takes his stand here and says that when a general power is given or a general right guaranteed in the Constitution, the particular powers necessary to enforce that right follow by natural and necessary implication.

Mr. CARLISLE and Mr. MCLANE. Madison does not say that.

Mr. TUCKER. The honorable gentleman from New Jersey must not take me as sanctioning his own statement of Mr. Madison's proposition. I sanction and indorse what Mr. Madison himself has said.

Mr. ROBESON. I was about to read, from the Constitution of the country itself, exactly what the men who made it said when they declared these powers and conferred these rights. It is said here, (or if it be not said it is implied, such is the natural and necessary implication from the propositions and arguments of the gentlemen,) that we are dependent upon the States for the security of some of the privileges and rights of our citizens. This Constitution in article 4 declares:

This Constitution and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof shall be—shall be the supreme law of the land.

What? Submitted to the States for their revision and execution? No—

"The supreme law of the land!" Not of the Territories only, not of the District of Columbia alone, but the supreme law of this broad land, stretching from ocean to ocean and from the frigid to the torrid zone. Suprema lex! What is supreme law? It is a law which has the power to execute itself upon citizens and property. This is no Dogberry law that our fathers gave us. To George Seacoal that most eminent legal authority says:

You are thought here to be the most senseless and fit man for the constable of the watch; therefore bear you the lanthorn. This is your charge; you shall comprehend all vagrom men.

There is the power given.

You are to bid any man stand in the Prince's name

That is the law.

Second Watchman. How, if he will not stand?

Dogberry. Why then, take no note of him, but let him go; and presently call the rest of the watch together, and thank God you are rid of a knave.

[Laughter.]

Is that the Constitution which our fathers gave for the purposes I have stated? Is that the Government which they established to insure domestic tranquillity throughout the land, and perpetuate the blessings of civil liberty for themselves and for their children? Those who attribute to them such contracted ideas and propositions do injustice and injury to their grateful memories before the world. What more does the Constitution say?

And the judges in every State shall be bound thereby, anything in the constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding.

Not that the United States Government shall be bound by the action and tied up to the operations of a State government, but that the judges and the courts of every State shall be bound by the United States Constitution, anything in the constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding.

One clause more.

The Senators and Representatives before mentioned—

That is, ourselves—

and the members of the several Legislatures, and judicial officers, both of the United States and of the several States, shall be bound by oath or affirmation to support this Constitution.

We, when we stand up before the Speaker's desk and raise our hands to Heaven and bind our governmental duty by the solemnity of an oath fast to the throne of the eternal God, swear to do what? Not to sustain the constitution and laws of any State, but the Constitution and laws of the United States. And every legislator, and every judge, and every executive of every State swears to maintain the Constitution of the United States. The United States representative or officer does not swear to maintain the constitution of any one of the several States, but all the officers of the States swear to maintain the Constitution of the United States.

These, Mr. Chairman, are general propositions I make. We come now more directly to the consideration of the authority which is to be found in this Constitution for the enactment of the laws now under consideration; for, as I have said, if they are unconstitutional let them be swept from the statute-book; but if they be constitutional, although in your wisdom, acting as a majority, you may see fit to repeal them, do not put it on the ground of their unconstitutionality, or else your judgment may remain a false precedent for future action, a landmark and guide-post to error and to wrong.

The gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. CARLISLE,] who has so ably presented his side of the case, has said that the power derived from the second section of the first article of this Constitution was a power which I had the honor to discover. I should be proud if that were so, but it is a power which is as old as the Constitution itself, as old as the principles which are there set forth, a power which I do not believe has ever before been denied by any one.

Mr. CARLISLE. Was it ever asserted?

Mr. ROBESON. It would have been asserted if it had been denied. There are many things which are so self-evident when written upon the face of laws that they assert themselves to the understanding of all; and this has been so plainly written that it needed no reassertion by the feeble language of men like myself, for there it is, written on pages of the Constitution of our country, a self-existing, self-standing, self-asserting proposition which has challenged denial since the Constitution was formed:

The electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for the electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature.

Electors for what? For the House of Representatives. The House of Representatives of what? Of the National Legislature, of the Congress of the United States.

All legislative powers granted shall be vested in a Congress—of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives.

What of?—

Not the Legislature of a State, not a governmental body to make laws for a State, but a legislature of the United States, deriving its powers directly from the people and not from the States; a legislature that makes laws for the United States, the members of which swear to maintain the Constitution of the United States and not the constitution of any State.

They may not be civil officers such as come within the list of those enumerated as subject to impeachment. I know it has been held in the case of Senator Blount that he, for acts which he did as a private citizen or as governor of Tennessee, was not such an officer, and did not do acts which made him liable to impeachment as one of the civil officers of the Government under that clause of the Constitution. But the decision of that case goes to this extent, and no more. I care not whether you call Representatives in this House officers or not; I care not whether they are civil officers or not, it is a quarrel about words and names; they hold no commission, but they are members of the United States Government, to whom are committed important legislative functions. They discharge United States duties; they are amenable to the rules and government of this House, call them what you will.

I have said that this clause which I have read, though it confers no right of suffrage, yet adopts to its suffrage that class of voters which are here described. The doctrine of conveying rights by decription is not unknown to any of my friends. Laws even may be made by adoption. I may convey to my friend a lot in this city; if I choose I may describe it by proper metes and bounds, or I may say "lot numbered 1 in subdivision of square numbered 1, as surveyed and recorded in the clerk's office by the surveyor of the city," and when my friend takes the title for that lot does he take it from me or does he take it from the surveyor who describes it? Again, "all persons," says the fourteenth amendment, "born and naturalized in the United States are citizens of the United States." Do they take that title——

The CHAIRMAN, (Mr. GOODE in the chair.) The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. CARLISLE. I hope unanimous consent may be given to enable the gentleman to complete his argument.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. ROBESON. Let me pause to thank the gentlemen on all sides for their courtesy.

I was about to say, Mr. Chairman, that the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States declares that all persons born or naturalized in the United States are citizens of the United States and citizens of the State in which they reside. Do they take their title of citizenship from the mothers who bore them or the court which naturalized them, or from the Constitution of the United States which describes and adopts them? The Speaker of this House under certain contingencies may become the President of the United States, because he had been elected by the citizens of Philadelphia, and afterward selected by our votes to be Speaker. Does he derive that title from the Constitution of the United States or from the votes of the Fourth ward of the city of Philadelphia? It seems to me to be too clear for argument. There are some propositions which in their statement are so conclusive that you confuse them by illustration or argument.

Now, then, if this be a United States election for members of the United States Government, who are to have United States qualifications and to execute United States laws, is it not a right guaranteed to every citizen that that election shall be fair? Gentlemen will say there are no citizens; or would have said in the old time, there are no citizens except the citizens of a State, and therefore it is the State which must protect the rights which are guaranteed to citizens. Since the adoption of the fourteenth amendment, as I have said, we are citizens of the United States independent of and above the States; and by that Constitution we are as citizens entitled to every right which is there guaranteed and secured. More than that, this House, this national Legislature, is the judge of the election, qualification, and returns of its own members. Is that a State function or a United States function? And may it not be reasonably said, may it not be irresistibly argued, that the Congress of the United States has the right, if it chooses to exercise it, to make all laws and all rules which are necessary to give them all the information which it is proper and necessary they should have in order to decide upon these questions?

But it is not necessary to argue from general propositions upon this subject. By the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution it is provided that Congress shall have power—

To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States or in any department or officer thereof.

In the very section of the Constitution which gives this right and declares this qualification and establishes this election, and which also gives the right to Congress, when they choose, to make all needed regulations with regard to the time, place, and manner of holding it—in the very concluding section of that article the power to make these laws is expressly and explicitly given. Now, then, Mr. Chairman, what does that mean? If there is any remark to be made about this Constitution it is that it was the work of master hands, and that, dealing in general statements and general terms, there is nothing within it which is unnecessary to its operation.

Mr. SAMFORD. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. ROBESON. Yes, sir.

Mr. SAMFORD. I would like to ask whether or not the same provision with reference to the election of Senators is not made in the section which provides for the election of Representatives?

Mr. ROBESON. I will answer that before I close. If I do not, I trust the gentleman will call my attention to it. I mean to be entirely fair in my discussion of this case, and I shrink from no logical conclusion from the propositions on which I stand. When I declare a principle I am willing that the reasoning of every fair man shall carry it to its legitimate conclusion.

I was about to say, Mr. Chairman, that this was an express authority to make these laws. Let us see whether it covers the whole of this case. The distinguished gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. LEWIS,] who opened this debate in a speech which seemed to me to be as fair, as compendious, and as logical as any that I have heard, put this proposition on what seemed to me to be its strongest ground, if strong ground it has. He said that this was an ultimate power of the United States Government, which resided originally in the States, and could not be exercised by the United States unless the State refused or neglected properly to exercise it. If I have misstated the proposition, I see the gentleman in his seat and I hope he will correct me. He founded that assertion on the language of some of the writers of that time, and also on the debates on the Constitution in various of the States, and in the protests which some of the States made against its adoption. But it seems to me that the very argument on which he founded it avails for its overthrow. It was an objection made by the States. Why? Because it was not an ultimate power, but because it was an original power. It was an objectionable clause to which they proposed amendments, but those amendments after consideration were not adopted, and the original Constitution remained as it was.

It seems to me that that argument, on general principles and on the language of the section itself, which says that Congress may at any time have power to make or alter such regulations, embodies a proposition of such breadth and such compass that it cannot be restricted by any suggestion that it is merely an ultimate power. Upon this subject there is authority to which I commend the gentleman. Mr. George Ticknor Curtis, a distinguished lawyer, and a democrat of the State-rights school I believe, a Hebrew of the Hebrews if I do not mistake his political position, declares in his treatise upon the Constitution that the language is so broad that that proposition cannot be maintained. Still, I state it as an argument which is founded in broad consideration of the subject, and is worthy of the attention of statesmen and legislators.

Now what is left? The argument is that the words "times, places, and manner of holding elections" are not sufficiently broad to cover the subject; that there is something in the conditions of that language which restricts the power of the General Government. Let us see. We have a Representative to be elected. We have declared the qualifications of the person who is to be elected. They are specified in the Constitution. We have declared the qualifications of the persons who are to elect. These are specified in the Constitution. We have declared the power by which the election, qualifications, and returns of that elected Representative shall be decided. That also is specified in the Constitution. What remains? Why, "time, place, and manner" of holding the election; the qualifications of the elector; the qualifications of the elected; the qualifications, elections, and returns to be decided by this House; regulation of "time, place, and manner"—do not these include all the categories of the election? Is there anything else in that proposition which the ingenuity of man or the suggestion of lawyers can draw out or illustrate? And if it be so, what answer has my friend to make to the question? If the power be not all there, where is it? All that is given to the States is given also to the United States except the mere power to declare the place of the election of the Senators.

This was not a part of original State sovereignty. All powers which are not delegated are reserved to the States or the people. That is not denied; but nobody will contend that this is a part of original State sovereignty which is reserved to the States and results to them if it is not given to the United States; for it did not exist until the Constitution was formed. It was a right which was founded on and grew out of the Constitution of the United States, and lives there or nowhere. If that power be not in the United States Government, where is it? Who can control it? Again, the language of the Constitution is "shall regulate," make regulations. Gentlemen will not disagree with me when I say that in the words "to regulate," as a technical word used in laws and constitutions, is the broadest power known to the law. The power to make regulations, the power to make rules and regulations, is the broadest power ever given to a legislative body. Under the power to make rules and regulations for the government of the Territory the whole system of our territorial governments is built up. Under the power to regulate commerce the whole subject of our interstate and foreign commerce is controlled. The power to regulate, the power to make rules, is the power to make all the laws necessary to control the whole subject.

I refer gentlemen to the tax cases. I think it was the case of Hamilton against Dillon, in one of Otto's reports, I have forgotten which volume, in which it was expressly declared by the court that this power "to regulate" is a power which covers the whole subject, and I will also read a line or two, if the gentleman will pardon me, from Mr. Justice Story's Commentaries upon the Constitution of the United States:

> The power to regulate is a general and unlimited one; the power to regulate a particular subject implies the whole power, and leaves no residuum.

Mr. CARLISLE. I will not question the correctness of the proposition the gentleman makes as to the force and effect of the words "to regulate" or the words "to make regulations," but here the power is to make regulations concerning what? Not the times, places, and manner of electing or the elective franchise itself, but simply the manner and time of holding the election.

Mr. ROBESON. It is not the power to regulate the elective franchise, I admit, but it is the power to regulate the election and I claim that that power is only exercised fully when every man, who has the elective franchise has the full, fair, and free opportunity as an American citizen under the Constitution of his country to exercise the right not to vote merely but the right of voting, and it is just as important to him to be secured the full effect of that right as it is to exercise it; it is just as important to him that that right shall not be nullified by two fraudulent votes which are thrown to nullify his vote as it is that he shall exercise the right primarily himself. It is of just as much importance that the votes shall be properly counted and their result properly registered as it is that he shall have a right to cast his vote in the first instance. Can any reasoning man deny that proposition? If he is entitled to any rights under that clause he is entitled to all the rights which the clause gives him, and therefore I say that the only logical, rational, and reasonable argument is the argument of the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. LEWIS.] You must deny it in toto or not at all. For all that there is of it is given to the United States, and if not in them, then it is nowhere.

There is another proposition which I desire to discuss, but I am conscious that I am trespassing on the patience of the committee. [Several members. "Go on!"] Before I leave the subject upon which I have been talking I must answer the proposition originally made by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. CARLISLE,] and repeated by the gentleman [Mr. SAMFORD] who just rose to interrupt me. He says if we have a right to regulate the election of members of the House of Representatives, as the power of the Legislature of a State to elect Senators is given in almost the same words and that the same power of regulation must exist as to that.

Mr. SAMFORD. Exactly the same.

Mr. ROBESON. One word in reply. You say that the words are the same in the clause—not so. There can be no quarrel between us about verbal propositions or slips of the tongue. I read the clause from the third section of the first article of the Constitution of the United States:

> The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State chosen by the Legislature thereof.

Then we come to the fourth section of the first article:

> The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators.
> The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State chosen by the Legislature thereof.

We must construe these two clauses together; the gentleman will not deny that, but he asks: "Have you adopted Legislatures as your voters by that description, and will you regulate them?" Sir, I shrink from no logical conclusion in my proposition. We have adopted the Legislature of a State, who are made voters for this purpose, but we have adopted them as the Legislature of a State, as an organized body, with its own laws, its own rules of action, its own officers, its own right of determining the validity of the election of its own members.

We have adopted the Legislature of the State as such, and we cannot by the Constitution so interfere with it as to destroy its character as a Legislature. We have adopted an organized body, an organized machine, full-armed and equipped with all its functions. We have adopted that Legislature by the virtue of the United States Constitution, and that Legislature holds its right and exercises its power by the force of that Constitution and not by the force of State constitutions and State laws. That has been held by a democratic Senate in the Indiana case, if I mistake not. It was held that this power was derived from the Constitution of the United States and could not be interfered with by State regulations or State laws. And it was so held in effect in the Stockton case.

Mr. SAMFORD. Does the gentleman then concede that Congress has no power to send deputy marshals and supervisors into a State Legislature?

Mr. ROBESON. I concede that the Congress of the United States has no power to send supervisors into the Legislatures of the various States. I say the Constitution has adopted the Legislature of the State, and Congress cannot appoint new officers for it. In regard to the election of Representatives, the United States has power if it chooses to take the whole subject in its own hands, to establish its own polls, to fix its own times, to appoint its own officers, to make its own elections, and to prescribe its own methods of certifying and returning them. But in regard to the Legislature, that Legislature is adopted as a whole, and must act according to its constitution as a Legislature. The United States Government has no right to question the title of its members or to send officers in to make a part of that body to govern and control it. But I will say one other thing, and the gentleman will understand that I have limited my answer to his question. I have said that the United States had no power to send supervisors to make part of the officers of a Legislature and to control its proceedings; but if the authority of that Legislature, in the discharge of its functions derived from the Constitution of the United States, is interfered with by riot or disturbance, by State laws or State authorities, then I hold it to be not only the right of the United States, but its bounden duty to send its marshals to preserve the peace and to see that that Legislature has a right to exercise that United States function against anything which may come in to interfere with it. [Applause on the republican side.]

Mr. CARLISLE. Will the gentleman allow me——

Mr. ROBESON. Certainly.

Mr. CARLISLE. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman to the fourth section of the first article of the Constitution, which reads as follows:

> The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the place of choosing Senators.

I desire to ask the gentleman what, in his opinion, is the extent of the power of Congress over the State Legislature from this clause while engaged in the act of electing a United States Senator? In other words, if the laws now under consideration are authorized in their application to elections of members of this House, would not the same identical laws or similar laws be authorized in their application to a Legislature when electing Senators? If not, why not?

Mr. ROBESON. Whatever power the United States Government finds it necessary to employ in order that that Legislature, acting as an organized body, with its own officers and its own members, shall exercise its United States functions, that authority and power the United States has the right to apply, and it is its duty to apply.

I especially deny and disclaim the right of the United States to appoint officers of that Legislature who shall take part in its deliberations and actions. I expressly disclaim and deny the power of the United States to look to the qualifications of the members of that Legislature or to decide whether they are proper members of the Legislature or not. I say that by the Constitution we have accepted it as the State Legislature, and every member of it might be false and fraudulent, yet we would have no power to control it. But when that Legislature is organized, and acts, I say that no outside authority, neither individual nor the power of citizens, nor the power of a State, has the right to interfere with it, and that the United States, if need be, with all its power should protect and defend it in the exercise of its functions.

Do I state my propositions clearly? Do they meet the assent of right-minded men who believe that the United States has the power to preserve this Government and to maintain the organization which our fathers gave for that Government? Why, sir, for ten years, yes, for thirteen years, there has been a law upon the statute-book which regulates the election of United States Senators. Every Senator who now sits in the other end of this Capitol was elected under that law, which declares the time, which declares the manner, which declares how the election of Senators shall be made, and how recorded, and how returned. Has it ever been questioned as unconstitutional? Has the right of any Senator been denied under it? Does it not assume to control and regulate this subject?

But—said the gentleman in illustration the other day—the United States undertook to exercise this power for the purpose of districting the various States; and when certain States refused, their refusal was recognized in this House in a report made by Mr. Douglas and sustained by a vote of this House.

The gentleman has understated the proposition. Those members were seated here upon what ground? Not upon the ground that the United States had no power to act in districting the States, but that in acting they had not gone far enough; that they had not districted the States, but had merely directed the State governments to district them, and that the United States had no power by any process to make the States do this. It was said that if the United States wanted the States districted they ought to have gone into the States and districted them themselves; so that the case referred to by the gentleman is an argument in favor of the authority of the United States instead of against it.

But there is one other doctrine which has been advanced in this debate; and gentlemen will pardon me if I pause to discuss it, for I consider that it lies at the foundation of all the arguments on the other side and is the most dangerous of them all. The gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. CARLISLE,] the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. MCLANE,] and other gentlemen on this floor have suggested that these laws cannot be put in force. Why? Because they produce riot and disturbance, and that the United States Government has no "peace" in the States that it can keep. Do I fairly state the proposition? It is that we ought not to make these laws; that they are unconstitutional, because they may be resisted by force; and when forcible resistance comes, that makes a breach of the peace which the United States and its officers ought not to interfere with, but which should be left entirely to the States. Do I fairly state the proposition?

Mr. MCLANE. So far as I am concerned, I will say to the gentleman that in any remarks which I have addressed to the House I have never made any allusion to the supervisors or marshals as producing a riot. I made the simple point that a riot or a disturbance anywhere within a State is a breach of the peace of the State, and that the Federal Government can only interfere in the manner provided for in the Constitution when called on by the governor or the Legislature of a State, or when supporting a marshal in the execution of a process, or when the marshal is engaged in the execution of a law; but I never made the slightest allusion to the deputy marshals or the supervisors being the occasion of a riot.

Mr. ROBESON. I read the language of the gentleman from Maryland:

> The question I desire to put to the gentleman is with reference to the part of his discussion preceding that point. Do I understand him to say that the Government of the United States has the right to keep the peace anywhere within a State? Do I understand him to say that there is any "peace of the United States" at all recognized by the Supreme Court of the United States?

Mr. MCLANE. That was my inquiry; and it has never yet been answered.

Mr. ROBESON. I desire to answer it now. The proposition reduced to understandable words is applied to these laws (for if appropriate and germane to this debate it must be applied to these laws) and it affirms that these laws are unconstitutional or improper.

Mr. MCLANE. I dislike to interrupt the gentleman, but I fear that he will embarrass himself if he assumes that my inquiry which he has just read had any reference to these laws at all. I made no reference to these laws. We were then discussing the Army bill, and the question before the committee was whether the troops could be used to keep the peace at the polls. That is a question which has no reference to the present bill or the present amendment. I might or might not be of the gentleman's opinion as to the power of Congress to provide for the appointment of supervisors and marshals. That is a question upon which as yet I have expressed no opinion. I am very sure the gentleman from New Jersey can appreciate the distinction I make.

Mr. ROBESON. We were at that time discussing the Army bill; and I had just asserted broadly the proposition that the bill did not affect the Army but was an attack on the civil officers of the Government; that it took away their right to summon the posse to put down riots at the polls. We were discussing then the proposition that a marshal of the United States had no power at the polls to see that the laws were executed by the force at his command; and the gentleman took the position that there was no "peace" of the United States which could be there maintained by the civil officers of the Government. If his remark did not go to that extent I am not able to see how it was appropriate or germane to the question.

Mr. MCLANE. As my friend from New Jersey is not limited as to time, I have no hesitation in seeking to have this point well defined. I say again that the point at issue between the gentleman from New Jersey and myself had no reference at all to this bill, and can have no reference to it. The gentleman from New Jersey on that occasion, in his effort to deduce from this law relating to marshals and supervisors the right to use the Army at the polls, addressed to the gentleman from Kentucky, as well as myself, the question whether, if a riot occurred at the polls, the provision of the Army bill would not prevent the President from using the Army there at all? My reply was, certainly not, if he used the Army in the manner provided for by the Constitution; that if the President waited until the governor or the Legislature of the State called upon him he could then use the Army anywhere. That was my reply; and when the gentleman from New Jersey came to respond he said distinctly that he did not know of any authority of any court in this country which authorizes the President to use the Army to keep the peace.

Mr. ROBESON. I said so then, and I say so now; but I want to say (and I shall not pause any further, but shall go right through with my argument) that I consider a proposition, in whatever language clothed, which conveys to the mind of the people of this country that the Government of the United States has no "peace" for the operation and effect of its laws, the most dangerous that can be maintained by any man—the most destructive to the perpetuity of the Government and the liberty which that Government was framed to secure. That is what I mean to say. It is an argument against the supreme law of the land, declaring it unconstitutional because it may be resisted. Why, it seems to me that it is an argument conclusive against resistance, that it is the supreme law of the land; but I will not pause to argue that subject, but will turn to the first printed statutes of the United States and refer to the law made by the founders of our Government when the men who made this Constitution were in cabinet and council and in the Legislatures of the United States, and of the various States, when Washington was President and Madison was upon this floor. I read from a statute enacted February 28, 1795:

> And be it enacted, That the marshals of the several districts and their deputies shall have the same power in executing the laws of the United States—

Not only in executing the process, but in executing the laws of the United States—> in executing the laws of the United States as the sheriffs and their deputies in the several States have by law in executing the laws of the several States.

The right to see that the laws are executed. And besides, the Executive of this great Government, the President of the United States, is enjoined by the Constitution specifically to see that the laws are enforced, and not that they give way when resisted; not that, when a man will not stand, you shall let him go and "thank God you are free of a false knave," [laughter;] but that you shall execute the laws with all the powers of the Government.

I would not allude to subjects which I may not state with candor and may not discuss with fairness; but let me in all honesty and good faith ask you whether this was not the very question which was settled by the war? Let me ask you, gentlemen, whether or not the question of whether the laws of the United States should be enforced against whatever resistance might be offered was not the very question which was submitted to the arbitrament of battle; and whether its decision is not written in letters of fire and blood on pages as grand and as splendid as any in the history of the world? [Applause on the republican side.] And do you not understand it? Is it so inherent in the nature of man that he cannot escape from the circumstances and feelings which surround him? Is it so difficult to realize a changed condition that you cannot, when you come back honestly meaning to live under our Government, adapt yourselves to the established principles of the Government? Do you not understand when you take this position that there is no "peace of the United States" which is to be maintained, while its laws are to be enforced, that you are reopening, I fear, the old question?

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. ROBESON. With pleasure.

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. Do I understand the gentleman from New Jersey to say that when power is given to the President of the United States to see that the laws are enforced the President has under that provision of the Constitution power to send the Army into any one of the States of the Union?

Mr. ROBESON. I am not discussing that power, but I do declare, however, that all the laws of the United States made rightfully in pursuance of the powers given by the Constitution are to be enforced by the President of the United States against every resistance and over every obstruction. [Applause on the republican side of the House.]

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. But that is not the question I asked the gentleman. I will again put the question, and hope he will answer. Do I understand him to say that the President of the United States has power to send the Army into any of the States to enforce any law?

Mr. ROBESON. There is already, as I have said, a law upon the statute-book which was passed by the last Congress which says that the Army shall not be employed unless specially authorized by law.

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. Let me call the attention of the gentleman to another provision of the Constitution that Congress shall provide for calling forth militia to execute the laws and to repel invasion; which declares also that it shall be the duty of Congress to organize the militia, and which further provides that when any officer of the Federal Government calls for a posse, whoever may be present shall be at the command of that officer. Now, I want to know of the gentleman whether I understand him as drawing from that provision of the Constitution that the President shall see to the execution of the laws the right of the President to send troops into any of the States.

Mr. ROBESON. I say when there is a law authorized by the Constitution of the United States and passed by the Congress of the United States to be executed, that it is the duty of the President of the United States to see that the law is enforced and executed, as I said before, over every obstruction and despite every resistance; and I say that when that time comes, when acting under the express language or a clear deduction from the powers and duties of this Constitution, Congress has passed a law, that there will be ready at the call of the Executive, from every section, a million of men if need be, to maintain the integrity and power of the laws of the United States. [Applause on the republican side.] And I believe that my friends on the other side of this House, many of them, who entered into resistance to the laws before, would be found now ranging themselves on the side of constitutional government and the powers of the National Government and authority.

May I refer again for a single moment to another democratic authority? To leave their impress upon the times in which they live, to give to the destinies of their country a direction which they will retain for ages, has been said to be the rare prerogative of a few imperial spirits, but since the time of our Revolution there never has been a man whose character and whose conduct has so indelibly impressed itself upon the government and policy of this country as Andrew Jackson. He came from the Southwest, a man of commanding character, of clear conceptions of duty, of high purpose, of warm patriotism; and when the time came for his trial, he was true not only to his own character, but to the spirit of our Government and the destinies of our people. And when resistance was made by a gallant but erring Commonwealth, claiming to act as an independent sovereignty, he recommended to Congress and obtained from them this law; and it is a direct answer to the gentleman who has last questioned me:

> That whenever the President of the United States shall be officially informed by the authorities of any State or by a judge of any circuit or district court of the United States in the State that within the limits of such State any law or laws of the United States, or the execution thereof, or of any process from the courts of the United States, is obstructed by the employment of military force or by any other unlawful means too great to be overcome by the ordinary course of judicial proceeding or by the powers vested in the marshal by existing laws—

Then it should be lawful for him, as President of the United States, to issue his proclamation, and, if that were not obeyed, to use the whole force of the United States, its militia, its Army and Navy—to do what? To enforce the laws of the United States.

Louisiana and the Southwest are found upon this floor opposing the spirit of these laws. I had hoped that the name and influence of Edward Livingstone would have lived at the mouth of the Mississippi after the refinements of modern theorists had been dissipated and lost; that the spirit of Andrew Jackson would still rule in the Southwest. Maryland, also, is on the other side in this great controversy. But among her Pinkneys, her Carrolls, her Wirts, and her Martins, the name of Roger Taney, the Attorney-General and adviser of Andrew Jackson in this great emergency, shines the most brilliant in that bright galaxy of her sons. And there is another name familiar to students of his country's history associated with the great events of which I speak. The name of a man of whom the little Commonwealth that produced him may well be proud, for he stood midway between her Dickinsons and her Reeds, her Claytons and her Bayards, the representative of the gallant little Commonwealth of Delaware in the counsels of Andrew Jackson, his friend and his adviser, and, if there be a career of pride to a family well worthy of the study and imitation of those who come after him, it is the career which Lewis McLane fulfilled in the history of his country. I trust it will remain as a shining star, guide, and monument for the direction and guidance of those who come after and represent him. With the assent and approval of these his distinguished advisers, President Jackson declared the true principles of government in the following language, which I quote from his message to Congress:

> The duties of the Government become the measure of its power, and whenever it fails to exert a power necessary and proper to the discharge of the duties prescribed by the Constitution it violates the public trust not less than it would in transcending its proper bounds.
> To refrain from executing the high and solemn duty thus imposed would neither comport with its own safety nor the rights of the great body of American citizens.
> If these measures cannot be defeated and overcome by the powers conferred by the Constitution on the Federal Government, the Constitution must be considered as incompetent to its own defense, the supremacy of the law is at an end, and the liberties and rights of the citizen can no longer receive protection from the Government of the Union.

Gentlemen of the other side, I have already appealed to you upon this question of resistance to United States laws; permit me to repeat and enforce it. You are here the leaders and representatives of the opinions of your section; communities are acted upon in masses; men are controlled by the spirit of organized society and in association together; and we all know how often in this world's history reason is dethroned by feeling and passion usurps the province of judgment. But you are better armed, you are better informed, you are better instructed, you deal more with the outside world than the people of the section you represent. Ought you not to be leaders and not followers of their ideas and opinions? Ought they not to take instruction from you, and ought you not so to teach and control them so that not only individual men but organized masses may learn to look to justice as a teacher and to strive for the right as for a victory? It may be asking much, but you have among you statesmen who in other days have made these halls vocal with their advocacy of great principles and rights; you have orators in whose blood the ardent currents of youth still flow with vehemence and power, men whose lips seem to be touched with the rod of Hermes, whose voices in hall and hustings ring out like "the silver clarion's sound." You have soldiers as brave as any that ever wore a sword; who have commanded armies greater than those with which Napoleon swept the continent of Europe, on fields more deadly than those where were decided the destinies of empires. You have statesmen fit to stand by any in the governments of the world. Will you not listen to the voice of reason and what I believe to be the teachings of your own hearts? Will you not understand that you are needlessly and unnecessarily, I think, forcing upon us a proposition which, stated broadly, is the old question whether the laws of the United States can be enforced when they are opposed; whether or not the United States has any peace which it may and can maintain. I ask you to pause upon the threshold of this question, and endeavor to take away your own minds from the impress of natural associations and natural feelings, and let your unbiased reasons and judgments have fair play.

You may be opposed here and at home. Men may revile you. Regard them not. It is but the scream of the vulture that you scare from his prey. You may, some of you, be called upon to make sacrifice for the right. Remember that the highest offering of a citizen to his country or a soldier to his cause is not always valor, but sometimes sacrifice. Remember that when the earth gaped in the Forum it was not fruits nor wine, not gold, nor precious stones, nor offerings of the forest or the field, not the gladiator, slave, nor rude barbarian, not client nor freedman, not even child nor wife that could avert the threatened danger, but the Roman citizen himself, patrician, soldier, knight, clad with the regalia and armed with the weapons of the highest type of citizen, soldier, and leader.

Mr. Chairman, I have done with the argument of this side of my proposition, and I thank the House for the attention which they have accorded me and for the patience with which they have listened while I have trespassed upon their time.

I repeat my propositions: The United States is a government of limited powers delegated to it by the Constitution, but limited only in numbers, and not in quality. Wherever they are clothed with power by the Constitution they are sovereign and supreme. Those powers are the supreme law of the land when organized in the form of law by the National Legislature, and when they are so organized they must be enforced by all the powers of the Government, or the Government will be destroyed or will remain only an object of derisive scorn for the enemies of free government throughout the world. [Great applause.]

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with close attention to the able argument of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROBESON] for two hours, certainly a very plausible argument, indeed. The gentleman from New Jersey has, in an ingenious manner, attempted to show to this House that members of Congress and Senators of the United States are officers of the Government. I did not wish to interrupt the gentleman, or I would have called his attention to the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of the United States vs. Blount, decided in the Supreme Court years ago, where it was expressly held by the court that a United States Senator was not an officer of the Government. The gentleman alluded to that decision, claiming, as I understood him, that the question was not fully made; but if I am not mistaken you will find upon reading it that the court there made the decision fairly, going into the very question which the gentleman has argued, and decided that a Senator of the United States was not an officer of the Government, but that he was an officer of the State which he represented.

Is a member of this House an officer of the Government? By whom was the gentleman sent here as a member upon the floor of this House? Was he elected by the Government? No; he and all the members here were elected by their constituents—by the people of their districts. From whom did the gentleman receive his certificate of election by which he was authorized to take his seat upon the floor of the House? From the Government of the United States? No; he received it from the governor of his State, and if he were to resign and a vacancy should occur, to whom would he tender his resignation? To the United States Government? No, sir; he would tender it to the governor of his State.

Congress has the power under the Constitution to prescribe the time for the election of Representatives. It has done that. It has the power under the Constitution to prescribe the places where such elections shall be held also. It has done that. It has the power of prescribing the manner of holding elections. It has done that in providing that the election shall be by ballot, but when Congress did that it exhausted its powers under the Constitution. A member of Congress is an officer of his State and a Senator is an officer of his State, as was decided in the case to which I have referred. The argument of the gentleman in favor of the power of Congress to supervise and control the election of members of Congress, and to send supervisors of election and deputy marshals to the polls for that purpose, is based upon the assumption that members of Congress are officers of the Government. If his proposition is not a correct one, his argument falls to the ground. Does the gentlemen claim that Congress can send supervisors and deputy United States marshals into the several Legislatures where an election of United States Senator is taking place, with power to arrest members of the Legislatures? If a member of Congress is an officer of the Government so is a Senator according to the gentleman's argument, and if you can control the election of the one because he is an officer of the Government you can control the election of the other. Again, the officers conducting an election of member of Congress are officers of the State, appointed under a State law, and executing a law of the State. Are they to be arrested by United States officials for failing to execute a law of the State? That power, however, is given to deputy marshals and supervisors under the law now under consideration.

Now, Mr. Chairman, that is all I desire to say upon that subject. I propose in the time I have to speak to call attention to the manner in which these marshals have been appointed and used, the places where they have been used, and the character of the men that served as marshals at recent elections.

At the opening of this debate at the commencement of the session my colleague from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] came to the front and made an ingenious and able speech for his party, and I heard gentlemen on this side of the House express surprise that the ablest man upon that side of the House should come to the front, or, as it was termed, upon the skirmish line.

I am not surprised, Mr. Chairman, that he was put forward to open the debate; for in doing so my colleague coined an argument for his party. He coined an excuse for the factious opposition which his party is making to the repeal of these measures, and having done that all the republican newspapers of the country have joined in the refrain, and the arguments upon that side of the House have all been of the same nature and character.

What was the excuse that was coined by my colleague? Was it that the law was just and should be retained upon the statute-book? No; for he himself declared that it should be repealed, and that he was willing to vote for its repeal. Was it because it was put on an appropriation bill and was objectionable for that reason alone? No; because it has been shown in argument in this House that the republican party in the past twelve years have put riders upon appropriation bills in the nature of new legislation to the number of more than two hundred, embracing some of the most important legislation we have had.

The argument and excuse was that putting a rider upon an appropriation bill repealing certain sections of the statutes, coupled with the implied threat that unless the President approved the bill we would stop supplies, was coercing one branch of the Government and was therefore revolutionary, a threat to starve the Government, as the gentleman put it, and not to be submitted to by the minority. Now, the gentleman had no right to speak for this side of the House. The democrats in Congress as a party have not announced their intention to do anything of that kind any more than the President of the United States has announced that unless we repeal these laws in some other way than by tacking them on appropriation bills he will veto them. Individuals on both sides have expressed their opinion as to what would be done by Congress and the President. We have as much right to say that the President of the United States has threatened Congress and undertaken by the threat of his veto to coerce Congress as to the manner of its legislation as the gentlemen have to say that Congress is seeking to coerce the Executive.

This doctrine of parliamentary revolution is not a new one with my colleague. Not more than seven years ago he declared in this House that it was revolutionary for a minority of this House to obstruct legislation, or to prevent the majority from enacting laws in the ordinary and usual way. I read from the RECORD what he said on that occasion. Then as now Congress had under consideration an appropriation bill. Then as now a minority sought to prevent the passage of the bill. Then the majority was republican—now it is democratic. He said:

> Mr. Speaker, a question has therefore arisen in its importance far above any item in this bill, and even above the whole bill. It is simply this: shall the majority of the members of this House have the right to consider and act upon great appropriation bills in the mode provided in the rules? The moment a minority, however large, deny that proposition, that moment we are in the midst of a parliamentary revolution.

What is the majority of this House attempting to do but the very thing which the gentleman describes so aptly in his remarks? "Consider and act upon an appropriation bill in the mode provided by the rules." What is it that the minority are now seeking to do but that which he described in his remarks? Yet he said then, that in denying to the majority the right to consider and act upon appropriation bills in the usual way under the rules was revolutionary. He says now, that the majority is revolutionary in its proceedings, when we in the usual mode, pointed out by the rules, are considering and acting upon an appropriation bill. This is not a new question. This question has been discussed and very elaborately argued as far back as 1819. In 1819, during the second session of the Fifteenth Congress, this identical question came before the House, and was discussed by Clay, by Barbour of Virginia, by Smith, by Harrison, and by a large number of other gentlemen upon the floor of this House.

It arose in this manner: the President of the United States in a message to Congress at the first session of the Fifteenth Congress said that he believed Congress had not the right to appropriate money nor the General Government the power to construct military roads throughout the country, and intimated in his message to Congress that he would veto an appropriation or bill for that purpose. What was done? A rider was put on an appropriation bill appropriating $10,000 for the construction of a military road, and when that question came up Henry Clay, who was Speaker of the House, came upon the floor and used this language:

> It was proper to pass the bill and present it to the President, and if he refused to sanction it, then, Mr. Clay declared, he had no hesitation in avowing that he should be ready to proceed to hostilities with the President on this point, and withhold every appropriation until he conceded the point.

That was revolutionary in Henry Clay, if we are to believe the doctrine of gentlemen on the other side of the House.

But I desire to hasten on to my remarks which refer more especially to the manner in which marshals have been used in this country. In the election of 1876, notwithstanding the provisions of section 2021 of the Revised Statutes, which provides that special marshals shall only be used in cities of twenty thousand inhabitants or upward, Attorney-General Taft issued a general order in which he announced the opinion, that notwithstanding under the provisions of that law special marshals could only be employed in cities of twenty thousand inhabitants and upward, yet under section 2022 which provided that the marshals of the United States and deputy marshals shall keep the peace, they had power to appoint an unlimited number of deputy marshals all over the country. My colleague [Mr. MCKINLEY] in discussing this question the other day on the floor of the House used language which I will ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

> This power, I admit, should be most carefully exercised and only reposed in discreet and honest hands. The appointment of deputy marshals is confined to cities of twenty thousand inhabitants or upward. They cannot be appointed in any congressional district where there is no city of that population or greater. The country districts are not immediately interested in this provision. In Ohio not more than one-fourth of the congressional districts can invoke this provision of law. In the country and smaller towns deputy marshals are not needed; here an honest election is secured by the watchful interest of a large body of fair-minded citizens. Fraud is difficult to commit where everybody is acquainted with his neighbors and where the legal voters are known to every citizen. Yet the voter in the country districts, indeed every voter throughout the land, is interested in free and honest elections everywhere, for without them his vote loses its legitimate force. An honest election in the country is of little significance if its true force is to be overcome by fraud in the large cities. Herein the interest becomes personal and immediate. In large cities the great bulk of the population are strangers to each other; few citizens know their fellow-voters, and from necessity this is the case. Fraud is easily accomplished, and is inevitable, I may say, without the most rigorous safeguards and the firm enforcement of law.

Mr. FINLEY. The gentleman announced on the floor of this House, and I notice that it has gone all over the country, that under the election laws in the country districts these special marshals cannot be employed. That is true, if a strict construction of the law was given. But under the construction put upon the statute by the Attorney-General in 1876, deputy marshals were appointed to the number of 11,615 in no less than twenty-two hundred and forty-four precincts, more than eleven thousand deputy marshals armed with the power of special marshals. I desire the Clerk to read the instructions given to the marshals by the Attorney-General, so that gentlemen may fully understand that when it became necessary to employ more than the number prescribed by the statute, which was limited to cities of twenty thousand inhabitants and upward, he found a ready means to employ an unlimited number of deputy marshals, who surrounded polling places all through the country districts.

The Clerk read as follows:

You will observe that the "special" deputies mentioned in section 2021 of the Revised Statutes have peculiar duties assigned to them, duties which otherwise do not belong to deputy marshals. Such "special" deputies can be appointed only in cities of twenty thousand inhabitants or upward.

But the duties assigned to marshals and their deputies by section 2022, or other like statute, belong to all duly appointed deputies, whether they be general or be "special" within the meaning of that and the preceding section. Deputies to discharge this latter class of duties may be appointed to any number whatever, according to the discretion of the marshal, in all States in which sheriffs have a similar power. Section 2030 has no practical bearing upon this point in States where no limit is imposed upon the appointment of deputies by sheriffs, because in such States the laws of the United States "prior to the 10th of June, 1872," left marshals also unlimited as to the number of their deputies.

In this connection I advise that you and each of your deputies, general and "special," have a right to summon to your assistance, in preventing and quelling disorder, "every person in the district above fifteen years of age, whatever may be their occupation, whether civilians or not, and including the military of all denominations, militia, soldiers, marines, all of whom are alike bound to obey you. The fact that they are organized as military bodies, (whether of the State or of the United States,) under the immediate command of their own officers, does not in any wise affect their legal character. They are still the posse comitatus."

I need hardly add that there can be no State law or State official in this country who has jurisdiction to oppose you in discharging your official duties under the laws of the United States. If such interference shall take place—a thing not anticipated—you are to disregard it entirely. The laws of the United States are supreme, and so, consequently, is the action of officials of the United States in enforcing them. There is, as virtually you have already been told, no officer of a State whom you may not by summons embody into your own posse; and any State posse already embodied by a sheriff will, with such sheriff, be obliged, upon your summons, to become part of a United States posse, and obey you or your deputy acting virtute officii.

Mr. FINLEY. Now, under that construction of the statute what was done? There were appointed, as I have said, 11,615 marshals, who were distributed in twenty-two hundred and forty-four precincts all over the country. Now, let us see where these marshals were placed and what they did. I have before me a statement showing that of these 11,615 marshals 10,874 were placed either in strong democratic precincts or in doubtful ones, at an expense to the Government of $232,034.52; that of the remaining marshals, 396 were stationed in Philadelphia, 115 in Chicago, which has since gone democratic and was then a doubtful city, and 117 in Mr. Dean's district in Massachusetts, which returned him, a democrat, to Congress that year. Let us look at the places where those deputies were stationed. In Alabama there were 586. They were stationed at one hundred and twenty-five voting precincts. How long were they employed? I have it from the report of the Attorney-General himself that they were employed fifteen days or thereabouts. Their instructions were "to preserve the peace at all meetings held to discuss political questions and to attend the different polling places at and preceding the presidential election." Their duties were "to repress all attempts to disturb the peace, and where such disturbanee actually occurred to arrest the parties guilty of any offense against any law of the United States." In Florida, northern district, there were 745 deputies, stationed at every voting precinct in nineteen counties, as appears from the report of the Attorney-General, as follows:

FLORIDA—NORTHERN DISTRICT.

The marshal reports that in addition to his regular force he appointed 745 general deputies, as follows: In the county of Escambia, 75 deputies, and in the county of Santa Rosa, 25 deputies, under the charge of a chief deputy for those counties; in the county of Washington, 25 deputies, under a chief deputy for that county; in Jackson County, 50, under a chief deputy; in Gadsden County, 50, under a chief deputy; in Leon County, 50, under a chief deputy; in Jefferson County, 50, under a chief deputy; in Madison County, 50, under a chief deputy; in Hamilton County, 6, under a chief deputy; in Lafayette County, 6, under a chief deputy; in Columbia County, 50, under a chief deputy; in Baker County, 10, under a chief deputy; in Nassau County, 30, under a chief deputy; in Alachua County, 50, under a chief deputy; in Orange and Volusia Counties, 25, under a chief deputy; in Clay, Saint John's, and in Putnam Counties, 6 each, 18.

All the voting precincts in these counties or nearly, were attended by deputies in greater or less number, as it seemed probable that their services were required.

The time of service of these additional general deputies was from date of appointment in October last until the 15th day of November, 1876.

It would appear that the results flowing from the appointment of these seven hundred and forty-five deputies stationed in every voting precinct in nineteen counties in this district were highly satisfactory to the party in whose interests they labored. The Attorney-General says:

The object of the appointment of these deputies was that a rigorous enforcement of the laws of the United States governing the elective franchise might be secured.

Each deputy appointed was furnished with printed copies of the statutes of the United States relating to the elective franchise and prescribing the duties of the marshal and his deputies in connection with elections, and with a printed copy of the letter of instructions from the Department of Justice, dated September 4, 1876, and was instructed to perform in full the duties of his office as therein directed.

The most satisfactory results accrued in nearly every part of the district from these precautionary measures which were taken to secure the peace and to protect voters.

In this connection I herewith append and make part of my remarks a table, compiled from official reports, showing the disposition of marshals in voting precincts in that election, as follows:

Statement of the number of deputy and special marshals employed in the election of 1876 and the number of polling places attended by them, together with the amount paid out of the public Treasury for their compensation.

In the State of Iowa, which was republican, there were none; in the State of Maine, republican, there were none; in the republican State of Michigan, none; in Minnesota, a republican State, none; in Nebraska, a republican State, none; in New Hampshire, in Rhode Island, in Vermont, all republican States, none; in Wisconsin none; in Colorado none; in Indiana none; in Ohio none. In Connecticut there was one; in Kansas there were three. The remainder, as I have said, were stationed in Pennsylvania, Illinois, Nevada, and Massachusetts, there being nine in Nevada. The bulk of these deputy and special marshals were stationed in three places, and I am told by gentlemen who have the means of knowing, that the bulk of those stationed in Philadelphia were in the third congressional district, the district of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL.]

Mr. O'NEILL. What is that? I ask the gentleman to repeat his statement.

Mr. FINLEY. I will do so with pleasure. I am glad the gentleman has waked up. I say I have it from good authority that the bulk of the marshals stationed at the polls in the city of Philadelphia were scattered around in the first congressional district, the district of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL.]

Mr. O'NEILL. Now, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. FINLEY. I decline to be interrupted.

Mr. O'NEILL. I deny the correctness of the gentleman's authority. I would like to know what his authority is.

Mr. FINLEY. The gentleman does not deny the statement.

Mr. O'NEILL. I think the gentleman should yield a moment.

The CHAIRMAN. That is a question for the gentleman from Ohio himself.

Mr. FINLEY. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to call attention to another branch of this subject. I have said that nearly eleven thousand of these deputy marshals out of 11,615, were stationed in democratic strongholds or in doubtful districts. I have shown that barely six hundred were stationed in republican districts or republican cities, and even there in doubtful precincts. I desire to say in this connection that of the seventeen thousand deputy and special marshals appointed and used in the elections of 1876 and 1878, every marshal, every deputy marshal, and every special marshal, so far as the facts have been developed, was a republican; and the testimony as taken in New York and Philadelphia shows that these conservators of the peace, these gentlemen who were appointed at an expense of half a million dollars, paid at the Federal Treasury, were appointed as agents of the republican party, and worked at the polls from morning till night distributing tickets and doing a general electioneering business for the republican party. Yet gentlemen tell us that their objection to the repeal of this statute is not because they have the appointment of these marshals, not because under the construction given to the law by the Attorney-General they will have the power in 1880 to appoint one hundred thousand marshals if necessary, and pay them out of the Federal Treasury; not because they having the appointing power these marshals will be republicans, working in the interest of the republican party; not because, armed with the extraordinary powers which the law gives them these republican partisans masquerading as marshals can go to the polls, and whenever in their opinion an offense against the laws of the United States has been or is about to be committed can arrest their opponents and imprison them—and can by intimidation prevent them from voting; it is not because of all that. Oh, no! But they would make the country believe the cause of this opposition is because they are so much in love with a "pure ballot." It is because they want a "pure ballot" and an honest election! Why, Mr. Chairman, at the last election in Philadelphia, as I have said once before on the floor of this House, and as has been sworn to by Marshal Kern before a committee of the Senate, there were appointed in the city of Philadelphia seven hundred and odd deputy and special marshals, who went to the polls acting in conjunction with twelve hundred republican policemen, worked for the republican party, abused and mistreated democrats. I say the testimony shows that every one of those marshals were republicans, and that a majority of them were appointed especially because of their activity in favor of the republican party.

The testimony still further shows those marshals went to the polls and worked with the policemen, and in many instances, under the pretense that democrats had no right to vote, dragged them from the polls, snatched tickets out of their hands, and committed all manner of outrages. All this appears from the testimony before that committee.

Mr. O'NEILL. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. FINLEY. I decline to yield. I am going to pay my regards in a few moments to some remarks of the gentleman made a few days since; but I do not wish to have my time taken up by him just now.

Mr. O'NEILL. The gentleman can have his time extended.

Mr. FINLEY. If that be done I have no objection.

Mr. O'NEILL. The gentleman should not make ex parte remarks and then refuse to yield.

Mr. FINLEY. Those remarks are not ex parte, as I will show. Out of the thirty-eight marshals appointed in that city the testimony of two days taken at random shows thirteen of them to have been convicted of crime.

Mr. O'NEILL. I can disprove that. [Laughter and applause on the republican side.]

Mr. FINLEY. Thirteen of them were convicted of crime, such as murder, burglary, shooting with intent to kill; two of them were keepers of houses of prostitution; two of them were keepers of doggeries; and of the whole list every one of them was an active, indefatigable worker at the polls. [Applause on the democratic side of the House.]

Mr. O'NEILL. If the gentleman will allow me I can show to the committee in one minute those statements are not based upon truth.

Mr. FINLEY. As the gentleman seems to be worried over this I will give him an opportunity in a moment. He said on the floor the other day, when I called attention to this testimony, that some of these men had been arrested for perjury.

Mr. O'NEILL. Do you want me to give you an instance?

Mr. FINLEY. Yes; I should like to have one. Who is the man?

Mr. O'NEILL. Mr. Duddy was arrested on the complaint of Mr. Springfield. I will give the gentleman the paper, if he wishes, where it all appears. Others also were arrested for perjury, and yet this committee of the Senate has not dared to return to Philadelphia and examine republican witnesses.

Mr. FINLEY. There has been but one man arrested so far as I have been able to learn, and that is Mr. John A. Duddy, who swears on page 159 of the testimony that he has been a republican all his life, and that he was appointed to office on the recommendation of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. O'NEILL. To whom does the gentleman refer; does he state that he was appointed on my recommendation?

Mr. FINLEY. No, sir; on that of your colleague.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in a few moments I will call the attention of this committee to some of the testimony taken and sworn to before the Senate committee.

Mr. O'NEILL rose.

Mr. FINLEY. I do not wish to be interrupted by the gentleman just now. As I said, it is sworn testimony taken before a committee of the other House. Witnesses were put on the stand at random, reliable witnesses, who testify to the general character of these marshals. The first witness I will call upon the stand is Mr. John P. Cahill, who was sworn and examined, and I will ask the Clerk to read an extract from his testimony.

Mr. BAYNE. I want to ask the gentleman a question. I should like to ask him whether, because twenty-six of the fifty-two democratic county treasurers of the State of Ohio commit frauds and embezzlements, that is a reason why men should not be elected to the position of county treasurer?

Mr. FINLEY. I say to the gentleman this, that we find the republicans upon the floor of this House, and in the press, seeking to make the country believe that the only reason they want marshals at the polls is because they wish to have a pure ballot. Yet after having had experience in this matter, we find that same party appointing seventeen thousand marshals at the polls, (if the fact be true, and I say it is true as far as developed,) every one an active republican worker, and in many cases of the most disreputable character. I say, sir, it is the best argument in the world that they want these laws to remain not for a "pure ballot," but for the purpose of carrying elections, and that the very object of the fight made here is to preserve these statutes in order that the republicans may reap the benefit of such appointments in the future. I now ask the Clerk to read the extract which I send up to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. O'NEILL. I wish to ask the gentleman whether it is fair to read the examinations-in-chief and not to read the cross-examinations in all the cases to which he refers?

Mr. FINLEY. I decline to yield.

Mr. Chairman, I have here a large amount of the same class of testimony which I will make part of my remarks, as follows:

WILLIAM DE BARTH AND THOMAS DONLIN, SEVENTH DIVISION, SIXTH WARD.

Martin Killack, witness.

Question. In what ward and division did you live at the time of the November election of 1878?
Answer. In the Sixth ward, seventh division.
Q. How long had you resided there?
A. About twenty-five years.
Q. Were you at the election on that day?
A. I was.
Q. Who were the deputy marshals?
A. William De Barth and Thomas Donlin.
Q. Do you know Donlin?
A. I do.

Q. How long have you known him?
A. From boyhood—probably twenty-three or twenty-four years; I knew his father.
Q. What is Donlin's character?
A. He is a drinking man.
Q. About what is his age?
A. Probably twenty-eight or twenty-nine years.
Q. Do you know whether he is an habitual drunkard?
A. He is considered such, and has been; I know that he has been; I don't know how he is now. He has been in the house of correction.
Q. For what cause?
A. For drunkenness. I think his mother put him there.
Q. Did you see any one arrested on that day?
A. I saw men threatened with being arrested; I saw nobody arrested. I saw, on one occasion, a man who was not on the assessor's list voting, and one of the officers was very rough with him. The police officers had to take the man inside to qualify him for voting. The deputy marshal then insisted on going in and arresting him inside. He told the man he would arrest him, if he did vote, when he came out. The officers qualified the man and took his vote, and one of them had to go out and threaten this marshal that if he would arrest the man he would prosecute him. So the marshal let him go.
Q. Which of the marshals was this?
A. De Barth.
Q. Was this a republican or a democratic division?
A. This was a democratic division.
Q. How many of the policemen were present there during the day?
A. I saw five or six at one time there.
Q. Were they at a distance from the polls or contiguous to them?
A. They were right up at the window where they were voting. They were there all day.
Q. Do you know of William McCaffrey being arrested?
A. I know of his being arrested and locked up all night, but that was not at that time; it was the election previous—that is, the election before the presidential election. The policemen remonstrated about his crowding about the window. He crowded them, and they locked him up and kept him until morning.
Q. Was Donlin violent?
A. He was disorderly; he was in liquor all day there, and interfered with people voting, threatening to arrest them or have them arrested.
Q. Do you remember the name of the man with whom De Barth interfered?
A. I do not know his name; he voted from Sixth street, below Race, I think.
Q. Was there any disturbance there during the day other than that which was produced by the marshal?
A. The democrats there had to keep very quiet and not say anything to them, or they would have all been locked up, I presume; so there was no disturbance. They had to keep very quiet and say nothing in order to get the vote out before the crowd came, before night came. There was a crowd at the polls in the evening there.

JAMES COLIGAN, EIGHTH DIVISION, SIXTH WARD.

Walter Brady sworn and examined.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Question. In what division and ward did you live on the day of the last November election?
Answer. In the Sixth ward, eighth division.
Q. Were you there all day?
A. Yes, sir; I was in the division all day or in the ward all day.
Q. Were you at the election-house most of the day?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Who was the United States marshal there?
A. James Coligan, an ex-police officer.
Q. What was his condition during the day?
A. Most of the afternoon he was so drunk that he could hardly walk.
Q. Was there any interference by him during the day with voters, and, if so, what was it?
A. He was challenging everybody that came there, driving them away from the polls.
Q. What did he say and do to them?
A. He said that he was United States marshal, and had more authority around there than the judge inside or the police or anybody else. I was calling the policeman's attention to the fact that they had no business within thirty feet of the polls; and I asked him if they could read, that there was a notice signed by the judges, Ludlow and Fell. They said, "Oh, to hell with that," and Coligan came up. I told them that frequently during the day. When I told this police officer that in the afternoon, Coligan said, "Oh, you have got too damn much to say; I will take you in." I said, "No, I guess you won't; you are hardly able to take yourself in, you are so drunk now." He took hold of my collar, staggered into the gutter and back again against the house. Some citizens came up and said, "Why, you have no right to take this man in, he has done nothing." "Well, I'll take you in anyhow." The police persuaded him to let me go. I had said to him, "You might get yourself into trouble. I will hold you responsible if you do me any bodily harm;" so he let me go, and that was settled.
Q. What was he going to do with you?
A. He was going to take me down below, or, I suppose, to the station-house. He was an ex-policeman and a United States marshal, too.
Q. Had he a badge on?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. What was the badge?
A. I supposed it had "United States marshal" on.
Q. Had he the badge on during the day?
A. Oh, yes.
Q. What was he going to take you away for?
A. Just for ordering the police away from there. I called their attention to the notice signed by Judges Ludlow and Fell, that they should stay thirty feet away from the polls; and they laughed at me. I told them that frequently, and in the afternoon Coligan said I had too much to say.
Q. How many policemen were in attendance in the division there generally?
A. There were four or five all the time. Sometimes the lieutenant was there himself.
Q. Where were they?
A. All crowding around the polls.
Q. What were they doing?
A. Giving out tickets and interfering with the men.

HENRY SCOTT, SECOND DIVISION, SEVENTH WARD.

Benjamin F. Levy sworn and examined.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Question. Where do you live?
Answer. At 825 Lombard street, Seventh ward, second division.
Q. Who was the marshal there?
A. Henry Scott.
Q. What is his business?
A. I think he keeps a drinking-house where the polls are held.
Q. What is his character?
A. I hardly know.
Q. Were you at the polls during the day?
A. I was.
Q. Did you see him there?
A. I did.
Q. What was he doing?
A. He was electioneering, giving tax receipts, vouching for voters.
Q. Did you see those receipts?
A. I saw some.
Q. Many of them?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Had the receipts the names of the voters in them, or were they in blank?
A. That I could not say.
Q. When a voter came up to the polls, did Mr. Scott hand him a tax receipt—did you notice him do that?
A. I saw him do that on the pavement, yes, sir.
Q. Did you see him distributing republican tickets?
A. That I don't remember.
Q. Did you notice him vouching for any one?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. He vouched for what?
A. For their residence.
Q. In the evening was he inside or outside of the polls?
A. He was inside the polls.
Q. Inside the room?
A. Inside the room.
Q. What was going on inside?
A. He was there counting the congressional vote.
Q. Were you inside?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. State what the result was inside and what Scott said.
A. When the polls closed, I went to my house, about a square from the polls. When I came back, Mr. Scott, the marshal, was taking the votes out of the box.
Q. Counting the votes?
A. Counting votes, at least he took them out and handed them to the judge. The judge read them off, and he tallied them and the clerk tallied them. The result was at the end of the count that General McCandless, for Congress, had five votes. I said, "That won't do; that I could count up double that number that came through the window. We had a great deal of talk about it, and finally they agreed to give us what the governor's vote was.
Q. Who was active about this, the marshal?
A. The marshal, yes.
Q. He handled the vote. How many votes did he say he would allow you to count for the candidate for Congress?
A. At another table they were counting the governor's vote. The democrats had about seventeen, I think, and we had noticed there were one or two scratches on the congressional vote of Mr. McCandless; and they agreed to give us what we asked for—fifteen, I think it was; fifteen or sixteen.
Q. Did Mr. Scott make any very distinct remark on the subject of what he might do if you would not take what he offered you?
A. No; he was very glad to give us what we asked for, because I said to him, "There is something wrong about this, and you know it, Mr. Scott; you had better not make any further trouble about it, but had better do just as I tell you."
Q. Did he put his hand in the box for each ticket?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. And brought out each McCandless ticket?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. But you stated that that would not do?
A. I said that that would not do, for I knew some eight or ten who voted for McCandless.
Q. How did you make the count; was there just an acceptance of the count; or were the tickets found?
A. The tickets were not found. We went over them. He proposed that. I said that I did not care anything about the count, for "I am satisfied there are only five tickets there." When I came in the room he had a handful of tickets in his hand, and was picking out with one hand and handing them to the judge. He was handling five tickets. I thought there was something wrong. I took off my coat, threw it across the bar, and turned my back to him, and while I turned my face from him the tickets had gone. I said, "What became of those tickets?" He said, "They are in the box." They were gone; they were not in the box or anywhere else.
Q. What position did Scott hold?
A. He was United States marshal.
Q. What position did you hold?
A. I was overseer.

CHARLES PRENDERVILLE, SEVENTEENTH DIVISION, FIFTH WARD.

Thomas Dwyer sworn and examined.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Question. Where did you live in November last?
Answer. At 431 Locust street, Fifth Ward, seventeenth division.
Q. Were you a qualified voter?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Who was the United States deputy marshal in that district?
A. Charles Prenderville.
Q. Were you present when a man named Shay came to vote?
A. No, sir; but I was coming out of the house, and called him back, and asked him what was the matter. He said he went up to vote, but could not vote; that the deputy marshal challenged him; and then he went up with me a second time.
Q. What was his name?
A. Michael Shay.
Q. When you then went to the polls what occurred?
A. We went up to the polls and I vouched that Shay was a qualified voter of the precinct. After I vouched for him he went inside.
Q. Did he vote?
A. He voted. Then the deputy marshal took hold of him. I asked him what he was doing that for, and he said, "I am going to lock him up." I asked him, "What for?" and he said, "Never mind," for me to get away from there, and "I'll lock you up too." I said to him to go around and see if Shay lived where he said he did. He said, "No; I'll take you too." I said, "No you won't." He said, "I will." He arrested me and wanted to hand me over to the police officers. I said, "No, I won't go with anybody but you." I said he would have to take me if anybody did. He took me to the station-house and up to the United States court, before the marshal, and had me put under bail to appear at the United States court.
Q. What became of the case?
A. I have been notified five or six times to be up there. I have been up there half a dozen times.
Q. What did you do on the election day?
A. I gave tickets out around the precinct.
Q. But for what were you arrested?
A. I said, "Charley Prenderville, go around there and see if the man lives there." He said, "No, I wont." So I put my hand on him and he arrested me.
Q. Did you know that Michael Shay lived in the division?
A. I did.

Q. Did you know that he was a qualified voter?
A. I knew he was a qualified voter, too.
Q. Was any warrant issued for your arrest?
A. No, sir; he just took me right away from the polls.
Q. How long were you kept in custody?
A. Only about ten or fifteen minutes; I was bailed out right away again. They kept Shay pretty much all of the afternoon. I went up to the court to get a writ of habeas corpus for him. I got the writ and went to the station-house at Fourth and Union streets. The lieutenant said that Shay was not in.
Q. What did Prenderville do at the poll?
A. He was challenging voters all day; challenging democratic voters just as fast as they would come up.
Q. Was he electioneering?
A. He was electioneering.
Q. How long was Shay in the station-house?
A. He was arrested at about twelve or one o'clock; he was in the station-house until about three o'clock, I guess.
Q. What became of his case?
A. It was quashed right away. The United States marshal did not make any charge against him when we got into court, and he was discharged. Mr. Cassiday asked the marshal if he had anything to say, if he wanted to push Shay, and he said no. This was in the court-house in Sixth street, below Chestnut, which was where Shay had then been taken.

JAMES BROWN, FOURTEENTH DIVISION, FOURTH WARD.

Charles S. Lincoln sworn and examined.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Question. What is your official position?
Answer. I am clerk of the United States district court.
Q. Have you been such for some years?
A. I have been clerk of that court for four years, and have been in the office as assistant clerk for seventeen years.
Q. Will you turn to your records and tell us whether James Brown was convicted of any offense in your court; and, if so, when, and what it was?
A. [After referring to a record-book.] James Brown was convicted of personating and voting in the name of another person.
Q. What was the date of conviction?
A. The finding of a bill was on the 19th of November, 1872; the date of conviction (verdict) was November 22, 1872; the date of sentence was December 14, 1872.

By Mr. MCDONALD:

Q. He was convicted on what date?

By the CHAIRMAN:

Question. Where do you live?
Answer. In the Second ward, twenty-first division.

A. Yes, sir. I was United States supervisor.

A. Republican, I believe. He was inclined to be a little troublesome. I did not know he was marshal until about ten o'clock.
Q. How did you come to know it then?
A. The police officers arrested the democratic supervisor of our division, and as the supervisor went across the street he called me to get him bail. I went across and he [Hilferty] followed me across and said, "If you interfere I will lock you up." I said, "What is your authority?" and he pulled out a badge, a little one—a piece of muslin.
Q. Did he know you were a United States officer?

WILLIAM M'GOWAN, TWENTY-THIRD DIVISION, SECOND WARD.

Charles Murray sworn and examined.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Question. Do you live in the twenty-third precinct of the Second ward?
Answer. Yes, sir.
Q. Were you there on election day?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Did you see this difficulty which occurred?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Were you outside?
A. I was outside electioneering the ticket. Mr. Campbell and Mr. Tomlinson blockaded the window up.
Q. Were they police officers?
A. Yes, sir. I went in and told Mr. Campbell to come out and try to get the votes in. Mr. McGowan was standing on the street and never interfered. He never showed any badge. Mr. Campbell came out and got hold of Officer Campbell. He would not go away from the window. Mr. Campbell asked me to assist him to get the policeman away, and I went to do it. When coming on down a couple of police officers came and arrested me and Mr. Campbell.
Q. What were the officers doing when the affair began?
A. The police officers were standing up by the window.
Q. Who wanted to vote?
A. There were two or three who wanted to vote.
Q. Where those men who wanted to vote at that time citizens of the precinct?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Do you know they were citizens of the precinct who were trying to get to the window to vote?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. What prevented them from putting their votes in?
A. Mr. Campbell was standing right up by the window.
Q. How were the policemen dressed?
A. In full uniform.
Q. Who else was there with the policeman Campbell?
A. He was there and the other man with the window-book on the other side.
Q. Who was he?
A. I forget his name.
Q. Did you ask policeman Campbell to clear the way?
A. I asked him three or four times and then I went to get Mr. Campbell to do it.
Q. Did you call for McGowan, the marshal, to come?
A. I did not know that there was any marshal about there.
Q. Had the marshal a badge on at that time?
A. No, sir.
Q. Did you know McGowan?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Was McGowan close to the window all that day?
A. He was electioneering the ticket all day.
Q. Electioneering what ticket?
A. The republican ticket.
Q. When did you first see the badge on McGowan?
A. I do not think I saw the badge on him until I heard, near night, that he was a marshal.
Q. Where did these people take you and Campbell?
A. To the station-house.
Q. How long did they keep you there?
A. From three quarters of an hour to an hour.
Q. Did you give bail?
A. Mr. Moran went our bail to appear the next morning at seven o'clock.
Q. Did you go the next morning?
A. I went there the next morning. I was a little late, the magistrate would not take bail, and I had to go the next morning.
Q. Did you go the next morning?
A. Yes, sir; I went again and entered bail.
Q. Have you heard of the case since?
A. I have never been called on.
Q. Did you see the policemen since?
A. I saw Mr. Lynch, the policeman, since. He is the one who said, "You Irish son of a bitch, I will blow your head off."
Q. Where was that?
A. On Tenth street, below Carpenter.
Q. How came he to say that?
A. I wanted to go to the alderman's and get a hearing before being locked up.
Q. What was Mr. Moran doing there?
A. Moran wanted me to go to the alderman's office and get a hearing, and the policeman pulled a pistol and drew it upon me.
Q. He pulled a pistol out and drew it upon you?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Did you go along then?
A. I went along with him.
Q. Were you resisting and trying not to go?
A. No, sir; I only wanted them to take me first to the alderman's office and give me a hearing before they locked me up.
Q. How came the policeman to pull out a pistol? What were you doing then?
A. The crowd gathered around, and they wanted to lock me up.
Q. Did the crowd cause any difficulty there?
A. No, sir.
Q. What caused the difficulty there at the polls?
A. Policemen blockading the window up.

ROBERTS, SIXTEENTH DIVISION, THIRD WARD.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Question. Where did you live at the November election last year?
Answer. At 740 South Twelfth street, Third ward, sixteenth division.
Q. Were you arrested?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. By whom?
A. By a deputy marshal.
Q. Who was the deputy marshal?
A. Roberts.
Q. What were you arrested for?
A. I came up to the poll to vote. He challenged me on my tax receipt.
Q. Who challenged you?
A. Roberts, the marshal. I handed in my tax receipt. It was examined and inspected by the judge and inspector of the poll, and was passed as a genuine one. My vote was received; but as my tax paper was handed out to me again the deputy marshal made an attempt to take it, but somehow or other I got the best of him and got it and put it in my pocket. 'Said he, "You are my prisoner." He took me and locked me up. He called the assistance of the police.

Q. Where did he take you?
A. To the station-house.
Q. How long were you kept there?
A. They kept me there from six at night until ten o'clock next morning.
Q. You attempted to vote, then, about a quarter to six in the evening?
A. At about a quarter to six o'clock.
Q. How long had you lived in that division?
A. For four years.
Q. Your tax receipt was passed into the room through the window and was there passed upon as good?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Then your vote was received, when Mr. Roberts arrested you and took you and locked you up?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. What became of the matter afterwards?
A. The next morning I had a hearing before the United States commissioner and it was put to court. From the 2d of November to the 3d of March they kept me busy running to court, and the case has not come up yet. When I last made my appearance there I asked them if they had any idea of when my case was going to come up.
Q. To what official did you go?
A. I asked the prosecutor of the court if he had any idea when that case of mine was to come up, (I thought it was time for them to find out something about it; they had kept me running there two or three times a week;) he told me to stay at home until I was sent for. I said I understood they would not send for me, as I was not a witness in the case; I was the accused. He said, "Stay at home until you are sent for anyhow." They haven't sent for me yet.

As to Roberts, another witness testifies:

Question. Was he distributing tickets?
Answer. Yes, sir.
Q. Did he have the window-book?
A. He did.
Q. Did he keep charge of the window-book?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. What was his conduct or behavior, respectful and orderly, or overbearing and rude?
A. He was intimidating voters, threatening them, almost every voter that came up.
Q. What did he say?
A. He threatened to arrest those who voted on a white tax receipt.
Q. Were you there when he made the arrest of John Johnson?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Do you know of his making any other arrests?
A. Yes; he made two others.
Q. What became of the other arrests?
A. He took the parties before the United States marshal, I believe, where they entered bail and got out.
Q. Where was Roberts employed?
A. He is employed in the gas office just now—a clerk there, I believe.
Q. How many policemen were there in that precinct on that day?
A. Between ten and fourteen.
Q. In uniform?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Were there more deputy marshals than one there?
A. There were two.
Q. Was there any disturbance at the polls there?
A. None at all, only what a police officer made. The police officer came there between half past five and half past six o'clock in the evening, and said he was sent there to clear the polls. At that time there was a string of voters there, I believe five or six, and he pushed all the democrats out of this line, and pushed them away. He pushed on the democratic side, and said he could lick any son of a bitch around those polls.

CHARLES HERR, SECOND DIVISION, TWENTY-NINTH WARD.

Witness, John Trainer.

Question. Do you know the marshal who was there?
Answer. Yes, sir.
Q. Who was he?
A. Charles Herr.
Q. Have you known him any length of time?
A. I have known him about five years.
Q. What is his character and reputation, as far as you know him?
A. Very bad.
Q. Has he been arrested?
A. He has been arrested to my knowledge for receiving money under false pretenses.
Q. More than once?
A. Not to my knowing.
Q. Was this recently?
A. About a year ago.
Q. What occurred during the day when you were there in reference to a Mr. Emery?
A. After I had deposited my vote I stepped aside and was standing there when Mr. Emery came up to vote; and when he went up to put in his vote this Herr came up, got hold of him, pulled him away from the window, and told him he had no right to vote; that he did not live in the division. He squared off to fight him, [Emery,] hallooed for the police to come and arrest him, and Mr. Emery got rather frightened and ran down to the corner of the little street that he lived in, with the marshal and the police after him. I followed after Mr. Emery to see what they wanted to arrest him for; I saw that he had not done anything at the polls to be arrested for. I went to his house and asked his mother if he lived there. She said yes; that that was his home, and he had no other home. I told him to come around to vote, that he had a perfect right to vote, and I would see that he got his vote in; but he was rather frightened, and would not come. Then in the afternoon a gentleman told me that Mr. Emery had been arrested. I asked him for what and by whom. He told me that it was for trying to vote illegally in the division, and that the arrest was made by the police and the marshal of the United States in the division. I went around to the station-house and found it was so, and then went to Mr. Pritner and asked him what it was best to do about the matter; asked him if he knew the man, and knew that he was a resident of the division. He said he did, and said it would be best to have an order from the court. I went down and got a writ of habeas corpus to make them take his vote. It was to be served upon the police lieutenant of the district, and was returnable at six o'clock that evening, at Judge Fell's house, as it was too far to go to the court-house.
Q. What did you then do?
A. When I came up town I went to Mr. Pritner and told him what I had done. Mr. Pritner informed me that he had gone to the station-house and had bailed the gentleman, and had got him out and had taken him down and voted him.
Q. Do you know whether this man Emery was a qualified voter?
A. I do.
Q. Then this writ of habeas corpus that you got out did not get his vote in—he got it in without that?
A. He got his vote in without any writ.
Q. Had Herr any connection with the voting in any way?
A. He was soliciting votes.
Q. Had he in his possession republican tickets?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Had he a badge on as a republican distributer?
A. He had a badge on under his coat. I only saw it on one occasion when the lappel of his coat was thrown aside.
Q. A republican badge?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Did you see him soliciting men to vote?
A. Yes, sir; I saw him go and ask men to vote and hand them a ticket.
Q. Was there any disturbance at that time?
A. No more than he made by pulling the man away and not allowing him to vote.

I have here a statement also of the number of marshals, where they were used, and the amount paid them, which I will also make part of my remarks. As I notice my time is nearly expired I will have read only one other paper, the testimony of Mr. Charles F. Miller, with reference to the character of Phillip Madden, of the Fourth ward; of Francis McNamee, of the Eighth ward; of Daniel Redding, of the First ward; of Mr. Pitts, of the Seventh ward; of Henry Scott; of R. F. Springfield, of the Fifteenth ward; of Michael Slavin, of the Fifth ward. This man Springfield, the committee will observe, is the man that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. O'NEILL] said was arrested for perjury. He was a republican marshal of election, put there to help preserve the purity of the ballot-box.

The Clerk read as follows:

Charles F. Miller sworn and examined.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Question. In what precinct do you live and vote?
Answer. In the seventeenth division of the Nineteenth ward.
Q. Were you in that precinct on election day?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. State what occurred there with regard to the conduct of the marshals, if anything.
A. About five o'clock a gang of repeaters came there—three or four of them—brought there by a letter-carrier. One of them came up to vote in the name of Mr. Motts. He was challenged, as it was said he was not the man. I went up and looked at him. I knew Mr. Motts, and I told this man he was not the man and he would have to go away from there. So I took hold of him and took him around to magistrate Field's. He gave the name of Harrison; he had a hearing and was committed to prison. I took him down, and at that time got talking to him. I knew his face but did not know his name. Then he said his name was McCracken. He was taken to prison. The United States marshal there did not interfere. It was very quiet before that. About that time there was a little squabble in consequence of some man who came up with the workingmen's ticket hitting this man of whom I have spoken, but I stopped him.
Q. How do you know that it was a letter-carrier who brought that man there?
A. I saw him; I know him. I have seen him in uniform.
Q. Was he in uniform then?
A. No, sir.
Q. What is your official position?
A. I am the murder detective of Philadelphia.
Q. In connection with what office?
A. The district attorney's.
Q. Do you know Phillip Madden?
A. Yes sir.
Q. Where does he live?
A. On Bainbridge street, I think, above Seventh, in the Fourth ward.
Q. In what division?
A. I cannot tell; I think it is the fourth.
Q. What is the character of Philip Madden?
A. I think he is one of the worst men in Philadelphia.
Q. In what respect?
A. He is a dangerous man; he is violent and dangerous.
Q. How long has he been out of prison?
A. I think probably eight months or a year. He was convicted of highway robbery, I think.
Q. Do you know of this man Madden having shot anybody?
A. I did not see him shoot anybody. I heard he shot a boy at one time.
Q. Was he in prison, to your knowledge, more than this one time?
A. He was in prison twice.
Q. What is his general character; is it that of a peaceable citizen, or that of a desperate, bad man?
A. His character is that of a desperate, bad man.
Q. Do you know Francis McNamee, of the Eighth ward?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. What is his character?
A. I arrested him for being concerned in five robberies, about seven years ago, and convicted him for having stolen goods in his possession. He was sentenced, I think, to eighteen months. I am not certain about the length of the sentence.
Q. Do you know in what precinct he lives?
A. No, sir; he lives in the Eighth ward, somewhere about Locust street.
Q. Do you know Joseph Hilferty?
A. No, sir.
Q. Do you know Daniel Redding, of the First ward?
A. Yes, sir; very well. I guess everybody here knows him.
Q. What is the general reputation of Daniel Redding?
A. He is considered to be a very bad, dangerous man. He has been tried for murder.
Q. How long since was he tried for murder?
A. In 1869.
Q. Is his reputation still bad or good?
A. Bad.
Q. Do you know a Mr. Pitts?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Of what ward?
A. The Seventh ward. He keeps a place in Lombard street above Eighth, on the south side.
Q. What is his business?
A. He keeps a gambling-place, and things of that kind.
Q. Is he a colored man?
A. He is a colored man.
Q. He keeps a gambling house. Is it a drinking house?
A. Yes, sir. He has been arrested once or twice, and was tried before.

Q. For what offense has he been tried?
A. I cannot remember; but he was arrested once or twice.
Q. To what ward does Daniel Redding belong?
A. To the First ward. His name does not appear upon the list of marshals as having been put down for the precinct in which he lives, but I think he lives in the twenty-third precinct; on Mildred street below McKean, I think.
Q. Is the name of Frank McGowan on the list of marshals here before the committee?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Is the name of Philip Madden on the same list of marshals?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Do you know Henry Scott?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Who is he?
A. He keeps a hotel in Lombard street.
Q. Is he a white or colored man?
A. A colored man.
Q. Do you know anything of him?
A. His reputation is bad; I am forgetting about him.
Q. Do you know Rodney F. Springfield?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Is he of the Fifteenth ward?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. What is his reputation?
A. He was tried for killing a colored man, for shooting him.
Q. Has he ever been convicted?
A. I don't think he has.
Q. He was never convicted?
A. No, sir; not to my knowledge.
Q. Has he been tried and acquitted?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Then the inference from that would be that he was not guilty of any such offenses?
A. Oh, but he has so many good swearers. If all the gentlemen here would swear against him he would have three times that number to swear that he was not there.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FINLEY] what disposition he proposes to make of the remaining ten minutes of his time?

Mr. FINLEY. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BELTZHOOVER] desires it, I will yield to him the balance of my time.

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. I had intended to follow the gentleman, but as the time is limited to ten minutes I will not occupy it but yield it to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, I have here a short sketch of the character of some of the deputy marshals appointed by the republicans as "purifiers of the ballot at Philadelphia" during the last election, compiled from the testimony taken before the Wallace committee, as follows:

Charles Oliphant, marshal second division, Twentieth ward, drunk on election day and insulting voters; seized Mr. Hackenberg without cause.

Charles Herr, marshal second division, Twenty-ninth ward, character and reputation bad, had been arrested for crime. On election day he arrested a voter, who was released by Judge Hare and voted. Herr wore a badge, and solicited votes as a republican.

Arthur Vance, marshal eighth division, Fifth ward, arrested Hutchinson, a voter, without cause. Vance was a notorious republican worker.

John Homeyard, marshal sixth division, Sixth ward, drunk, and arrested voters without cause; drew a club on a democrat for challenging a negro repeater. The police blocked up the poll, acted in concert with Homeyard, and brought voters to polls. Homeyard vouched for republican voters and distributed republican tickets. Shriver, a United States revenue officer, kept republican window-book.

J. R. Desano, marshal first division, Fifth ward, drunk all day; too drunk to arrest any one. There were five policemen at these polls. Desano never voted in that division before that day.

James Brown, marshal fourteenth division, Fourth ward, record of his conviction in 1872, for voting illegally, produced. Proof was made that he voted twice on the same day.

William Augustus, fourth division, Eighth ward, acted as marshal, assuming authority as such, but was not on the list; a republican worker.

Joseph Hilferty, marshal twenty-first division, Second ward, held the republican window-book all day and electioneered; threatened to arrest the democratic United States supervisor for procuring bail for a legal voter who had been arrested.

William McGowan, marshal twenty-third division, Second ward. A policeman blocked up the voting-window, and a democratic United States supervisor ordered him away, when McGowan and the policeman seized him and locked him up in the station-house on a charge of interfering with officers. The case was never tried. McGowan is employed in the gas office and paid by the city.

Charles N. Miller, detective, testified that in seventeenth division of Nineteenth ward a gang of repeaters were brought to the polls by a letter-carrier; he had one of the gang arrested.

Philip Madden, marshal Fourth ward, one of the most dangerous men in the city; has been in prison twice, once for highway robbery and the second time for shooting a colored boy.

Francis McNamee, marshal Eighth ward, had been arrested for five different robberies.

Andrew Lenoir, marshal First ward, a warrant has been issued for him for larceny.

Daniel Redding, marshal First ward, a bad and dangerous man; had been tried for murder.

Henry Pitts, marshal Seventh ward, a colored man who keeps a gambling-house and been arrested twice; distributed republican tickets and vouched for voters.

R. S. Str ngfield, marshal Fifteenth ward, had been tried for shooting a man; character very bad.

Michael Slavin, marshal Fifth ward, a thief and notorious repeater; had been arrested for subornation of perjury but never tried.

William Glenn, marshal Nineteenth ward, superintendent of Norris square, and paid by the city for his duties.

Enoch Baker, marshal second division, Third ward, arrested John Carroll, a legal voter, without cause, and locked him up; Carroll was discharged after a hearing.

J. Roberts, marshal sixteenth division, Third ward, arrested John Johnson, a legal voter, and locked him up all night; case never tried. Roberts electioneered for the republican ticket; was a clerk in the gas office and paid by the city; there were also twelve to fourteen policemen at that poll all day, and they blocked up the poll.

Andrew Jackson, marshal twenty-second division, Thirtieth ward, employed in the gas works under the city. Ackerman, republican judge of elections, acted as United States supervisor and judge, and refused to vacate the place of judge after written orders by Marshal Kerns and Judge Elcook. Jackson arrested Feeny, who had been legally appointed judge, and took him away from the polls. Did not return to get possession until 2 p. m.

C. A. Pinnexson, marshal Thirtieth ward, aided in arresting Feeny.

—— Taylor, marshal fifteenth division, Third ward, arrested Sweeny for illegal voting and locked him up; charge was found to be false and he was released and voted.

James Calligan, marshal eighth division, Sixth ward, so drunk in the afternoon he could not walk; seized a qualified voter by the collar and staggered with him against the wall; policeman brought a repeater to the polls, who was arrested, as was the policeman.

Henry Scott, marshal second division, Seventh ward, a man of bad repute; colored; keeps a low drinking house; electioneered and gave out tickets and tax receipts; was inside at the counting of the vote, and took tickets out of the box; only 5 votes came out for the democratic candidate for Congress; democratic overseer contested this, and Scott allowed 17 to be counted for him.

Thomas Donlan, marshal seventh division, Sixth ward, an habitual drunkard, and a graduate of house of correction for this; was drunk all day.

William D. Barth, marshal; same place, blocked up the voting window and would not allow legal voters to come to it; there were two United States marshals and six policemen at this poll.

John Archer, marshal twenty-seventh division, Nineteenth ward, acted as United States supervisor; was on both lists and paid as both officers; when a marshal wanted during the day to arrest a republican repeater he did not make known that he was a deputy marshal; had no badge; heavy republican division; no policemen there.

Joseph T. Fuller, marshal sixth division, Twenty-third ward, a guard in the house of correction, and paid by the city.

William Stringfield, marshal thirty-second division, Twenty-fourth ward, arrested a legal voter and took him to the magistrate's, where he was discharged; Stringfield was discharged from employment the day before election for stealing.

Charles Male, marshal seventh division, Eleventh ward, keeps a house of prostitution.

Abraham Hoffman, marshal Eleventh ward, a repeater, and had kept a house of prostitution within a year; a thief.

William Eckenbrim, marshal Eleventh ward, arrested for larceny; bill ignored.

David Beckman, marshal thirty-second division, Nineteenth ward, held the republican window-book and electioneered; threatened to put the democratic United States supervisor out of the room for challenging a voter; the vote was rejected, and the voter did not return.

William B. Ahern, marshal ninth division, Twelfth ward, employed in the United States revenue office.

—— Fleming, marshal sixth division, Eighteenth ward, distributed republican tickets and challenged voters; a legal vote was rejected on his challenge; intimidated many democratic voters.

William Boehm, marshal eighteenth division, Twenty-ninth ward, plug inspector, and paid by the city; electioneered and distributed republican tickets.

Charles Prenderville, marshal seventeenth division, Fifth ward, arrested a legal voter; case never tried; electioneered for republicans all day.

This was the record of a two days' investigation at Philadelphia.

I also attach as part of my remarks the following statement, clipped from a newspaper in this city, showing the number of marshals used at the elections in 1876 and 1878, and when appointed, together with the sums expended out of the Treasury for their pay. In a speech near the close of the Forty-fifth Congress the gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. Durham, gave the same statement, remarking that it was correct and obtained from official sources:

HOW THE REPUBLICANS CARRY ELECTIONS—SOME VALUABLE STATISTICS CONCERNING THE CORRUPTIONS PRACTICED ON THE BALLOT-BOX BY MARSHALS AND SUPERVISORS.

After several days' diligent search through the document-rooms of both Senate and House, The Post has managed to get together a more complete exhibit of the supervisors and deputy marshals employed at congressional elections than has yet been published. Not a single report of any kind in regard to the supervisors and marshals of elections has ever been issued from any of the Government Departments, except in response to a mandatory resolution of Congress. Though hundreds of thousands of dollars have been expended for supervisors and marshals, no Attorney-General has ever volunteered any information concerning them. Several House resolutions calling for detailed statements of the number of marshals employed in 1876, and the amounts paid them were not replied to at all; but the democratic members who had undertaken to find out this secret of the "Department of Justice" persisted, and three months after the adoption of a resolution Mr. Taft, then Attorney-General, sent in a report which seemed to have been made up with the view of concealing the information requested.

He submitted a lot of extracts from the letters or reports of the various United States marshals, giving reasons for the employment of election deputies and a few figures showing how many of the latter had been employed, but he gave nothing about the amount of money expended. Subsequent resolutions, repeating the demand for information in detail, brought responses from the Department of Justice and the Treasury Department, and by going through all of them The Post has been enabled to formulate the tables given below. Every one of the reports on this subject to Congress contains some excuse for not furnishing a complete showing of the information demanded. Either the marshals had not rendered all their accounts or there was some other pretext for omitting some of the figures. The reports sent last omit items of expenditure that were contained in those previously furnished, indicating that the heads of the Departments do not intend to let the people know the entire cost of the radical election machine if they can avoid it. Take, for illustration, the official reports or statements for the congressional election of 1876 sent to the present Congress, and by comparing them with the one furnished by Taft discrepancies amounting to thousands of dollars are found.

The tables given below contain only the figures of expenditure that have been reported to Congress in the various documents submitted from the Attorney-General's and Treasury Departments. They are undoubtedly districts in which money was paid for deputy marshals that have not been included in the exhibits. For instance, in the several official exhibits no expenditure for deputies is charged against Arkansas; but the marshal of the eastern district of that State, in his report embracing the congressional election of 1876, claimed allowance for seven hundred and eighty-five deputies employed one day, namely, November 7. The marshal of Florida for the same year reported that he employed seven hundred and forty-five deputies from the latter part of October until the 15th of November, but not a dollar is put down as having been expended for that State. In making out these reports of expenditures the departments seem to have adopted the rule of reporting only districts from which the accounts had been adjusted, and this would in each case omit a portion of the expenditures. In the table for 1878 the chief supervisor's expenditures for New York City are omitted for the reason that the amount had not been reported to Congress. That, as all the figures show, is the district in which the amount has always been greatest, and perhaps it was the size of the pile that had been used that prompted Mr. John Sherman to omit it from his statement.

Amount paid United States commissioner for services under election laws in New York city						2,267 95
Total expenditures reported for 1878						222,714 24

There is nothing on record throwing any light upon expenditures of this character prior to 1876, except the report of the Caulfield committee of the Forty-fourth Congress. That committee compiled a statement of expenditures from John I. Davenport, chief supervisor in New York, for the election of November 5, 1872, in that city. It was shown that the amount expended in New York City alone under the Federal election laws for that election was nearly $120,000, and this, very probably, is a fair illustration of the manner in which the public money was used all over the country to defeat Greeley and elect a republican Congress. A summary of the expenditures was as follows:

Amount paid deputy marshals on district rolls	$50,590 00
Amount paid deputy marshals on supplementary rolls	7,155 00
Amount paid supervisors of election on district rolls	23,885 00
Amount paid deputy marshals on headquarters roll	3,925 00
Total	85,555 00
To extraordinary expenses incurred in enforcing the acts of Congress in relation to elections at the election held in the city of New York on the 5th of November, 1872	33,434 36

This makes a total of $118,989.36 that was expended in that city at the one election, and the report contains the accounts, which show that the marshals of each assembly district expended a large proportion of the money for "carriage hire."

The "close" congressional districts were not only industriously worked for the republicans by deputy marshals, but Mr. George C. Gorham, as his testimony has shown, had a watchful eye upon them. He, as executive officer of the republican congressional committee, collected $106,000, of which $93,000 was squeezed out of the Department clerks in Washington. The United States marshals were in communication with Mr. Gorham, and during the canvass some of them came all the way to Washington to get directions as to how they should use their power for the "good of the party."

Mr. Gorham's testimony, and that of his assistants, before the Wallace committee, shows that the assessment plan was vigorously plied in every one of the Departments, and no person who drew money from the Government was overlooked. Solicitors were sent through each Department several times, and those employés who failed to pony up to them were subsequently reminded by circulars of the "debt of honor" they were expected to pay. The money was raised to be used in carrying the House for the republicans. This was openly announced, and Mr. Gorham remembered having sent the following amounts to the congressional districts named:

Maine	$5,000
New Hampshire	1,750
Vermont, third district	500
Connecticut, third district	1,000
New Jersey, first district	1,500

Total	53,900

In addition to the $106,000 which he received in and disbursed from Washington, Mr. Gorham testified that he authorized the various State committees to assess the Government employés within their respective States, and use the moneys raised in aid of republican congressional candidates. Adding the collections by the local committees to the amount raised by Gorham, the sum must have reached $150,000, which was distributed where it would do the most good.

In addition to cash collected from Government clerks, the republican party had the benefit of $200,000 of public money, which was used to pay deputy marshals to work for the candidates of that party. The election marshals of Philadelphia may be taken as a fair sample of them all, and the facts brought out by the Wallace committee.

I desire to call the attention of the committee to another fact in connection with the same subject. In addition to these marshals that were appointed in the manner I have indicated, it has been developed by the same testimony that a large election fund was levied on the employés of the Government and sent out where it would do the most good; and it is curious to observe where the money went in connection with where the marshals were appointed. It would appear that they went hand and glove together for the purpose of preserving a pure ballot. One hundred and six thousand dollars were collected and sent out to the various parts of the country at the last congressional election. I desire to read from a statement made by a republican as to what use is usually made of moneys when raised in large quantities. Speaking of the election in Chicago, he says a prominent republican who was closely identified with the inside work of the campaign management disposes of the whole question of fraud by the democratic party at the Chicago election in this statement:

The cry of fraud is absurd and puerile on the face of it, and for this reason, there was no inducement for the perpetration of fraud. I have had some experience in handling election tools, and I tell you it is costly and has to be paid for cash down. No repeater or illegal voter commits a crime on the ballot for love of any candidate or on account of any party enthusiasm. He wants money for his work. Now, I happen to know that the democrats of Chicago had little or no money.

This was said in respect to the election in Chicago. This man said that repeaters and ballot-box stuffers, men who work in an illegal and illegitimate manner, had to be paid cash down. And $106,000 were raised by contributions from the employés of this Government! What for? Was it to pay cash down for repeaters? Was it for the purpose of purchasing voters? The legitimate expense of the campaign could not amount to the enormous sum of $106,000. It has been shown that $9,000 went into my State, and I can speak for one district of that State. It has been shown that in some districts $13,000 were used. Why, in my district the bare campaign expenses that were paid by the democratic party amounted but to about a few hundred dollars, yet the legitimate expenses were all paid. What honest use could be made of $13,000 to $15,000 in a single district? Yet such was the fact in the State of New Jersey. The State from which the gentleman who has just preceded me comes used at the last election $13,250 for marshals, and $500 were sent from this campaign fund. In the State of Maryland in a single district there were $7,746 used for marshals, and $1,250 were sent out of this campaign fund.

So you can follow it all through, Mr. Chairman. In the State of South Carolina it has been shown by the same testimony that $1,380 were spent for marshals. One thousand dollars were sent into Mr. Rainey's district, $500 into the fifth district, and $200 to the State at large. And you will observe if you take the pains to hunt it up and compare the places where the money went which was sent out by this committee with the places where the greatest number of marshals were used, you will find, I will venture to say, with scarcely any exception, that in doubtful districts there were the greatest number of marshals placed and there was sent the largest amount of this fund.

In conclusion, I wish to say it will never do for our republican friends, after the use that they have made of this law, to say that they have no motive in their resistance to this repeal other than a desire to preserve the purity of the ballot. It is too clearly evident that the purpose of the republican party is, if this law is retained upon the statute-book, to make use of it for party purposes in a partisan way in the coming election, and I say, Mr. Chairman, that the country fully understands that to be their purpose.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MILLS. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BLACKBURN reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. Mr. ATHERTON. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole, to resume the consideration of the legislative appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. BLACKBURN in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SAPP] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. SAPP. I yield a portion of my time to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. LAPHAM.]

Mr. LAPHAM addressed the committee. [His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

Mr. FORT. Mr. Chairman, we have come to reconsider whether Congress should regulate by law or in any way supervise the election of members of this House.

Our State-rights friends on the other side of the Hall claim that it should be left to the States entirely to conduct such elections. And some deny the constitutional authority of Congress in this regard. They fly to the Constitution and interpret it to mean nothing.

Almost the first thing we find in that instrument, article 1, section 4, is a provision that—

Congress may at any time make or alter regulations for electing Senators and Representatives, except as to the place of choosing Senators.

This seems to read like pretty plain English, and one not trained in State-rights schools would not have discovered that it meant nothing at all. If there can be any doubt about the construction of this provision, then I confess that the gentlemen who framed our Constitution were very skillful in choosing language to conceal their real meaning. People unschooled in the mysteries of strict constructionists, or more properly speaking the blank constructionists, would suppose the authors of our Constitution meant just what they said. Our ingenious friends who believe the Constitution of the United States is only blank vellum have already been fully answered today by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROBESON] upon all these points, and I will pass them and consider for a few moments the policy of exercising this power. During the earlier days of the Republic mobs at the polls and frauds in elections were not frequent, and Congress did not exercise its unquestioned powers in this respect.

Some time in July, 1866, Congress passed an act drawn, I believe, by Hon. Lyman Trumbull, then a Senator from Illinois, regulating the election of Senators in every respect except as to the place of choosing. This law is still in force, and has worked well and speaks for the wisdom of its author. Before and about that time riot and violence at the polls and frauds in the elections became so frequent and monstrous that Congress passed other laws regulating in some respect the election of Representatives to this House, to the end that there might be peace at the polls, a free ballot, and a fair count.

These laws were regularly and deliberately passed after full debate and upon their own merits, and were not carried through as riders on appropriation bills, nor were they harnessed up with and dragged through by any popular measures, but were passed because they were needed and were right; and they have worked well. They have secured peace and prevented fraud, and under them and by them no man has been prevented from voting who wanted to vote and who had a right to vote. And now our friends on the other side of the Hall call upon us to make haste, in extra session and in this most extraordinary manner, to repeal these election laws. What do gentlemen mean? What do they want, and why do they want it just now? are inquiries that arise in every mind.

Do these laws promote peace at the polls, a free ballot, and a true count; or do they promote riot, fraud, and a false count? If the former, they ought to remain in force and be executed; if the latter, they ought to be repealed.

Do gentlemen claim that under State laws alone elections have always been conducted peaceably and fairly?

No, Mr. Chairman, unquestioned recent history declares they have not, and gentlemen on the other side know and admit they have not. They know that in the past, at various places where democracy was almost universal, where democrats and only democrats had the entire charge of the polls, unchecked mob violence ran riot, and frauds so stupendous were perpetrated that democrats themselves were shocked and cried out against them.

Under or rather in spite of the laws in some of the States, instead of having a free and unmolested ballot, the people had free and unmolested bulldozing; instead of having peace, they had riot; instead of having a true count they had an outrageously false count. And, sir, I fear the repeal of these laws means free bulldozing, free riot, and free fraud.

Our institutions rest upon the free ballot, which should be placed and replaced in order, and all counted and none excluded by law or for the want of law, and not be frightened by violence or tainted by fraud. And unless so guarded the foundations of the Government will crumble and sooner or later will as surely fall as if assaulted by the unchecked battering-rams of revolution.

I admit I would prefer that the States should make all regulations and conduct all elections for members of this House as well as for their State officers, but it is enough to know that some of them have failed to secure a fair result. And hence Congress, while it did not assume full control as it had a right to do under the Constitution, yet it did set up some additional safeguards for congressional elections but was careful not to make them apply in any respect to the election for State officers.

I regretted to hear the distinguished gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS,] who long ago and now holds a prominent position in this House, speak with so much warmth and bitterness and denounce these laws as odious and dangerous. He will pardon me for remembering that, when physically stronger than now and with all his sagacity and ability, on memorable occasions, carried away against his better judgment, no doubt, by the madness of his fellows, he then as now denounced many things as odious and dangerous which, by his actions if not by express words, he has since admitted were harmless and good. And so now I must believe he gives speech to the passions of others and not his own.

Other gentlemen on that side of the Hall have denounced these election laws as degrading and hateful. What are these dreadful laws, sir? The object, the letter, and the essence of them is to keep peace at the polls, to protect decent people who go there to vote, to secure to each legal voter, native and foreign born alike, the right to vote once at each election and to have his vote counted, and to prohibit any person from voting more than once at the same election. "Only this, and nothing more."

Mr. Chairman, the bill to repeal the law authorizing troops to be used when necessary to repel the armed enemies of the United States and to keep the peace at the polls is not before the House at this time, but the provisions for repeal in that bill and in this are only different parts of the same scheme. When one is up for discussion they are all up. A great ado is made about bayonets at the ballot-box. Why, sir, we want no bayonets at the ballot-box. The law places no troops at the polls. They cannot be taken within a mile of any poll except for two purposes—one to repel armed enemies of the United States, and the other to preserve peace when necessary, and at no other time. When the police and all civil officers are overpowered then the bayonets may come, and not before.

These same election laws provide (section 5528, United States Revised Statutes) that any officer of the Army or Navy, or civil officer, or other person in the service of the United States, who orders, brings, keeps, or has under his control any troops or armed men at any election in any State for any other purpose, or unless absolutely necessary to repel the armed enemies of the United States or to keep the peace, shall be fined not more than $5,000 and suffer imprisonment at hard labor not more than five years. These penalties seem to be heavy enough to keep, and do keep, the troops and all armed men away.

Under these laws no person will ever be frightened by bayonets at an election, unless such person is himself an armed enemy of the United States or is himself engaging in riot and violence. Why, sir, a person not a resident of this country who should hear gentlemen's speeches on the other side would get the impression that on election day in the United States the Army was in battle array; that the decks of war ships were cleared and made ready for action and gatling guns trained upon every ballot-box and a platoon of soldiers with bayonets fixed drawn up in front of every poll, and that no citizen approaching to vote was safe unless he carried a Union flag in one hand and a republican ticket in the other.

Gentlemen cry "bayonet," "bayonet," but there is no bayonet. It is only a mad-dog cry raised to alarm people at the presence of the civil law, that majestic mastiff, armed with bayonet teeth for enemies and evil-doers only. And our democratic friends are frantic to so change the law that armed enemies of the United States or mob violence cannot be repelled or suppressed under United States authority by armed men, civil or military. They say that when United States troops or armed men approach even for such purpose democrats are intimidated and frightened away. Well, I expect, frankly speaking, that is just what is the matter. Some of them who want to appear, and who do sometimes appear, as armed enemies and rioters are frightened away. But, sir, are honest democrats afraid of United States soldiers? I think not. Has any gentleman ever heard of a peaceable democrat who was ever intimidated, molested, or in any manner interfered with by troops at the polls? Do any of them know, of their own knowledge or from reliable information, of a single instance? I pause for a reply. Silence answers, none.

Sir, this cry about the bayonet and about military despotism and about troops intimidating voters is all for effect. It is not real. There is nothing in it. We have no bayonets and want none. There is not one soldier to a county in any democratic State; not one soldier to every fifty polling places, on the average. Gentlemen are talking about one thing and doing another. These bills repeal the laws authorizing civil officers of the United States to use armed men who are citizens only, and not soldiers, to keep order at the polls. While crying out against the military, gentlemen are by these bills striking down civil officers of the Government.

Sir, these election laws do not discriminate against democrats or in in favor of republicans. Of course no republican is or ever was an armed enemy of the United States. Whether the same can be said for democrats I will leave the gentlemen on that side to say. I will not speak for them. But, sir, should bad republicans ever disturb the peace at the polls these laws would repel and punish them, I should hope.

Mr. Chairman, what are the election laws it is demanded must be repealed by this appropriation bill now under consideration? They provide that upon petition of citizens, judges of the United States courts shall appoint two citizens of different political parties, who are voters, to be supervisors of election for that time, who shall attend at the making up the registration of voters; shall attend at the election and observe the voting, and shall have the right to challenge any person offering to vote, and to personally scrutinize the count of ballots and the making up of returns. But they do not conduct elections in any respect. They are only officers of the court, who have a right to be present at elections for Representatives in Congress and witness all that is done. Additional deputy marshals may also be appointed, when necessary, who shall assist said supervisors in their duties and arrest such persons as violate the laws. These laws also punish severely rioters, ballot-box stuffers, and repeaters, and those who deprive any person of his rightful vote or commit fraud; and provide for the detection and apprehension of offenders. These are the odious and hateful laws that must be repealed in this hot haste, and on this appropriation bill, or this Government shall stop.

Mr. Chairman, next to that flag that hangs above your head the people are jealous of the chastity of the ballot-box. And, sir, disguise the matter as you may, argue as you have and as you will, this issue is understood. Neither eloquence, ingenuity, or sophistry can hide it or hide the purpose of the proposed repeal. This is a contest between the people and the "roughs" over the purity of the ballot-box, the womb of republican government. These laws are the sentinels that have been placed around to guard its virtue, and the good people say, and always will say, let these guards remain. Repeal, or no money to pay the Army, to pay the civil officers of the Government. No money to print another legal-tender note or coin another silver dollar.

We shall soon see, Mr. Chairman, whether our currency friends will confederate with the obstructionists or whether they prefer to run the legal-tender press and continue to coin the remonetized silver dollar.

To what will this monstrous doctrine of coercion lead? If you can coerce one branch of the Government you can another. You can proceed step by step until all the reconstruction laws are repealed, and then turn upon the Supreme Court and compel it to decide that all the amendments to the Constitution are void, or starve; and go on until all the dear and costly results of the war, including emancipation, are swept away. I do not say such is the present purpose of gentlemen, but they are traveling in that direction.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from the fourth district of Kentucky, [Mr. KNOTT,] a few days ago, here in the House, with much emphasis of speech, said:

Yes, sir, the democracy will "capture the Capitol," and they intend when they do so to restore this great Government to its original purity, to strip from the limbs of this great people the "shackles of usurped control and hew them link from link."

I do not know what the gentleman meant, but presume he meant that the democracy intended to return the Government to its ante bellum estate, and administer it as in the reign of President Buchanan, which republicans did not like and which the people rebuked.

Mr. Chairman, in order that we may know what is intended I send to the Clerk's desk to be read a letter written by a prominent democratic leader, now representing the fifth district of South Carolina in this House, [Mr. TILLMAN,] and published some time ago in a democratic paper of that State. I do not vouch for its authenticity. The gentleman can do so, or he can disclaim it:

LETTER FROM G. D. TILLMAN, OF EDGEFIELD.

"At the worst I hope and believe that our political oppressions will cease very shortly after the inauguration of the next President. If that President be a democrat, it is reasonably certain that a majority of both Houses of Congress will also be democrats, or at least conservatives. If so, the reconstruction acts will speedily be repealed, which would leave suffrage where it constitutionally belongs—under control of the States. Then, admitting the coerced amendments of the Constitution to be valid, the States could attach a property qualification to suffrage, without violating those amendments, which would practically destroy negro suffrage as a disturbing element in the body-politic.

"Again, after the democrats get possession of the executive and legislative departments, the present judges of the Supreme Court, following public opinion as law, in the future as in the past, and no longer dreading either impeachment or deprivation of salary, may declare the reconstruction acts, as well as the two fraudulent amendments, 'unconstitutional, null, and void,' or if they fail to do so the court can be reorganized simply by an increase of judges, even as the radicals did on a memorable occasion, and by making a proper appointment of new judges the Constitution of the fathers can be restored."

There comes to us daily from various sources notice unmistakable that unless they can have their way certain democrats are determined that this Government shall stop. This is what we were told twenty years ago, and it was attempted. And it is significant that for the most part the identical men that said so then say so now. We did not believe then they would attempt to do what they said they would do. We do not believe now they will attempt what they threaten to do. We were mistaken, however, then, and it is to be seen what is to come now. A true proverb says that if a person deceives you once it is his fault, but if he deceives you a second time it is your own fault.

Mr. Chairman, this debate is getting warm. The rank and file of the democratic party are all right and safe, but democratic leaders are troublesome and dangerous. Members around me will bear witness that I have never indulged in political discussion here, but have tried by conciliation to secure such action by Congress as would in my judgment relieve the distress of the people North and South alike and promote the national welfare. I have supported measures for the development of the South as cheerfully as for the North. It has been my wish that we might have peace and reconciliation and not tumult and agitation. I have hoped for more than I have realized. I have never waved the bloody garments of the late war here or elsewhere. In the short time I have been here we have witnessed a wonderful change in this Hall. Gentlemen on the other side are not as amiable as they were a few years ago, politically speaking. We have been told all along by democrats and assistant democrats that we must not speak of the past. Oh, no! That would be agitation, and we have been silent for the most part. We have now come to have the confederate gray waved at us on all occasions.

The distinguished gentleman from the fourth district of Kentucky [Mr. KNOTT] stated the other day that in 1863 a democratic convention assembled at Frankfort, Kentucky, was dispersed at the command of a military officer of the United States by the name of Gilbert, and thus, he said, achieved for himself an immortality of infamy. This is to be regretted, Mr. Chairman. It is of course to be presumed that the convention was loyal and had a right to meet; and while I know nothing about the circumstances, I venture to suspect that there was some significance about the convention that was not democratic.

The gentleman proceeded to eulogize some of the delegates to that convention in his forcible and pleasing style, and mentioned Joshua Bullitt, a judge of the court of appeals; and states that some of these delegates, together with other gentlemen, afterward requested Hon. Charles A. Wickliffe to become candidate for governor; and he said that "every one of these gentlemen had from the very beginning of the unfortunate strife between the two sections of our country been the very ablest and outspoken advocates of the cause of the Union."

I may not know, sir, what constituted a Union man at that time, and do not wish to question what has been said, but, in order that officer Gilbert may have some rivals for immortality, I have looked at the record of two of these patriots. I read from McPherson's History of the Rebellion, page 447. In speaking of that order known as the Knights of the Golden Circle, well understood to be in sympathy with and auxilliary to rebellion, he says:

In Kentucky Judge Bullit, of the court of appeals, is grand commander, and with Dr. U. F. Kalbfus and W. R. Thomas, jailer in Louisville, two other of the most prominent members, has been arrested and confined by the military authorities.

So, sir, if this history be true, some other military officer besides Gilbert has had something to do with this delegate to the democratic convention.

On page 420 of the same history it is stated that at a memorable convention about that time—

Mr. Wickliffe offered a resolution to the effect that Kentucky expects the first act of McClellan, when inaugurated in March next, will be to open Abraham Lincoln's prison-doors and set the captives free.

Another patriot heard from. I did not look up the political history of the other delegates the gentleman named.

The same gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. KNOTT] the other day, on behalf of the democratic party, arraigned the republican party for what he characterized as more than atrocious. He read an order made in 1863 by General BURNSIDE, then in command of the Union Army in Kentucky. It is as follows:

As it is not the intention of the commanding general to interfere with the proper expression of public opinion, all discretion in the conduct of the election will be, as usual, in the hands of the legally appointed judges at the polls, who will be held strictly responsible that no disloyal person will be allowed to vote, and to this end the military power is ordered to give them its utmost support.

I quote all of it he did; and he also read extracts of the orders of General Hurlbut to the like effect, and also some extracts of similar orders of other Union officers denying and depriving disloyal persons of the right to vote at elections held in certain districts of our then unhappy country which were under martial law and which were the battle-fields or near the battle-fields of that dreadful war. And after reading these orders of Union republican generals, among other severe things the gentleman said:

If what I have already shown is not sufficient to thrill the bosom of every thinking, patriotic American citizen with indignation and horror, I confess I am at a loss to conceive what possible condition of circumstances could excite their solicitude for the safety of their liberties or the perpetuity of their republican institutions.

But fortunately, sir, for the State, fortunately for the country, fortunately for the cause of human freedom everywhere, Kentucky was represented in the other end of this Capitol during the dark days of which I have been speaking by her honored and illustrious son, the lamented Lazarus W. Powell. When that sterling patriot, that sagacious statesman, that undaunted champion of popular liberty, saw the atrocious outrages against free elections which were perpetrated in his own State under the auspices of the military power of the Federal Government, he determined at once to prevent, if possible, the recurrence of such scenes by congressional enactment under the sanction of appropriate penalties.

"Fortunate for the cause of human freedom everywhere!"

Charmed words are these, Mr. Chairman. Yes, sir, charming indeed, but how often misapplied, as in this case. Mr. Chairman, these orders of Union generals were fortunate for the cause of human freedom everywhere. But Lazarus Powell was no Godsend for that cause.

Republicans must not refer to the past; that is agitation. Democrats may refer to the past; that is not agitation.

Sir, I have been meek and silent about as long as I can stand it.

The gentleman from Kentucky has gone back to fight his battles over again for his party, and may I not follow him to one or two places?

For myself, I justify the orders of these Union republican generals. They were right in preventing disloyal persons and enemies of the United States from voting at elections within their jurisdiction. Yes, Mr. Chairman, these orders of our Union republican generals did thrill the bosom of every patriotic American citizen, not with indignation and horror, but with hope and gladness. It will be observed, sir, that these orders did not prohibit democrats from voting, unless such democrats so offering to vote were disloyal to the United States. The gentleman knows better than I do whether such was the case. He can state whether in that locality disloyalty and democracy were synonymous terms. These orders did not exclude republicans from voting, and if they excluded democrats it was no fault of the orders. Would he have had the Union Army stack arms while confederate soldiers returned and voted to overthrow the Government? If the confederacy and confederate democracy had been permitted to unite they might have succeeded, sure enough. But BURNSIDE, Hurlbut, and other Union generals seem to have prevented the concert of action. Thank God!

Gentlemen on that side seem to argue as though whenever the political rights of disloyal persons have been in any way abridged that the purpose was to curtail the rights of democrats. For one I do not believe that disloyal persons ought to have been permitted to vote then or at any time. Does the gentleman think they ought? His argument answers in the affirmative. No one was excluded except disloyal persons, and the gentleman complains bitterly. The gentleman has gone back about sixteen years to dig up the dead past and tell us that the military bull of the republican party gored the democratic ox. It always makes a difference whose ox is gored. So let us look at another case. In 1856 Colonel E. V. Sumner, commanding the First United States Cavalry, with his sword girded on and troops at his back, under Franklin Pierce, President, entered the Kansas hall of representatives first, and then the chamber of the senate, and made and executed this order:

> Gentlemen: I am called upon, this day, to perform the most painful duty of my whole life. Under the authority of the President's proclamation I am here to disperse this Legislature, and, therefore, I inform you that you cannot meet. I therefore order you to disperse. * * * Such are my orders, and you must disperse. I command you to disperse.

Whereupon a member of the Legislature inquired as follows: "Colonel Sumner, are we to understand that the Legislature is driven out at the point of the bayonet?" To which Colonel Sumner replied: "I shall use all the forces in my command to enforce my orders." And the Legislature of Kansas, senate and house, was dispersed. This military order was executed in time of peace; and there was no claim that the Legislature or any of its members were disloyal to the United States.

Let us look at one more picture—not republican. In May of that year, at Leavenworth, Kansas, then garrisoned with United States troops, William Philips, an attorney at law, was seized by a mob for having protested against the frauds at an election, and was carried away in the presence of United States troops who were importuned to rescue him, and chafed to do so; but they had received orders not to keep the peace at the polls, and they could not interfere with the mob; and so he was, in the presence of the majesty of the civil and military power of this great nation, stripped and tarred and feathered and rode on a rail, and then in mockery sold at auction, a negro slave being compelled to act as auctioneer. I refer to page 86 of the Conquest of Kansas for my authority. It is unnecessary to say that the election went democratic.

The Army can be used under a democratic administration to disperse a Legislature in time of peace. The Army can be used under a republican administration to prevent disloyal persons from voting in time of war. You have the parallel; say which you like best, or hate most. I will let the military orders and the circumstances I have presented stand against military orders and the circumstances presented by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. KNOTT,] and let democrats and republicans judge which will most (using his own language) thrill the bosom of every thinking, patriotic American citizen with indignation and horror.

Not long since the repeaters and ballot-box stuffers returned democratic majorities in some of the wards in New York City greater, as afterward ascertained on investigation, than all the people resident therein, counting men, women, and children. These frauds were so glaring and stupendous that a prominent citizen of that city, once a democratic candidate for President, (not Mr. Tilden,) held up his hands in astonished disgust and denounced them as atrocious; and it was the exposures of these frauds and the frequent violence and bloodshed at the polls in other places that called for and was the cause of the enactment of the laws it is now sought to repeal. And under these laws those frauds have not been repeated to such an extent; hence the democratic necessity for their repeal. Repeal these laws, and gentlemen know that these bummers, bullies, and ballot-box stuffers will return these old-time democratic majorities. Is that what they want?

Go to the Library, sir, and look over volume after volume of reports of investigating committees, composed of both political parties in Congress, and read till you are sick of fraud and violence and blood. Some one near me here says these books read like the records of hell, and if it may not be profane, I will say so too. Repeal these laws and we will have a little hell, if I may so speak, at every poll in some parts of this country.

Mr. Chairman, I would not speak offensively of any gentleman on either side of this House; I always have and always will speak of them and treat them with the utmost respect. As leaders of the democratic party I may speak of them and of their public political acts. Time proves all things and time has proven that in the past the advice and policy of the democratic party and its leaders have been costly and dreadful. Is it wise, is it safe for them to control? If Congress or the people had followed these same democratic leaders, these identical gentlemen, for the most part, the United States would have been blotted from the map of the world. Gentlemen will pardon me for mentioning their mournful mistakes. I do it in order to convince them how hazardous it would be to let them have their way.

I mean no personal disrespect to any of them, and I am sure that on a review of their political record they will come to the conclusion themselves that they are unsafe. Sir, it takes at least three qualities to make reliable statesmen. Wisdom, patriotism, and moral courage are essential. Now, sir, admitting that all democratic leaders are loyal, and I believe it has been decided that we are all loyal at the present time; and, sir, admitting that these democratic leaders are all as loyal now as anybody ever was, yet if one of the other essential qualities is wanting they are unsafe. If these leaders in the past have betrayed a lack of wisdom in considering and settling the true policy on any great national matter, or if at any time of threatened danger, if when the political skies grew dark and stormy, and when the deep mutterings of revolution were heard they deserted their posts and fled in dismay, or if when crossed or disappointed about some pet measure they pouted and kicked, if these democratic leaders did any of these things, are they safe? What a man does once under temptation he may do again, and usually he yields easier each succeeding time. I wish to be mild about this matter, sir, but there are very few graduates of a certain democratic school of politics so popular with that party whose wisdom, patriotism, and moral courage are sufficient to keep them in line of battle when State rights are firing on the pickets.

Now the trouble with so many of these democratic leaders is that their timidity or some other sensation so often gets the better of their patriotism. They may think they are right, but how dreadfully mistaken!

The chosen, acknowledged, and plumed leader of the democratic party in this House from the ninth district of New York [Hon. FERNANDO WOOD] was a prominent leader and an official of his party in 1861, and as such official before a hostile shot had been fired at the flag of his country sent a message to the council of the city of New York, which I will have read from page 42 of McPherson's Political History of the Rebellion.

The Clerk read as follows:

MAYOR WOOD'S RECOMMENDATION OF THE SECESSION OF NEW YORK CITY, JANUARY 6, 1861.

To the honorable the Common Council:

GENTLEMEN: We are entering upon the public duties of the year under circumstances as unprecedented as they are gloomy and painful to contemplate. The great trading and producing interests of not only the city of New York, but of the entire country, are prostrated by a monetary crisis; and although similar calamities have before befallen us, it is the first time that they have emanated from causes having no other origin than that which may be traced to political disturbances. Truly may it now be said, "we are in the midst of a revolution bloodless as yet."

Whether the dreadful alternative implied as probable in the conclusion of this prophetic quotation may be averted "no human ken can divine." It is quite certain that the severity of the storm is unexampled in our history, and if the disintegration of the Federal Government, with the consequent destruction of all the material interests of the people, shall not follow, it will be owing more to the interposition of Divine Providence than to the inherent preventive power of our institutions or the intervention of any other human agency.

It would seem that a dissolution of the Federal Union is inevitable. Having been formed originally on a basis of general and mutual protection but separate local independence—each State reserving the entire and absolute control of its own domestic affairs—it is evidently impossible to keep them together longer than they deem themselves fairly treated by each other or longer than the interests, honor, and fraternity of the people of the several States are satisfied. Being a Government created by opinion, its continuance is dependent upon the continuance of the sentiment which formed it. It cannot be preserved by coercion or held together by force. A resort to this last dreadful alternative would of itself destroy not only the Government, but the lives and property of the people.

If these forebodings shall be realized and a separation of the States shall occur momentous considerations will be presented to the corporate authorities of this city. We must provide for the new relations which will necessarily grow out of the new condition of public affairs.

It will not only be necessary for us to settle the relations which we shall hold to other cities and States, but to establish, if we can, new ones with a portion of our own State. Being the child of the Union, having drawn our sustenance from its bosom and arisen to our present power and strength through the vigor of our mother, when deprived of her maternal advantages we must rely upon our own resources and assume a position predicated upon the new phase which public affairs will present, and upon the inherent strength which our geographical, commercial, political, and financial pre-eminence imparts to us.

With our aggrieved brethren of the slave States we have friendly relations and a common sympathy. We have not participated in the warfare upon their constitutional rights or their domestic institutions. While other portions of our State have unfortunately been imbued with the fanatical spirit which actuates a portion of the people of New England, the city of New York has unfalteringly preserved the integrity of its principles in adherence to the compromises of the Constitution and the equal rights of the people of all the States. We have respected the local interests of every section, at no time oppressing but all the while aiding in the development of the resources of the whole country. Our ships have penetrated to every clime, and so have New York capital, energy, and enterprise found their way to every State, and, indeed, to almost every county and town of the American Union. If we have derived sustenance from the Union, so have we in return disseminated blessings for the common benefit of all. Therefore New York has a right to expect, and should endeavor to preserve, a continuance of uninterrupted intercourse with every section.

It is, however, folly to disguise the fact that judging from the past New York may have more cause of apprehension from the aggressive legislation of our own State than from external dangers. We have already largely suffered from this cause. For the past five years our interests and corporate rights have been repeatedly trampled upon. Being an integral portion of the State, it has been assumed and in effect tacitly admitted on our part by non-resistance that all political and governmental power over us rested in the State Legislature. Even the common right of taxing ourselves for our own government has been yielded and we are not permitted to do so without this authority.

* * * * * * *

Thus it will be seen that the political connection between the people of the city and the State has been used by the latter to our injury. The Legislature in which the present partisan majority has the power has become the instrument by which we are plundered to enrich their speculators, lobby agents, and abolitional politicians. Laws are passed through their malign influence by which under forms of legal enactment our burdens have been increased, our substance eaten out, and our municipal liberties destroyed. Self-government, though guaranteed by the State constitution and left to every other county and city, has been taken from us by this foreign power whose dependents have been sent among us to destroy our liberties by subverting our political system.

How we shall rid ourselves of this odious and oppressive connection it is not for me to determine. It is certain that a dissolution cannot be peacefully accomplished except by the consent of the Legislature itself. Whether this can be obtained or not is in my judgment doubtful. Deriving so much advantage from its power over the city it is not probable that a partisan majority will consent to a separation, and the resort to force by violence and revolution must not be thought of for an instant.

We have been distinguished as an orderly and law-abiding people. Let us do nothing to forfeit this character, or to add to the present distracted condition of public affairs.

Much no doubt can be said in favor of the justice and policy of a separation. It may be said that secession or revolution in any of the United States would be subversive of all Federal authority, and so far as the central government is concerned the resolving of the community into its original elements; that if any part of the States form new combinations and governments, other States may do the same.

California and her sisters of the Pacific will no doubt set up an independent republic and husband their own rich mineral resources. The Western States, equally rich in cereals and other agricultural products, will probably do the same. Then it may be said, why should not New York City, instead of supporting by her contributions in revenue two-thirds of the expenses of the United States, become also equally independent? As a free city, with but nominal duty on imports, her local government could be supported without taxation upon her people. Thus we could live free from taxes and have cheap goods nearly duty free. In this she would have the whole and united support of the Southern States, as well as all other States to whose interests and rights under the Constitution she has always been true

It is well for individuals and communities to look every danger square in the face and to meet it calmly and bravely. As dreadful as the severing of the bonds that have hitherto united the States has been in contemplation, it is now apparently a stern and inevitable fact. We have now to meet it with all the consequences, whatever they may be.

If the confederacy is broken up the Government is dissolved, and it behooves every distinct community, as well as every individual, to take care of themselves.

When disunion has become a fixed and certain fact, why may not New York disrupt the bonds which bind her to a venal and corrupt master—to a people and a party that have plundered her revenues, attempted to ruin her commerce, taken away the power of self-government, and destroyed the confederacy of which she was the proud Empire City.

Amid the gloom which the present and prospective condition of things must cast over the country, New York, as a free city, may shed the only light and hope of a future reconstruction of our once blessed confederacy.

But I am not prepared to recommend the violence implied in these views. In stating this argument in favor of freedom, "peaceably if we can, forcibly if we must," let me not be misunderstood. The redress can be found only in appeals to the magnanimity of the people of the whole State. The events of the past two months have no doubt effected a change in the popular sentiment of the State and national politics. This change may bring us the desired relief, and we may be able to obtain a repeal of the law to which I have referred and a consequent restoration of our corporate rights.

FERNANDO WOOD, Mayor.

January 6, 1861.

Mr. FORT. New York City a little kingdom, levying tribute upon the commerce of the broad, free West, and the gentleman in his dreams a little king! But there was a lion in his path. The Union soldier, with heart and courage as big as the continent, dispelled the gentleman's hopes and fears as his mighty tramp kept step to music of the Union, and he is only king of the caucus of his party in this House.

There was some essential quality lacking in the gentleman who penned that message; using a homely phrase, there was a screw loose somewhere. Wisdom and patriotism were probably abundant, but not enough courage, not enough back-bone, sir, not enough backbone.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman who bore the banner of the democratic party to defeat at the last presidential election, but who is still a great favorite among the more extreme and violent leaders of his party, in a letter to William Kent, of October, 1860, when revolution was threatened, used this language:

The single, slender, conventional tie which holds the States in confederation has no strength compared with the compacted, intertwining fabrics which bind the atoms of human society into one formation of national growth.

The masters of political science who constructed our system, preserved the State governments as bulwarks for the freedom of individuals and localities against oppression from centralized power. They recognized no right of constitutional secession, but they left revolution organized when it should be demanded by the public opinion of a State; left it with power to snap the tie of confederation as a nation might break a treaty, and to repel coercion as a nation might repel invasion. They caused us to depend, in great measure, upon the public opinion of the States in order to maintain a confederated Union; they intended to make it necessary for us, in every reasonable extent, to respect that public opinion.

As a rule of right and duty for the construction and execution of the Constitution, the theory maintained by Mr. Seward, and too extensively accepted, is entirely fallacious, as no contract governing complicated transactions or relations between men, and applying permanently through the changes inevitable in human affairs, can be effectual if either party intended to be bound by it is at liberty to construe or execute its provisions in a spirit of hostility to the substantial objects of these provisions. Especially is this true of a compact of confederation between the States, where there can be no common arbiter invested with authorities and powers equally capable with those which courts possess between individuals for determining and enforcing a just construction and execution of the instrument

* * * * * * *

It is too late! It is too late! We are upon the breakers. Whose eye quails now? Whose cheek blanches? It is not mine, who felt a provident fear and have done all I could. Where is the excellent president of the chamber of commerce whom they perched up in the forecastle to assure us that a good lookout was kept for our safety? Where are the dozen great stakes, as Mr. Webster use to call them, whom they planted closely around him to shut out from the sight of the crew the beacon erected by Washington? Where are the thoughtless, reckless seamen who taunted me with cowardice when I vainly strove to warn them? I hear only the wailing cry of selfish terror as I sit upon the straining timbers and watch the rage of the sea. My mind is filled, my heart swells with the thought that you wave which towers before us will ingulf more of human happiness and human hopes than have perished in any one catastrophe since the world began.

S. J. TILDEN.

NEW YORK, October 26, 1860.

STALWART IMBECILITY, SIR.

"The single, slender, conventional tie has no strength." A rope of sand. "They left revolution organized." The seeds of its own destruction sown within it by its authors. "With power to snap the tie." A hint at secession. You can destroy if you wish. A great many screws loose here, sir; something lacking somewhere—wisdom, patriotism, or courage; not a single joint of back-bone, sir. But it was not too late. Lincoln took the helm, and, though the storm was long and dreadful, finally rounded the ship into port. Ah, Mr. Chairman, "fortunately"—borrowing the beautiful language of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. KNOTT]—"fortunately for the country, fortunately for the cause of human freedom everywhere," Abraham Lincoln and U. S. Grant, and those who around them stood, were made of sterner stuff.

And, Mr. Chairman, while we are considering the fitness of democratic leaders to lead, I send to the Clerk to be read the dispatch of the British embassador to his government relating to his interview with New York democrats in regard to foreign intervention.

The Clerk reads as follows:

LETTER OF LORD LYONS TO EARL RUSSELL RESPECTING MEDIATION.

WASHINGTON, November 17, 1862.

In his dispatches of the 17th and of the 24th ultimo, and of the 7th instant, Mr. Stuart reported to your lordship the result of the elections for members of Congress and State officers, which have recently taken place in several of the most important States of the Union. Without repeating the details, it will be sufficient for me to observe that the success of the democratic, or (as it now styles itself) the conservative party, has been so great as to manifest a change in public feeling, among the most rapid and the most complete that has ever been witnessed even in this country.

On my arrival at New York, on the 8th instant, I found the conservative leaders exulting in the crowning success achieved by the party in that State. They appeared to rejoice, above all, in the conviction that personal liberty and freedom of speech has been secured for the principal State of the Union.

They believed that the Government must at once desist from exercising in the State of New York the extraordinary (and as they regard them) illegal and unconstitutional powers which it had assumed. They were confident that, at all events, after the 1st of January next, on which day the newly elected governor would come into office, the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus could not be practically maintained. They seemed to be persuaded that the result of the elections would be accepted by the President as a declaration of the will of the people; that he would increase the moderate and conservative element in that Cabinet; that he would seek to terminate the war, not to push it to extremity; that he would endeavor to effect a reconciliation with the people of the South, and renounce the idea of subjugating or exterminating them.

On the following morning, however, intelligence arrived from Washington which dashed the rising hopes of the conservatives. It was announced that General McClellan had been dismissed from the command of the Army of the Potomac, and ordered to repair to his home; that he had, in fact, been removed altogether from active service. The general had been regarded as the representative of conservative principles in the Army. Support of him had been made one of the articles of the conservative electoral programme. His dismissal was taken as a sign that the President had thrown himself entirely into the arms of the extreme radical party, and that the attempt to carry out the policy of that party would be persisted in. The irritation of the conservatives at New York was certainly very great. It seemed, however, to be not unmixed with consternation and despondency.

Several of the leaders of the democratic party sought interviews with me, both before and after the arrival of the intelligence of General McClellan's dismissal. The subject uppermost in their minds while they were speaking to me was naturally that of foreign mediation between the North and South. Many of them seemed to think that this mediation must come at last, but they appeared to be very much afraid of its coming too soon. It was evident that they apprehended that a premature proposal of foreign intervention would afford the radical party a means of reviving the violent war spirit and of thus defeating the peaceful plans of the conservatives. They appeared to regard the present moment as peculiarly unfavorable for such an offer, and indeed to hold that it would be essential to the success of any proposal from abroad that it should be deferred until the control of the executive Government should be in the hands of the conservative party.

Mr. FORT. And so we find democratic leaders of highest rank conferring and intriguing with the representative of the Crown of England, and perhaps proposing to barter the dearest rights of this people and the destinies of posterity. They could have had no good or honorable purpose in any such conference. They supposed that liberty was expiring on the cross of treason, and proprosed, by submitting to intervention, to divide empire with England.

They parted my raiment among them and for my vesture they did cast lots. (John xix, 24.)

Let us look further, sir. The second officer of the late would-be confederacy [Mr. STEPHENS] is here, and is one of the democratic leaders, and I have no doubt sadly regrets his many political errors and their mournful consequences. Cabinet ministers, senators, and representatives of the late confederacy are here, all democratic leaders. The greatest of confederate generals (JOSEPH E. JOHNSTON, of Virginia) and his subordinate lieutenant, major, and brigadier generals are here in great numbers, and all of them are democratic leaders. Jefferson Davis is yet absent, but is soon expected. His coming has already been heralded by eulogium and by applause in the other end of this Capitol. When he arrives they will all be here, and all be democratic leaders and all be repealers.

Sir, is it for their political constancy that we should follow and register the decrees of their caucus?

We had in republican days a roll of fourteen wounded Union soldiers on guard here in this Hall, assigned to various duties which they could perform as well as able-bodied men, but they nearly all fell at the first fire, when democracy made its triumphant entry here four years ago. And had they placed wounded confederate soldiers in their stead they might have been in some degree excusable, but able-bodied, shoulder-hitting democrats, who never smelt powder on either side, were for the most part put in their places. So stated an ex-democratic Doorkeeper under oath before an investigating committee. He demanded of democratic members to nominate to him for appointment wounded soldiers, according to the law. And although he had himself been in the confederate service, he understood and insisted that the law meant fourteen wounded Union soldiers, but they forced upon him able-bodied democrats. And because he chafed at this and their other unlawful demands, as I understand it, he was bounced and turned out. So he declares and I believe. His successor fared the same fate for about the same reasons.

About how much do these democratic leaders love the Union soldiers? Actions speak louder and plainer than professions.

When this present House was organized, a few weeks ago, and the members-elect from several of the democratic States were called up to be sworn, a circle of about fifty was formed around the bar, and those who were to take the regular ordinary oath, that they had not borne arms against the United States, &c., were invited to step forward and hold up their hands and be sworn, it will be remembered only four of the whole line advanced. Of those, two were republicans, (Mr. JORGENSEN, of Virginia, and Mr. URNER of Maryland.) The others were all democrats, and had to take a modified oath. These States used to send some democrats who could take the oath, but this time they seem to have selected their representatives with care, and kept all at home who were tainted with loyalty to the United States during the war. Of the five officers of this House elected two could take the oath and three could not, including the Chaplain.

Straws indicate the direction of the democratic atmosphere in some localities, especially in a caucus of democratic leaders.

These are the wise and trusty leaders who would now again control. Is it safe? Would they be reliable in time of emergency? I could almost submit the question to the candor of the gentlemen on the other side themselves to answer. They know they have been seldom right and often and lamentably wrong. They know that it was the republican party, aided by the loyal rank and file of the democratic party in the North, that in the delirium of their political madness saved them from suicide. And the hope of the country to-day is in the republican party and in the loyal rank and file of democracy and not in democratic leaders.

Now, Mr. Chairman, considering the animus of the head and front of the democratic party now dominant and arrogant here, considering its chosen leaders of to-day are the identical individuals who led to cruel and costly revolution heretofore, and considering the stupendous frauds committed, considering the bloody work of brutal mobs, considering the mournful past and its actors, can any patriotic, conscientious, fair-minded democrat, national, or republican consent that these laws, these bulwarks of a free ballot and a peaceful poll, shall be swept away? History answers with bonded and bloody tongue it would not be well. No, sir, let it not be done now or hereafter. Let the free and peaceful ballot rule this land forever.

Mr. BELTZHOOVER. Mr. Chairman, in the limited time allotted to me I will speak very briefly of those portions of the pending bill which pertain to the question of elections. This question should command the most serious and deliberate consideration of this House instead of exciting an acrimonious partisan debate. The gravity of the crisis which arose in the last national contest forced upon all thinking men the unpleasant conviction that the continued success or ultimate failure of free institutions depends upon the intelligent solution of the great question of how to secure honest elections. All patriotic people are willing to submit to the rule of the majority, but they will not long permit a minority by force or fraud to usurp the reins of government. Either elections must be more certain and more free from the domination of military and prerogative power, or revolution will follow instead of quiet acquiescence. In this discussion it will not do for the gentlemen on the other side to say that we demand the repeal of these Federal election laws for the purpose of controlling the next presidential struggle by fraud. In so doing they challenge the wisdom and integrity of the fathers and founders of the Republic. In so doing they challenge the honesty of all the elections in the past, from that of Washington to Lincoln. We demand nothing but what the authors of the Government gave us. We demand nothing but what is secured and guaranteed in the Constitution and laws under which the Government was reared and under which it grew to be the mightiest on the globe. We only ask the same election laws under which the long line of illustrious men were elevated to office who ruled the nation in its halcyon days. We do not ask any new enactments on the subject; on the contrary we complain of such measures which were the outgrowth of the bitterness and, perhaps, the necessarily arbitrary power of war, and ask to return to the laws which were passed under the sober influences of peace. We do not need to court any alliance with fraud before the people of a nation which gave us half a million of a popular majority in our last fight. We are ready and anxious to meet our antagonists in the coming and every political conflict on exactly the same arena, under exactly the same laws, and surrounded by exactly the same influences as those under which our great whig and democratic ancestors were marshaled for conflict.

We challenge the gentlemen to meet us on the same ground on which the great political battles of the past were fought. We have no misgivings, no fears, no doubts as to the result. It is the gentlemen on the other side who do not want to be controlled by the old methods established under the Constitution and maintained and sanctioned by the practice of all parties from the dawn of our history. It is the gentlemen on the other side who want the Army at the polls and a horde of corrupt, drunken, criminal deputy marshals to bolster up a cause which they do not dare to submit to the free verdict of the people, expressed as it has been in all times according to the election laws of the States themselves, enacted by men whose names have long since become household words with the people. We have no hesitation as to what the popular verdict will be on the question as to who contemplates fraud, if there be any, in the effort to perpetuate or repeal these election laws.

The issue as to the use of the Army at the polls has been practically abandoned already if we may judge from the declarations of the gentlemen on the other side. It is so plainly against the laws of all countries that have free elections, so plainly against the genius and spirit of republican institutions, and against all the lessons and traditions of free government in all times, that there can be no sincere defense of it. It has been passed upon and settled by the action of this House and is out of this debate. The questions which arise on the pending bill are more fairly the subject of contention, and relate, first, to the right of the Federal Government to interfere with elections in the States, and, second, to the manner and extent of this interference. The right to vote is a political right derived from the supreme power in the State in which it is to be exercised. This was settled as a common-law principle by the great case of Ashby and White, in 1705, and has been affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States and by numerous decisions of the courts of the several States since. But, while we all agree upon this, we are confronted with a difficulty in the determination of the question which arises from the complex character of the sovereign power in the nation. The States are sovereign in the enjoyment of certain rights, and the National Government has delegated to it from the States certain powers in which it is sovereign. From which does the right to vote come, and which has the right to prescribe the regulations by which this right shall be controlled? The question was very thoroughly discussed and satisfactorily settled in the debates and proceedings in the conventions which formed and adopted the Federal Constitution.

The provisions of the Constitution which relate directly to the subject of suffrage have been quoted so often in this debate that they have become as familiar as old faces. They are, section 2 of article 1, which provides that "the electors in each State," in choosing Representatives in Congress, "shall have the qualifications required for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature;" section 1 of article 2, which provides that "each State shall appoint" electors for President "in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct." To these must be added article 15 of the amendments to the Constitution, which provides that "the right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude." It is very clear that subject to the fifteenth amendment the right to vote is vested by the Federal Constitution in the States. This amendment has been held by the Supreme Court of the United States to be intended solely for the benefit of the colored race and does not confer any right to vote, but that the right remains, as before, the exclusive prerogative of the States. (Slaughter-house cases, 16 Wallace.) The same decisions rule that "offenses against the right to vote are not cognizable under the power of Congress unless they have as a motive the race, color, or previous condition of servitude of the party whose right is assailed."

This view of the subject is also sustained by the case of the United States vs. Cruikshank, (13 A. L. R., 630,) in the circuit court of the United States, and by numerous decisions collaterally touching the question in the courts of the States. The same principle is maintained in many of the State courts where the question has arisen. In Pennsylvania the exclusive control of the right to vote is declared to be in the State in the cases of McCafferty against Guyer, Page against Allen, Huber against Reilly, and other cases. The decisions of the courts on this the fifteenth amendment furthermore are persuasive evidence that the law, as construed by our highest tribunals, does not favor interference by the Federal Government with the right of suffrage in the States. And on this high and important right we must remember that the tenth amendment to the Constitution provides that "the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution nor prohibited by it to the States are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people."

But section 4, article 1, is claimed to give the right to Congress to interfere with the right of suffrage in the States, and on this all the arguments in support of the act of 1871 have been based.

This section provides:

The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations except as to the place of choosing Senators.

In answer, first, to the claim which is made for the right of Congress under this section it may be said that no tribunal has ever held or decided that under this section Congress has the right or power to interfere with the regulations of the States on the subject of elections. On the contrary, the question of this right was squarely raised and decided adversely to the right by Congress itself. The act of June 25, 1842, provided that Representatives should be elected "by districts composed of contiguous territory." The States of New Hampshire, Georgia, Mississippi, and Missouri, disregarding this act of Congress, elected their members at large on a general ticket, in accordance with their own laws. The members so elected applied for admission to Congress, and the cases were referred to the Committee of Elections. After elaborate consideration and discussion of the question a majority of the committee of Congress, headed by that great patriot Stephen A. Douglas, reported against the validity of the act of Congress and admitted the Representatives elected in violation of this act of Congress to their seats, and they served out their terms. Since that time the House of Representatives have again recognized and affirmed the same view of the subject in the recent cases of Phelps and Cavanaugh, Representatives from the State of Minnesota.—1 Bartlett, 148.

To further show the inclination of the courts on this subject we may refer to the decision of the supreme court of Pennsylvania on the act of Congress of March 3, 1865, disfranchising deserters from the Army. In this case it was argued and contended that the act was unconstitutional for the reason that it was an attempt on the part of Congress to regulate suffrage in the States. The court held that the act did not so regulate or attempt to regulate the right to vote in the States, but declared that if it did it would be unconstitutional. (Huber against Reilly.) From these provisions of the Constitution to which we have referred, from the decisions of the courts, Federal and State, and from the reiterated determination of Congress itself on its acts under this section, we believe we are justified in maintaining the proposition that the right of suffrage being a State right the United States cannot lawfully interfere to abridge or limit or control it in any way except in the single contingency where the States themselves make no regulations on the subject. In all cases, however, where the States have provided by their constitutions and statutes for the exercise of the right to vote, a clear inhibition arises against any action whatever on the subject by Congress. The utmost that can be claimed by Congress is the right to interfere under the high prerogative of self-preservation, where the States neglect or refuse to provide for the exercise and control of the right of suffrage in the election of Representatives and Senators.

Where the States have provided fully for the holding elections for Members of Congress and Senators, the powers which are primarily delegated to the State Legislatures become vested, and no power remains to Congress. It is a well-settled rule of constitutional construction that where the Constitution specifies the circumstances under which a right may be exercised or a penalty imposed, the specification is an implied prohibition against legislative interference to add to the condition or extend the penalty. The language of the section itself makes it the imperative duty of the State Legislature to provide for the time, place, and manner of holding elections. These things, it is said, shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislatures thereof. It is a command of the supreme fundamental law to the Legislatures of the States. And the alternative is in the provision that Congress may by law make or alter such regulations. This view of the subject is strongly sustained by the arguments of the two men who were among the most distinguished authors of the Constitution and certainly the ablest advocates of its adoption. James Madison says:

The definition of the right of suffrage is very justly regarded as a fundamental article of republican government. The provision made by the convention appears, therefore, to be the best that lay within their option. It must be satisfactory to every State, because it is conformable to the standard already established, or which may be established, by the State itself. It will be safe to the United States, because, being fixed by the State constitution, it is not alterable by the State governments, and it cannot be feared that the people of the States will alter this part of their constitution in such manner as to abridge the rights secured to them under the Federal Constitution.—Federalist, 52.

Alexander Hamilton says:

It will, I presume, be as readily conceded that there were only three ways in which this power could have been reasonably organized; that it must either have been lodged wholly in the National Legislature or wholly in the State Legislature, or primarily in the latter and ultimately in the former. The last method has with reason been preferred by the convention. They have submitted the regulation of elections for the Federal Government in the first instance to the local administration which in ordinary cases and when no improper views prevail may be more convenient and more satisfactory; but they have reserved to the national authority a right to interfere whenever extraordinary circumstances might render that interference necessary for its safety.—Federalist, 59.

These two extracts clearly show that it was held out to the State Legislatures in order to secure their ratification of the Federal Constitution that on this very question of the right to regulate suffrage there should not be any interference by the Federal Government except where the exigency of self-preservation arose by reason of the neglect or refusal of the States to act on the subject. For these reasons the act of 28th of February, 1871, which it is now proposed in part to repeal, is an invasion of the constitutional power of the States to control the right to vote and regulate the manner of exercising that right. It is against the genius and spirit of the Constitution, and subverts the carefully adjusted system of reserved and delegated powers between the States and the Federal Government. It is against the express stipulations of the compromises as shown in the debates and writings on the formation of the Constitution, on which the States ratified the Constitution and came into the Federal Union.

That act having been placed upon the statute-book unlawfully by a party that had learned to invade and violate the most vital provisions of the Constitution by the impunity and frequency with which it had done it for years during the turmoil of civil war, it is our duty, with the return of peace and the restoration of the civil power in the land, to return to the old paths and renew the old lines which limit the boundaries between the powers of the sovereign States and the power of the General Government.

In the language of one of the ablest writers on the Constitution—

Let us never forget that our constitutions of government are solemn instruments addressed to the common sense of the people, and designed to fix and perpetuate their rights and their liberties. They are not to be frittered away to please the demagogues of a day. They are not to be violated to justify the ambition of political leaders. They are to speak in the same imperative voice now and forever.—Story.

But we should be constrained to expunge these acts of usurpation from the statutes of the nation, not only because they are clearly unconstitutional, but because they are in themselves violent and tyrannical measures which violate the highest rights of the citizen, coerce and intimidate and keep from the polls the honest, peaceable voter, corrupt and mislead the weak, and put the ballot-box under the domination and control of the party in power! The provisions in these acts in reference to elections strike at the very foundations of such elections as were contemplated by the founders of the Government and intended to express without constraint of any kind whatever the will of the people freely and fairly. Section 5522 makes the officials designated and authorized therein superior to all State officers of election and gives its newly constituted agents of Federal power arbitrary authority, such as no State law ever authorized any of its citizens to exercise.

Under this section the officers authorized by the sovereign States to hold elections "shall be liable to instant arrest without process." What a power to be placed by the august authority of the Federal Government in the hands of the jail-birds and cut-throats and vagabonds and inebriates and repeaters and outlaws who were appointed deputy marshals in Philadelphia at the last election in that city to be used against the decent, sober citizens of that proud old metropolis! A committee of Congress has been investigating this subject, and a few examples from the sworn testimony of witnesses produced before that committee in Philadelphia will show some of the inner workings of this mighty radical machine for the control of elections.

Take the case of Charles Oliphant, a deputy marshal. An intelligent manufacturer, being called, says:

I am a silk manufacturer.
Question. How long have you lived in that section of the city?
Answer. With the exception of a year or so, eighteen or nineteen years.
Q. Are you a resident and owner of property in it?
A. I am a resident, not an owner of property. I had been election officer for that division for a number of years, with the exception of last year, when I declined to serve again, owing to want of time.
Q. Were you at the election in November?
A. Not continuously all day.
Q. But you were there?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Did you see there this man, Charles Oliphant, the marshal?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. What was the condition of Oliphant—drunk or sober?
A. I take him to have been a drunken man. He was very noisy and quarrelsome. He had frequent disputes with the people outside on the pavement, especially with Mr. Howell; he threatened to fight Mr. Howell.

Another witness testifies in reference to Oliphant as follows:

Question. Were you there in the evening when Oliphant, the marshal, came in?
Answer. Yes, sir.
Q. What was his condition when he came in in the evening, and at what time was it?
A. It was between the hours of seven and eight in the evening, after the polls were closed. He came in there. He appeared to be drunk.
Q. Who was with him?
A. There were three or four men with him. They were with him all day.
Q. They were the men who were with him all day?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. What did he say or do?
A. He made threats. He wanted to get in to where the polls were, where the election officers were. Mr. Howell was in there. Oliphant came to me and asked me if I would not let him in. I told him that the door was locked and he could not get in. He made a threat that he could get away with this man Howell; and one of his friends said he had served three years in the penitentiary and he would serve three more for this man Oliphant; that he got good food there, that the people there did not know how to eat it, and he knew how to eat it, and he would serve three years more for this man Oliphant.
Q. What did Oliphant say he would do with this man Howell?
A. He said he could get away with him, and that he would make him take water.
Q. How long were they there?
A. I judge about half an hour. Then they came back again about nine o'clock. They walked up and down the bar-room and were boasting.

Q. Did they use bad language or threats?
A. Yes, sir; they used bad language. They went out from there afterwards and got into a fight on the other side of the street.

Take another specimen deputy marshal, Charles Herr. A respectable witness testifies as to him:

Question. Were you at the election on that day?
Answer. Yes, sir; I went around the polls in the morning to vote.
Q. Do you know the marshal who was there?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Who was he?
A. Charles Herr.
Q. Have you known him any length of time?
A. I have known him about five years.
Q. What is his character and reputation, as far as you know him?
A. Very bad.
Q. Has he been arrested?
A. He has been arrested to my knowledge for receiving money under false pretenses.
Q. More than once?
A. Not to my knowing.
Q. Was this recently?
A. About a year ago.

Take next the case of De Sanno, another deputy marshal:

Question. Who was the marshal there?
Answer. I think his name was De Sanno.
Q. Does he live in that division?
A. I could not say.
Q. Did you ever see him before that day?
A. I never saw him before that election day.
Q. What was his behavior on that day?
A. He was drunk the whole day; from about nine o'clock until about six he was right drunk. He was just around the division there.
Q. His name is not on the list of voters in the division?
A. No, sir.
Q. What did he do?
A. He was standing around there all day, just walking up and down before the window.
Q. Had he a badge?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. What was on the badge?
A. I think it said "Deputy marshal."
Q. Did he arrest anybody?
A. No, sir; he was too drunk, I think.

Of De Sanno another witness answers:

Question. Do you know the man spoken of here as De Sanno?
Answer. I know him by seeing him, that is all.
Q. Did you ever see him before that election day?
A. Once or twice.
Q. What was his behavior on that day?
A. Oh, he was drunk.
Q. Were you at the election poll all the day?
A. Pretty much all the day.

And another:

Question. What was your business at the election poll?
Answer. I was a United States supervisor.
Q. Did you see this marshal, Mr. De Sanno?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. What was his behavior and condition during that day?
A. He was drunk all day long, from morning until night.
Q. Do you know where he lives?
A. No, sir. They say that he lived at that "bum" lodging-house.
Q. Do you know at what he works?
A. No, sir.
Q. How long have you lived in that division?
A. Since August, 1861, about seventeen or eighteen years.
Q. When did you first see De Sanno in that division?
A. On election day.
Q. Did you, to your knowledge, ever know of him having voted in the division before?
A. No, sir.
Q. Had he a badge on as marshal?
A. Yes, sir; as deputy marshal.

Take next James Brown, another deputy marshal. A witness says of him:

Question. What is your official position?
Answer. I am clerk of the United States district court.
Q. Have you been such for some years?
A. I have been clerk of that court for four years, and have been in the office as assistant clerk for seventeen years.
Q. Will you turn to your records and tell us whether James Brown was convicted of any offense in your court; and, if so, when, and what it was?
A. [After referring to a record-book.] James Brown was convicted of personating and voting in the name of another person.
Q. What was the date of conviction?
A. The finding of a bill was on the 19th of November, 1872; the date of conviction (verdict) was November 22, 1872; the date of sentence was December 14, 1872.
Q. He was convicted on what date?
A. The date of the verdict is November 22, 1872. It was for [reading from the record-book] "personating and voting in the name of another person at an election held on the 8th of October, 1872, the day of the congressional election. Sentenced to eighteen months' imprisonment."
Q. When was Brown pardoned?
A. That does not come within my knowledge. The pardon is sent to the marshal, I think, originally.

Another witness says of Brown:

Question. Do you know James Brown?
Answer. Yes, sir.
Q. Were you at the election in that division in November last?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Who acted as marshal in that division?
A. James Brown.
Q. Had he a badge as marshal?
A. I am not positive about that; I think he had.
Q. How long have you known this man James Brown?
A. Twenty or twenty-five years.
Q. Is or not this James Brown who acted as marshal the man who was convicted in 1872?

Mr. HOAR. Were you present at the trial?
The WITNESS. I was a witness at the trial.
Q. Is the James Brown who was the marshal at this division in November the same James Brown who was convicted in 1872 for repeating and false personation?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. You were a witness in that case?
A. Yes. It was not within the same division; it was within the boundaries, but the division has since been cut; it was in what was then the eleventh division of the Fourth ward.
Q. What are the politics of this man James Brown?
A. He is a pretty good fellow, politically, I guess.
Q. Was he a republican or a democrat?
A. He is a republican.

And another:

Question. Do you know James Brown?
Answer. Yes, sir.
Q. The marshal acting in the fourteenth division of the Fourth ward at the November election?
A. I cannot answer that question.
Q. A marshal who was convicted for repeating or false personation in 1872?
A. I do not know of the marshal acting at all, not living in the division.
Q. Did you know the gentleman who was convicted?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. At the election in 1872, did you or not see him voting more than once?
A. I saw Mr. Brown vote once, but know that he voted twice.
Q. You know that he voted twice on the same day?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Was it in the same ward?
A. No, sir; he voted in the Ninth ward and in the Fourth ward.
Q. You say that you know he voted twice. You do not mean to say that, do you?
A. Yes, sir; I mean to say that.

Take next a few extracts from the testimony of a witness who had peculiar facilities for knowing the character of the parties of whom he speaks:

Question. What is your official position?
Answer. I am the murder detective of Philadelphia.
Q. In connection with what office?
A. The district attorney's.
Q. Do you know Philip Madden?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Where does he live?
A. On Bainbridge street, I think, above Seventh, in the Fourth ward.
Q. In what division?
A. I cannot tell; I think it is the fourth.
Q. What is the character of Philip Madden?
A. I think he is one of the worst men in Philadelphia.
Q. In what respect?
A. He is a dangerous man; he is violent and dangerous.
Q. How long has he been out of prison?
A. I think probably eight months or a year. He was convicted of highway robbery, I think.
Q. Do you know of this man Madden having shot anybody?
A. I did not see him shoot anybody. I heard he shot a boy at one time.
Q. Was he in prison, to your knowledge, more than this one time?
A. He was in prison twice.
Q. What is his general character; is it that of a peaceable citizen or that of a desperate, bad man?
A. His character is that of a desperate, bad man.
Q. Do you know Francis McNamee, of the Eighth ward?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. What is his character?
A. I arrested him for being concerned in five robberies, about seven years ago, and convicted him for having stolen goods in his possession. He was sentenced, I think, to eighteen months. I am not certain about the length of the sentence.
Q. Do you know in what precinct he lives?
A. No, sir; he lives in the Eighth ward, somewhere about Locust street.
Q. Do you know Joseph Hilferty?
A. No, sir.
Q. Do you know Daniel Reading, of the First ward?
A. Yes, sir; very well. I guess everybody here knows him.
Q. What is the general reputation of Daniel Reading?
A. He is considered to be a very bad, dangerous man. He has been tried for murder.
Q. How long since he was tried for murder?
A. In 1869.
Q. Is his reputation still bad or good?
A. Bad.
Q. Do you know a Mr. Pitts?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Of what ward?
A. The Seventh ward. He keeps a place in Lombard street, above Eighth, on the south side.
Q. What is his business?
A. He keeps a gambling place, and things of that kind.
Q. Is he a colored man?
A. He is a colored man.
Q. He keeps a gambling house. Is it a drinking-house?
A. Yes, sir. He has been arrested once or twice, and was tried before.
Q. For what offense has he been tried?
A. I cannot remember; but he was arrested once or twice.
Q. To what ward does Daniel Reading belong?
A. To the First ward. His name does not appear upon the list of marshals as having been put down for the precinct in which he lives, but I think he lives in the twenty-third precinct; on Mildred street below McKean, I think.
Q. Is the name of Frank McGowen on the list of marshals here before the committee?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Is the name of Philip Madden on the same list of marshals?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Do you know Henry Scott?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Who is he?
A. He keeps a hotel in Lombard street.
Q. Is he a white or colored man?
A. A colored man.
Q. Do you know anything of him?
A. His reputation is bad. I am forgetting about him.
Q. Do you know Rodney F. Springfield?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Is he of the Fifteenth ward?

A. Yes, sir.
Q. What is his reputation?
A. He was tried for killing a colored man.
Q. Is he upon this list as a deputy marshal?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. The name of Springfield is on this list?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Do you know Michael Slavin, of the Fifth ward?
A. Very well.
Q. What is his reputation?
A. He is a notorious repeater, a thief.
Q. Has that been his reputation for some time?
A. It has—so far as I know him—for eight or nine years. I have seen him lead gangs of repeaters to vote many a time; that is his profession, "repeater."

Take another instance, that of James Coligan, a deputy marshal. A witness says:

Question. Were you at the election-house most of the day?
Answer. Yes, sir.
Q. Who was the United States marshal there?
A. James Coligan, an ex-police officer.
Q. What was his condition during the day?
A. Most of the afternoon he was so drunk that he could hardly walk.
Q. Was there any interference by him during the day with voters; and, if so, what was it?
A. He was challenging everybody that came there, driving them away from the polls.
Q. What did he say and do to them?
A. He said that he was United States marshal, and had more authority around there than the judge inside or the police or anybody else. I was calling the policeman's attention to the fact that they had no business within thirty feet of the polls; and I asked him if they could read; that there was a notice signed by the judges, Ludlow and Fell. They said, "Oh, to hell with that," and Coligan came up. I told them that frequently during the day. When I told this police officer that in the afternoon, Coligan said, "Oh, you have got too damn much to say; I will take you in." I said, "No, I guess you won't; you are hardly able to take yourself in, you are so drunk now." He took hold of my collar, staggered into the gutter and back again against the house. Some citizens came up and said, "Why, you have no right to take this man in, he has done nothing." "Well, I'll take you in anyhow." The police persuaded him to let me go. I had said to him, "You might get yourself into trouble. I will hold you responsible if you do me any bodily harm;" so he let me go, and that was settled.
Q. What was he going to do with you?
A. He was going to take me down below, or, I suppose, to the station-house. He was an ex-policeman and a United States marshal, too.
Q. Had he a badge on?
A. Yes, sir.

Next let us see what a respectable citizen says of De Barth and Donlin, two deputy marshals:

Question. Were you at the election on that day?
Answer. I was.
Q. Who were the deputy marshals?
A. William De Barth and Thomas Donlin.
Q. Do you know Donlin?
A. I do.
Q. How long have you known him?
A. From boyhood; probably twenty-three or twenty-four years; I knew his father.
Q. What is Donlin's character?
A. He is a drinking man.
Q. About what is his age?
A. Probably twenty-eight or twenty-nine years.
Q. Do you know whether he is an habitual drunkard?
A. He is considered such, and has been; I know that he has been; I don't know how he is now. He has been in the house of correction.
Q. For what cause?
A. For drunkenness. I think his mother put him there.
Q. Was Donlin violent?
A. He was disorderly; he was in liquor all day there, and interfered with people voting, threatening to arrest them or have them arrested.

William Springfield was another deputy marshal. This is his character as given by a witness:

Question. What I want to get at first is who was the marshal at the polls?
Answer. The marshal was one William Springfield.
Q. Who was he?
A. William Springfield, another noted character, a man who could neither read nor write.
Q. Was he in his employ on the day of the election?
A. No, sir.
Q. Why not?
A. He had been discharged for stealing flour out of the mill, bags of flour. It had been discovered against him.
Q. How long before the election?
A. The day before.

John May was another deputy marshal. As to his character the witness says:

Question. What is your business?
Answer. I am a constable.
Q. Do you know John May, whose name is on the written list of marshals that I hold in my hand?
A. I do, very well.
Q. Is he the same who is on this list of marshals? [Indicating list in evidence.]
A. Yes, sir.
Q. What is his business?
A. He keeps a house of prostitution on the corner of Newmarket and Peg streets.

Abraham Hoffman was another, and the last one we will name. Of him the same witness says:

Question. Do you know Abraham Hoffman?
Answer. I do, very well.
Q. In what precinct does he live?
A. He is supposed to live in the fifth precinct of the Eleventh ward.
Q. Has he any other name than Hoffman?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. What is his other name?
A. I call him "Shad."
Q. Where does he live?
A. I give it up.
Q. What is his business?
A. He used to keep a house of prostitution on Fifth street, below Callowhill.
Q. Do you know anything about his occupation on election days?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. What is it?
A. A repeater.
Q. Who does he generally repeat for?
A. The republican party.
Q. How do you know that?
A. By following him on several occasions.
Q. Detail for us one of those little diversions of yours.
A. A couple of years ago he was out through the Thirteenth and Fourteenth wards.
Q. How many times did you see that he voted?
A. I suppose, at the least calculation, three to six times, at different places.
Q. Has he any known business now?
A. No; he skipped away for stealing a five-dollar note.
Q. When was that?
A. Here, some three or four months ago.
Q. Was there a warrant for him?
A. That I don't know.
Q. How do you know as a fact of his having stolen a five-dollar note?
A. He stole it from a man by the name of Lafayette Groul, on Third street, below Green.

These are but a few specimens from a vast number.

Under section 5522 it is provided that "every person, whether with or without any authority, power, or process, or pretended authority, power, or process of any State, Territory, or municipality, who obstructs, hinders, or otherwise interferes" with the supervisors, marshals, or deputy marshals, shall be liable to instant arrest without process, and shall be punished by imprisonment not exceeding two years and by fine not exceeding $3,000, both or either, and pay the costs. This power utterly overrides all State authority. It sets at defiance the laws and officers of the State. It does so without any cause or pretext, without any emergency in which the existence or safety of the Federal Government is endangered. It does not matter how perfect and complete the election laws of the State may be, no matter how rigid the restrictions and guards which it places around the ballot-box, no matter how honest and exemplary the election officers of the State may be, no matter how free and pure these elections, this law steps in and without pretext or cause, puts all under the surveillance of paid minions who have despotic control of the polls, with powers as arbitrary and wicked as were ever committed to the secret agents of a Tiberius or Richelieu.

The other sections of the law which lay down this code of inquisitions over free elections begin at section 2011 and end at section 2031. They provide a method of procedure to be pursued arbitrarily and without assigning any cause or pretext or exigency for the interference. The persons asking for supervisors are not required to found their application on affidavits or even averments that any fraud has been committed in the past, or that there is any reasonable apprehension that any fraud will be committed in the future, or that they believe the State laws will not secure a fair and honest election. This law does not require that the persons appointed as supervisors shall have even the old-fashioned and common qualification of being sober and intelligent men and of good moral character. There is nothing to indicate that they shall be men of any standing or character in their communities. The act on the contrary, by providing only that they shall be able to read and write the English language, leaves it open to the vilest of men. Any creature able to read and write the English language can be constituted a high inquisitor into the highest right of the citizens of the nation.

Sections 2017 and 2018, which it is proposed also to repeal, give the supervisors powers directly in violation of the sanctity and secrecy which the laws of my State and of many other States of the Union throw around the ballot-box. The latter section permits and directs the supervisors to open and pry into and handle and count the ballots of the electors after they have been polled and committed by the laws of the States directly and exclusively to the custody of the sworn officers of election. The sections from 2021 to 2027 are those authorizing the appointment of the deputy marshals, the most odious and worst class of the Federal agents. They are intended to be the tools of anything for which they may be needed, for the law authorizing them not only does not require them to be of good character and sobriety, but it omits the qualification prescribed for supervisors, who must be able to read and write the English language. Deputy marshals need not be able to read and write; they may be utterly illiterate, not able to read or write, and they may be criminals in all the grades of the calendar and drunkards and repeaters and vagabonds.

These are the paid creatures to whom is committed the important duty of keeping the peace at the polls and supporting and protecting the supervisors in the discharge of their duties and "to arrest and take into custody with or without process any person who commits or attempts or offers to commit any of the acts or offenses prohibited herein, or who commits any offense against the laws of the United States." And these illiterate and contraband deputy marshals are the judges of the right to arrest without process or information; and under this law thousands of the sovereign citizens of the nation, from New York to New Orleans, are annually arrested and their persons subjected to the violence and insult of such officials.

In New York City, under the administration of this law by Supervisor Davenport, at the last election acts were committed which should disgust intelligent, liberty-loving people. Six hundred and sixty citizens were arrested by the deputy marshals and taken before this petty autocrat for alleged offenses against this law of Congress.

Of this number only five were committed for trial, and of these none were ever tried. The following is an extract from the report of an able and impartial committee who investigated the subject of these arrests:

Commissioner Davenport sat in the United States court, which was crowded to its utmost capacity. No person arrested who appeared in it was allowed to leave under any pretense until his case had been heard. In consequence many were confined there for hours without food or drink. Mr. Secor interceded on behalf of one man who had been kept there four hours, but Davenport replied he could not help it; that he had too much to do to attend to them, a remark which elicited cries of "shame" from the audience. So strictly was the rule enforced that persons who had accompanied friends arrested into the room were unable to get out, and it was with great difficulty that their cases could be brought to Davenport's attention.

If any person made a noise Mr. Davenport directed him to be locked up.

Persons arrested were put in the iron cage or pen erected on the upper floor of the post-office building for the detention of the criminals tried in the United States courts. This at all times during the day contained some thirty persons, including the drunken, filthy, and boisterous prisoners as well as the respectable voters. At times it was crowded beyond its utmost capacity, and was so filthy that one prisoner, an old soldier, swore he would rather go all through the war again than stay there three hours.

We do not care to review each of the numerous sections of this Federal election law and the acts which are collateral to it. Section 2031 provides that each supervisor and deputy marshal shall receive $5 per day. This brings us to the cost of the machinery under this act which annually takes thousands of dollars out of the already depleted treasury of the nation. In Philadelphia last year alone there were 773 deputy marshals and 1,372 supervisors. The deputy marshals cost $7,600 and the supervisors $27,440, making an aggregate cost in Philadelphia alone in one year of $35,040 for the interference of the Federal Government in elections. What must be the aggregate throughout the South, where the law has its greatest effect, and in the other great cities of the North where the heel of the Federal Government is put on the necks of the people to wring from them an expression of their free consent?

This law is unconstitutional. It is tyrannical, and against the spirit and genius of free government. It is against the rights of the States, which were reserved to them in the solemn compact under which they came into the Union. It eats up annually thousands of dollars of the money which the impoverished millions of the nation need for subsistence. It is a prodigal, unlawful, despotic contrivance of the party in power to prolong its existence against the will of the people.

We will be recreant to our oath to support the Constitution of the nation, we will be derelict in our duty to the people whose sacred rights we must defend and preserve not only against open assault but much more against usurpation under the form of law, if we do not insist and demand the unconditional repeal of these unrighteous and tyrannical measures.

Mr. SAPP. Mr. Chairman, so much has been said, and so well said, already in the discussion growing out of these proposed repeals that I feel but little inclination to trespass upon the time and patience of the committee in considering the same, and my excuse for doing so is that I feel it would be doing injustice to the constituency I have the honor to represent on this floor were I to allow this debate to close without saying something against this not only unwise but in my judgment wicked legislation. Sir, the repealing provisions are broad and comprehensive, and leave us in no doubt as to the purposes intended. In what I have to say in this discussion I will confine myself to the proposed repeal of what is known as the election laws. It is the avowed object and purpose of the democrats in this House, one and all, both North and South, to wipe out every provision of national law securing the right of each elector to vote for a Representative or Delegate in Congress as his own judgment and conscience dictates, and to have that vote honestly counted, and this is done under the pretense of free elections.

Sir, I will endeavor before I am done to show what their real motives are, judging from what has been said by their chosen leaders, who have been selected to speak for them, as well as by the legitimate and necessary results of this proposed legislation, should they succeed. In order to obtain a correct understanding as to whether these election laws should be repealed or not, I will examine some of the reasons assigned by gentlemen on the other side justifying the action of the democratic caucus in demanding their repeal. Sir, it is insisted, first of all, by some of our democratic friends that these laws are unconstitutional, and that for this reason they should be repealed. If it be true that they are unconstitutional, then we ought, each and every one of us, to join cheerfully and earnestly in their repeal. But after listening to the able discussions here, and after the careful examination I have given the subject, I am convinced that it is not true. On the contrary, I think their constitutionality can scarcely be doubted. If gentlemen are sincere in what they say as to the unconstitutionality of these laws, if they honestly believe what they here pretend to believe, and if any considerable number share in that opinion, why is it that no effort has been made, no steps taken, to have this question passed upon by our courts? Why is it that their validity was never drawn in question until their repeal had been agreed upon by the joint caucus of the democrats in both Houses of Congress? This law has been upon our statute-books for seven years, during all of which time there has been the broadest opportunity desirable to have this question judicially determined. Why has it not been done?

But the Constitution itself is not silent upon this question. On the contrary, it seems to me its provisions are so ample that but little difficulty can exist among honest seekers after truth upon this question. Section 2 of article 1 of the Constitution provides who shall be electors for Representatives in Congress. It says:

The House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States, and the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature.

This section provides how often Representatives shall be chosen, by whom they shall be chosen, and what the qualifications of electors shall be to entitle them to vote for such Representatives. It is left to the State to fix the qualifications of electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature, but when this is done it is as much the constitutional right of the elector to vote for a Representative to Congress as it would be if the Constitution had so provided in express terms. In other words, when the Legislature of a State has fixed the qualifications of electors of the most numerous branch of the Legislature, such electors so qualified have the undoubted constitutional right to vote for a Representative to Congress, and the State can neither prevent nor abridge his exercise of this right. It is the Constitution of the United States that guarantees it to the qualified electors, and not the State, and the Constitution not only secures the right but also declares what the qualifications shall be upon which this right depends. Now, sir, the Constitution having in express terms designated what the qualifications of such electors shall be, and guaranteed to them the right to vote for Representatives when they are so qualified, where does the responsibility rest to see that they are not prevented from exercising this right?

To which is the elector to look, to the State or National Government, for security and protection in the exercise of this right to vote? This protection is due him from one or the other of these governments, and which one of them has he the right to demand this protection from? Is it the State in which he lives, or is it the General Government that has guaranteed this right that he must look to for this security and protection? Can there be any serious doubt that this protection, which all will admit he is entitled to and has the right to demand, should come from the Government of the United States, it having secured to him the right. Can a man be found in this House of Representatives bold enough to claim that it is not the duty of the General Government to protect its citizens in the exercise and enjoyment of each and every right secured by the Federal Constitution? Sir, is not that the end and purpose for which all free governments like our own are instituted? And yet the democrats of this House are attempting to defeat this very principle by this proposed repeal of the election laws. But if there yet remains any doubt upon this constitutional question let me call attention to another provision of the Constitution bearing upon it. Section 4, article 1 of the Constitution provides as follows:

The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators.

This gives to Congress supervisory control over the time, place, and manner of holding elections for Representatives in the several States. The Legislature of each State shall fix the time, place, and manner of holding these elections in the first instance, but this provision gives to Congress not only the right to alter these regulations, but to make new ones so far as the election of Representatives is concerned. And when can this power be exercised? Congress can make new regulations or alter existing ones for any cause at any time whenever it shall see proper to do so. There is no restriction or limitation as to when this power may be exercised. It is left to the sound discretion of Congress to exercise it whenever it shall see fit to do so. There is no prescribed public necessity or condition-precedent to the exercise of this power by Congress when it has once been regulated by the State. The language of the Constitution is, "But the Congress may at any time, by law, make or alter such regulations." The Constitution not only fixes the qualification necessary to entitle an elector to vote for Representative, but it also gives to Congress the power to fix by law the time and place where that right shall be exercised, and also to make regulations as to the exercise of that right. If it was the intention of the framers of our Constitution to leave it to the State, and to the State only, to make such laws as they shall see fit, why these provisions of the Constitution? for what purpose were they put into that instrument? What purpose was intended by the framers of that Constitution in inserting these provisions if it was not to confer upon Congress the power to enact these very regulations now sought to be repealed?

If this is not so where is the necessity of such constitutional provisions as these? What was the necessity or purpose in doing more than to leave it to the State to say what the qualifications of electors should be, and to leave it wholly with the State to provide for the time, place, and manner of electing Representatives? Why give to Congress supervisory control and the power to make such regulations as it shall see fit and proper in respect thereto? Certainly this was unnecessary if the construction contended for by our democratic friends is the correct one to be given to that instrument. But it is not; this is only the shelter behind which the more timid may seek protection to shield them from the indignation of an outraged constituency at the North for their perfidy in deserting their post of duty in the hour of peril, when their services were most needed and expected by the people, who, whatever their political opinions may be, are certainly in favor of a fair and honest election. Sir, it is not singular that these excuses should be furnished to them by democrats from the South. It always has been so in the past, and for aught that can be seen will continue to be so in the future. We all remember quite distinctly how zealously these southern democrats insisted that the war for the suppression of the rebellion was unconstitutional; that it was the constitutional right of the States to secede from the Union if they wished to do so, and all acts to coerce such sovereign States were denounced as acts of usurpation. These weak and foolish subterfuges then as now were furnished by southern democrats to their northern friends and allies, and were echoed all through the North, but now as then a patriotic and liberty-loving people will look through these pretenses and fathom their designs, which they seek to conceal.

But, sir, it is insisted that these election laws are repugnant to the feelings and wishes of the people, and that for this reason they should be repealed. Is this true? Is it the desire and wish of the honest and patriotic people of this country that these laws should be repealed? Is it the wish of those who believe in the purity of the ballot-box and in fair as well as free elections that they should be expunged from our statute-books? Do men think so who believe that our free institutions depend for their permanency upon the honest will of the people expressed through a pure and honestly guarded ballot-box? Or is it those who think more of party and party success by whatever means accomplished than they do of the peace, permanency, and prosperity of our free institutions? Is it not the white-liners, rifle clubs, moonshiners, ballot-box stuffers, and repeaters and the recipients of their nefarious crimes and outrages that desire the repeal of these laws? So much has been said about interference by the General Government under these laws during this debate that I will call attention to it at length, so far as the same relates to supervisors, United States marshals, and their deputies. The law is as follows:

SEC. 2016. The supervisors of election, so appointed, are authorized and required to attend at all times and places fixed for the registration of voters, who, being registered, would be entitled to vote for a Representative or Delegate in Congress, and to challenge any person offering to register; to attend at all times and places when the names of registered voters may be marked for challenge, and to cause such names registered as they may deem proper to be so marked; to make, when required, the lists, or either of them, provided for in section 2026, and verify the same; and upon any occasion, and at any time when in attendance upon the duty herein prescribed, to personally inspect and scrutinize such registry, and for purposes of identification to affix their signature to each page of the original list, and of each copy of any such list of registered voters, at such times, upon each day when any name may be received, entered, or registered, and in such manner as will, in their judgment, detect and expose the improper or wrongful removal therefrom, or addition thereto, of any name.

SEC. 2018. To the end that each condidate for the office of Representative or Delegate in Congress may obtain the benefit of every vote for him cast, the supervisors of election are, and each of them is, required to personally scrutinize, count, and canvass each ballot in their election district or voting precinct cast, whatever may be the indorsement on the ballot, or in whatever box it may have been placed or be found; to make and forward to the officer who, in accordance with the provisions of section 2025, has been designated as the chief supervisor of the judicial district in which the city or town wherein they may serve, acts, such certificates and returns of all such ballots as such officer may direct and require, and to attach to the registry list, and any and all copies thereof, and to any certificate, statement, or return, whether the same, or any part or portion thereof, be required by any law of the United States, or of any State, territorial, or municipal law, any statement touching the truth or accuracy of the registry, or the truth or fairness of the election and canvass, which the supervisors of the election, or either of them, may desire to make or attach, or which should properly and honestly be made or attached, in order that the facts may become known.

SEC. 2020. When in any election district or voting precinct in any city or town, for which there have been appointed supervisors of election for any election at which a Representative or Delegate in Congress is voted for, the supervisors of election are not allowed to exercise and discharge, fully and freely, and without bribery, solicitation, interference, hinderance, molestation, violence, or threats thereof, on the part of any person, all the duties, obligations, and powers conferred upon them by law, the supervisors of election shall make prompt report, under oath, within ten days after the day of election to the officer who, in accordance with the provisions of section 2025, has been designated as the chief supervisor of the judicial district in which the city or town wherein they served, acts, of the manner and means by which they were not so allowed to fully and freely exercise and discharge the duties and obligations required and imposed herein. And upon receiving any such report, the chief supervisor, acting both in such capacity and officially as a commissioner of the circuit court, shall forthwith examine into all the facts; and he shall have power to subpœna and compel the attendance before him of any witness, and to administer oaths and take testimony in respect to the charges made; and, prior to the assembling of the Congress for which any such Representative or Delegate was voted for, he shall file with the Clerk of the House of Representatives all the evidence by him taken, all information by him obtained, and all reports to him made.

SEC. 2021. Whenever an election at which Representatives or Delegates in Congress are to be chosen is held in any city or town of twenty thousand inhabitants or upward, the marshal for the district in which the city or town is situated shall, on the application in writing of at least two citizens residing in such city or town, appoint special deputy marshals, whose duty it shall be, when required thereto, to aid and assist the supervisors of election in the verification of any list of persons who may have registered or voted; to attend in each election district or voting precinct at the times and places fixed for the registration of voters, and at all times or places when and where the registration may by law be scrutinized, and the names of registered voters be marked for challenge; and also to attend, at all times for holding elections, the polls in such district or precinct.

SEC. 2022. The marshal and his general deputies, and such special deputies, shall keep the peace, and support and protect the supervisors of election in the discharge of their duties, preserve order at such places of registration and at such polls, prevent fraudulent registration and fraudulent voting thereat, or fraudulent conduct on the part of any officer of election, and immediately, either at the place of registration or polling place, or elsewhere, and either before or after registering or voting, to arrest and take into custody, with or without process, any person who commits, or attempts or offers to commit, any of the acts or offenses prohibited herein, or who commits any offense against the laws of the United States; but no person shall be arrested without process for any offense not committed in the presence of the marshal or his general or special deputies, or either of them, or of the supervisors of election, or either of them, and, for the purposes of arrest or the preservation of the peace, the supervisors of election shall, in the absence of the marshal's deputies, or if required to assist such deputies, have the same duties and powers as deputy marshals; nor shall any person, on the day of such election, be arrested without process for any offense committed on the day of registration.

SEC. 2023. Whenever any arrest is made under any provision of this title, the person so arrested shall forthwith be brought before a commissioner, judge, or court of the United States for examination of the offenses alleged against him; and such commissioner, judge, or court shall proceed in respect thereto as authorized by law in case of crimes against the United States.

SEC. 2024. The marshal or his general deputies, or such special deputies as are thereto specially empowered by him, in writing, and under his hand and seal, whenever he or either or any of them is forcibly resisted in executing their duties under this title, or shall, by violence, threats, or menaces, be prevented from executing such duties, or from arresting any person who has committed any offense for which the marshal or his general or his special deputies are authorized to make such arrests, are, and each of them is, empowered to summon and call to his aid the bystanders or posse comitatus of his district.

SEC. 2025. The circuit courts of the United States for each judicial circuit shall name and appoint, on or before the 1st day of May, in the year 1871, and thereafter as vacancies may from any cause arise, from among the circuit court commissioners for each judicial district in each judicial circuit, one of such officers, who shall be known for the duties required of him under this title as the chief supervisor of elections of the judicial district for which he is a commissioner, and shall, so long as faithful and capable, discharge the duties in this title imposed.

SEC. 2026. The chief supervisor shall prepare and furnish all necessary books, forms, blanks, and instructions for the use and direction of the supervisors of election in the several cities and towns in their respective districts; he shall receive the applications of all parties for appointment to such positions; upon the opening, as contemplated in section 2012, of the circuit court for the judicial circuit in which the commissioner so designated acts, he shall present such applications to the judge thereof, and furnish information to him in respect to the appointment by the court of such supervisors of election; he shall require of the supervisors of election, when necessary, lists of the persons who may register and vote, or either, in their respective election districts or voting precincts, and cause the names of those upon any such list whose right to register or vote is honestly doubted to be verified by proper inquiry and examination at the respective places by them assigned as their residences; and he shall receive, preserve, and file all oaths of office of supervisors of election, and of all special deputy marshals appointed under the provisions of this title, and all certificates, returns, reports, and records of every kind and nature contemplated or made requisite by the provisions hereof, save where otherwise herein specially directed.

SEC. 2027. All United States marshals and commissioners who in any judicial district perform any duties under the preceding provisions relating to, concerning, or affecting the election of Representatives or Delegates in the Congress of the United States, from time to time, and, with all due diligence, shall forward to the chief supervisor in and for their judicial district, all complaints, examinations, and records pertaining thereto, and all oaths of office by them administered to any supervisor of election or special deputy marshal, in order that the same may be properly preserved and filed.

SEC. 2031. There shall be allowed and paid to the chief supervisor, for his services as such officer, the following compensation, apart from and in excess of all fees allowed by law for the performance of any duty as circuit-court commissioner: For filing and caring for every return, report, record, document, or other paper required to be filed by him under any of the preceding provisions, ten cents; for affixing a seal to any paper, record, report, or instrument, twenty cents; for entering and indexing the records of his office, fifteen cents per folio; and for arranging and transmitting to Congress, as provided for in section 2020, any report, statement, record, return, or examination, for each folio, fifteen cents; and for any copy thereof, or of any paper on file, a like sum. * * * And the fees of the chief supervisors shall be paid at the Treasury of the United States, such accounts to be made out, verified, examined, and certified as in the case of accounts of commissioners, save that the examination or certificate required may be made by either the circuit or district judge.

These are all the sections in full of this law bearing upon the duties of supervisors, marshals, and deputy marshals in respect to elections. And it will be seen they have reference to elections of Representatives and Delegates in Congress and nothing else. So far as State officers and State elections are concerned these supervisors, marshals, and deputy marshals have no power to interfere; they have nothing whatever to do with these; their powers, duties, and authority are confined strictly to the election of Representatives and Delegates in Congress.

Let me give a concise statement as to their powers and duties under this law. The supervisors provided for in this act are appointed by the United States circuit court upon the written application of citizens of that locality. Their number is limited to two for each election district or voting precinct, and they must be of different political parties. Their duties are as follows: First, to attend the registration of voters who being registered would be entitled to vote for Representative or Delegate to Congress; second, to attend at the election held for a Representative or Delegate to Congress; third, to guard and scrutinize such elections; fourth, to witness, inspect, and report thereon, with the right to challenge, scrutinize, count, and canvass each ballot, "to the end that each candidate for the office of Representative or Delegate to Congress may obtain the benefit of every vote for him cast."

Now let us see what the duties and powers of the marshals are. At an election when a Representative or Delegate to Congress is to be chosen, the marshal of that district, on the application of citizens, may appoint deputies to assist the supervisors of elections in the discharge of their duties. They are, also, to keep peace at the polls and preserve order. They are to prevent fraudulent registration and fraudulent voting. They are to arrest and take into custody, with or without process, any person who commits, or attempts to commit, any of the offenses prohibited in this act, or any offense against the laws of the United States. They can only arrest without warrant when the offense is committed in the presence of such officer.

What is there in all this that an honest man need be afraid of? What is there in these laws that any one wishing nothing else but honest and fair elections can object to? Do they in any way interfere with the rights of the honest elector in the exercise of his right to vote? On the contrary, they protect him against the lawless and violent. Sir, where do the objections to these laws come from? Who asks for their repeal? Has their repeal been petitioned for by the people? Where is the petition that has been sent to this House asking that they be repealed? Nothing of the kind has been done, that we have heard of.

At the last session of the Forty-fifth Congress complaints were made by democratic Representatives from the city of New York against the marshals of that city, charging them with abusing the power conferred upon them by this law at the preceding November election. It was then alleged that these marshals arrested and imprisoned electors who were entitled to vote, and in that way they were prohibited to vote at that election. These gentlemen asked to have the alleged charges made against the official conduct of those officers investigated. The Judiciary Committee was charged with the duty of making this investigation, and what was the result? I will let that question be answered by a member of that committee who assisted in conducting the same. On the 19th of February last the distinguished gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] rose in his place and said:

I have just returned from an investigation into New York politics and New York elections. I have a few figures which I desire to give of that monstrous election of 1868, the most monstrous and marvelous that ever was held anywhere in this world for fraud, for wickedness, and for every device of the devil that the democratic party under the lead of Tweed and Tammany could suggest. Look at the horrible picture, and then tell me, do you wish it repeated?

In 1868 the supreme court of the State of New York suddenly came to the rescue of the democracy as a naturalization power. Prior to that year the court of common pleas and the superior court alone had issued naturalization papers. In 1868, on the 6th day of October, the supreme court, presided over by Judge Barnard, afterward impeached, naturalized in one single day twenty-one hundred and nine persons, and the superior court, Judge McCunn, also impeached, alone naturalized nine hundred and fourteen persons on the 19th day of October of that year.

In 1864 the supreme court of New York naturalized in the month of October ten thousand and seventy persons, and the superior court in the same month naturalized 27,897 persons, an average of a thousand a day. The common pleas court, an honest old court, out of fashion and favor with the democracy, naturalized only thirty-one hundred and forty-five persons.

More than five thousand minors presented their minor papers, were heard, and their case passed upon in one single court in New York City, and received certificates only to save the necessity for the two years' declaration of intention. In more than twenty thousand cases neither witness nor applicant ever appeared inside of either one of the New York courts. The papers were distributed in bundles to groggeries and groceries, to houses of ill-fame, to bar-rooms and billiard-rooms, in blank and filled up, as men called for them. In scores of instances ignorant natives of the United States voted upon these naturalization papers. They were sent in packages, five hundred in a package, up into the river counties of New York. They were sent, a thousand in a package, into the State of Connecticut, along the New Haven Railroad, and New Jersey received the full benefit of this democratic machine. In one instance they were delivered to thirty-six men working in a brick yard, the names being written in on the top of a machine. They were sold in scores of places for from fifty cents to $2 each.

There was one naturalization room where these poor ignorant fellows were sworn by a mock judge to support the Constitution and vote for Hoffman, and then received their papers clothing them with citizenship.

The superior court of New York was furnished in advance with thirty thousand blank certificates of naturalization; the supreme court with thirty-nine thousand; making sixty-nine thousand blank certificates in all. A count was made by the clerk of the court to ascertain the number that was left after the naturalization was over, and only eighteen hundred and some odd of these blanks were left. Therefore there were naturalized either in court or in Tammany Hall headquarters from sixty thousand to sixty-nine thousand in the year 1868, notwithstanding the records show only about forty thousand.

There were nine standing witnesses, with a captain of the squad, witnesses in behalf of nearly seven thousand persons desiring to become citizens. One of them, the captain of the squad, was a witness in one court in nine hundred and eighty-six cases, and the judge knew personally that he was a drunken thief. He swore that he knew all the men, while he probably did not know one single one of them, and the judge knew that he did not. That judge has since been impeached. What a loss to the party!

Nine men, repeaters, registered in three hundred different places, and voted in nearly every one of them. Men voted from two to forty times upon false registration. One vacant lot had registered from it one hundred and eighteen voters. More than five hundred persons were registered from localities where but fifteen actual residents could be found. And what shall I say more—for the time would fail me to tell of Tammany, of Tweed, of Tilden, and of Barnard, of McCunn, and the political scoundrels who through such rascality wrought works of unrighteousness and carried the State of New York for Hoffman by ten thousand majority.

Now, take the vote of 1868. The total increase during the thirty years previous was at the rate of 4½ per cent. a year. The vote for 1868 showed an increase of 49¾ per cent. in that single year. The average ratio of voters to the population from 1842 to 1860 was 8.41 per cent.; in 1868 the average ratio of voters to population was 1 to 4.65. Marvelous increase!

The committee of Congress sent there in 1869 to investigate this election found, as the result, that from fifty to sixty thousand fraudulent votes were cast.

Mr. Chairman, these crimes and outrages upon the purity of elections are without a parallel. Of all the outrages upon the ballot-box known in all past political contests, these are the most infamous. Much has been said about the outrages committed by ballot-box stuffers in different parts of the country, and the crimes committed by rifle-clubs, and moonshiners, in the Southern States. But bad as they are known to have been, I declare that, all things considered, these crimes and outrages perpetrated in the city of New York equal, if they do not eclipse, them all. These crimes and outrages upon the purity of elections were conceived and carried out by the democratic party in this the greatest commercial city in the Union, famous for its wealth and intelligence, where one would naturally expect the laws to reign supreme, and where, under the control of "the finest police in the world," any fraud on that safeguard of our liberties, the ballot-box, would be impossible. But turning our eyes from this disgraceful spectacle to the States so lately in rebellion against the Government of the United States, what do we behold? There we see the democratic party engaged in open violence, intimidation, and fraud, hesitating at nothing to carry out their measures to become the dominant party, equally ready for a Hamburgh massacre, or a thousand tissue-paper ballots, wherewith to overcome the colored vote without killing the voters, yet equally loud with the democrat from the Empire City in demanding the repeal of these laws. Indeed, their repeal is demanded by the democratic caucus, which is not only directed but controlled and governed by these democratic Representatives from the South.

The frauds perpetrated in our great cities at elections, and the open, bold, and flagrant violations of the law in the States so recently in rebellion render these laws indispensable, unless it is the purpose and intention of gentlemen on the other side to abolish all restraint and allow these things to be repeated at the pleasure of any person so disposed. Can this be what gentlemen mean by a free ballot, untrammeled elections, and unlimited freedom at the polls, of which they have spoken so long and so loud? During the course of this debate southern democrats have not only spoken exultingly of the return of that party to power, but have arraigned the republican party for what was done by it during the war for the suppression of the rebellion. Let me call attention to the manner in which that party is arraigned by the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. CHALMERS.] In a speech delivered by him a few days ago on this floor, he said:

We not only made no threats "to shoot the Union to death," but we said to you, as the patriarch Abram said to Lot, let there be no strife between thee and me, you may go to the North and we will go to the South. But it was you who said to us you shall not go. You sent grand armies after us. You hemmed us in by land and by sea. You not only threatened to shoot but you shot us to death. With the battle-cry upon your lips of the Constitution as it is and the Union as it was, you rallied the whole North without regard to party in defense of the old flag, and when the battle was won you tore off the veil that covered your hideous deformity; you dissolved the Union that you had saved; you changed the Constitution of our fathers for which you had pretended to fight; you changed State sovereignties into military provinces; you converted the constitutional Union by usurpation into almost a military despotism presided over by a successful military chieftain.

It is true, as stated by that gentleman, that we said to them they should not go; we also sent great armies after them, and we hemmed them in by land and by sea until they surrendered and acknowledged the supremacy of our Government. But it is not true that our battle-cry was "the Constitution as it is and the Union as it was," and in that way rallied the whole North, without regard to party, in defense of the old flag. This cry of "the Constitution as it is and the Union as it was" came from a party in the North opposed to the war, and which in national convention prior to that time had declared that the war for the suppression of the rebellion was a failure. Do gentlemen have any difficulty in understanding to what party I refer? It is the same party that is here demanding the repeal of these, to them, obnoxious laws, and that were far more effective in their attacks made in the rear of our armies than were these gentlemen who boast of the part they took in attacking our front. And this cry of "the Constitution as it is and the Union as it was" was not urged by the democracy of the North until they knew that the rebellion was near its close. But, sir, I submit, in all candor, that for gentlemen who did all in their power to destroy this Government and dissolve this Union to undertake to denounce what was done by the Government for its preservation shows an utter disregard of the gratitude they should feel toward the Government for the leniency extended to them and all others engaged in the rebellion.

Is it not a novel spectacle to witness gentlemen here on this floor of the House of Representatives, who so recently did all they could to put an end to the union of these States, not only dictating the laws that shall be passed by Congress, but also criticising what was done by the Government in suppressing the rebellion in which they were engaged. Such arrogance and audacity is without a parallel, unless it be found in the alacrity with which the doughfaces of the North do their bidding; for they are the aiders and abettors of the South in all things. Do gentlemen of the South think that their declared purpose to strike the last vestige of war measures from the statute-books is a fitting return for their restoration to all their civil and political rights; admitted to be an act of magnanimity unparalleled in the history of any country?

Sir, it is insisted by gentlemen that we are endeavoring to engender sectional strife and ill-will, because we see proper to refer to the past record of the democratic party in the discussion of these measures. If gentlemen are sincere in making this complaint, why is it that they persist in introducing these measures that necessarily provoke such discussion? Is it expected of us to remain entirely silent, and allow the things to be done they are here attempting to do without lifting our voice against them? During the war, gentlemen of the South said all they wanted was to be let alone, but we did not let them alone then, and we do not propose to let the democratic party alone now, and by so doing enable them to accomplish by legislation what they failed to do by force of arms.

It has been insisted by some gentlemen on the other side that if these appropriation bills are vetoed by the President, and for that reason the necessary appropriations for the support of the Government are not made by Congress, the responsibility rests with the republican party. We all know that this is not true, and it is advanced only by those who are afraid to meet the just responsibility and consequences of their own acts and that of the party to which they belong. Gentlemen on the other side say to the President and to us, "If you will consent to the repeal of these laws providing for fair and honest elections, and will agree that no interference by the Army or Navy or other persons shall under heavy penalties be permitted to keep the peace at the polls, then we will appropriate all the money necessary for the support of the Government; but if you will not consent to do this, the Government shall not have one dollar for its support." My democratic friends, this is the position you assume, and you take all the responsibility resulting therefrom. In other words, you say, "You must agree that we shall have our own way about other independent legislation, or we will not give one dollar to the Government for its support, let the consequences be what they may." And gentlemen of courage and candor among you admit this to be your position. The distinguished gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] who now occupies the chair, and an admitted leader on your side of the House, so stated the other day in the following bold and distinct utterances:

I am willing, and those with whom I stand are willing, to accept this issue, and we go further, we tender it. We are the ones to make the issue and we are ready for you to accept it. Planting ourselves upon this broad ground, we welcome controversy. We seek no quarrel with you, but for the first time in eighteen years past the democracy are back in power in both branches of this Legislature, and she proposes to signalize her return to power; she proposes to celebrate her recovery of her long-lost heritage by tearing off these degrading badges of servitude and destroying the machinery of a corrupt and partisan legislation.

We do not intend to stop until we have stricken the last vestige of your war measures from the statute-book, which like these were born of the passions incident to civil strife and looked alone to the abridgment of the liberty of the citizen.

We demand an untrammeled election; no supervising of the ballot by the Army. Free, absolutely free right to the citizen in the deposit of his ballot as a condition-precedent to the passage of your bills.

* * * * * * *

Now, sir, the issue is laid down, the gage of battle is delivered. Lift it when you please; we are willing to appeal to that sovereign arbiter that the gentleman so handsomely lauded, the American people, to decide between us.

Standing upon such grounds, we intend to deny to the President of this Republic the right to exercise such unconstitutional power. We do not mean to pitch this contest upon ground of objection to him who happens, if not by the grace of God, yet by the run of luck, to be administering that office.

I tell you here that if from yonder canvas [pointing to the picture of Washington] the first President of this Republic should step down and resume those powers that the grateful people of an infant Republic conferred upon him as their first Chief Magistrate, if he were here, fired by that patriotic ardor that moved him in the earlier and better days of this Republic, to him we would never consent to yield such dangerous and unwarranted powers, to rest the liberties of the citizen upon any one man's discretion, nor would he receive it.

It was not for the earlier but for the later Executives of this Government to grasp and seek to retain such questionable prerogatives. You cannot have it. The issue is made; it is made upon principle, not upon policy. It cannot be abandoned; it will not be surrendered. Standing upon such ground, clothed in such a panoply, resting this case upon the broadest principles of eternal justice, we are content to appeal to the people of this land. There is no tribunal to which we are not willing to carry this case of contest; we are willing to allow Him who rules the destinies of men to judge between us and give victory to the right.

I do not mean to issue a threat. Unlike the gentleman from Ohio, I disclaim any authority to threaten. But I do mean to say that it is my deliberate conviction that there is not to be found in this majority a single man who will ever consent to abandon one jot or tittle of the faith that is in him. He cannot surrender if he would. I beg you to believe he will not be coerced by threats nor intimidated by parade of power. He must stand upon his conviction, and there we will all stand. He who dallies is a dastard, and he who doubts is damned. [Great applause on the democratic side.]

Sir, these are the declarations boldly and defiantly made by the acknowledged leader of the other side, and he has stated as plainly as language can do what their real purposes are, and he admits that the consequences of a failure to appropriate money for the maintenance of the Government rests upon the democratic party.

Gentlemen, have you seriously considered all the consequences of a failure to make the necessary appropriations for the support of the Government? Have you carefully and honestly contemplated the results that will follow from such an act? If you have, and are willing to assume the responsibility, as you declare you are, then I declare your act to be revolutionary and you, one and all, to be revolutionists. I declare your crime against the Government it is your duty to support and defend but little better than treason—but little better than the bloody rebellion you inaugurated and prosecuted for its overthrow.

Sir, this Government raises annually by taxation in one form and another a little over $200,000,000 of revenue. By whom and for what purpose is it paid into the Treasury of the United States? Of this vast sum the whole of it is paid by the people of the States that did not secede but remained in the Union, excepting a little over $13,000,000, of which sum of thirteen millions Virginia paid for tobacco tax over $6,000,000. For what purpose is this money paid into the Treasury by the people? It is paid in for the following purposes, and for these only: for pensions to widows and disabled soldiers; to pay the public obligations; and to pay the annual expenses of the Government. The amount required for these purposes is susceptible of calculation and certainty. It is the duty of Congress to ascertain how much will be required for these purposes, and when this amount has been ascertained it is as much the duty of Congress, under the Constitution, to appropriate the same as it is to do any other act it is called upon to perform, for without it the Government must cease to exist. To assume the responsibility of not doing so is to disregard and set at defiance the plainest obligations of constitutional duty. Gentlemen on the other side have said repeatedly on this floor that unless these securities and safeguards to the ballot-box were broken down they would do this very thing. I warn them now that if they do they will bring down upon themselves the indignation of an outraged people, and that the place that knows them now shall know them no more forever. Sir, before closing, let me call attention to the real motives and purposes of the democratic party. Do they urge the repeal of these laws to secure fair and free elections? Is it to enable the will of the majority fairly and honestly expressed through the ballot-box to determine who shall fill the various elective Federal offices? Are gentlemen prompted by these considerations in putting this proposed legislation upon the appropriation bills for the support of the Government? Not at all. They hold their boasted majority in both branches of Congress at this time by means of intimidation, violence, ballot-box stuffing, and fraud as notorious and open as the light of day. They know that with anything like a fair election for President in 1880 defeat to their candidate will be the inevitable result. Hence their deep-felt anxiety for the repeal of these laws. But, sir, in this, like other conspiracies against the rights and liberties of the people that have marked their course in the past, they will be overwhelmed and defeated.

Mr. DEERING. Mr. Chairman, I will occupy the attention of the House but for a very short time. All legal points involved in the pending proposition have been fully considered and ably handled by gentlemen who have already spoken. I will not, therefore, enter upon that branch of the discussion, but will submit a few remarks of a general character which have been called out by numerous ill-timed and ill-tempered political speeches from the other sid of the House.

Mr. Chairman, the spectacle which we now present before the civilized world is, with perhaps one or two exceptions, the most humiliating and disgraceful of any in the history of this Republic. To other nations, at least, we certainly must appear to stand on the very verge of anarchy and revolution. The speeches and actions of those on the other side of the Hall who "put this ball in motion" will bear that interpretation and no other. Other nations will be interested to know, as our own people were, why we have this new and uncalled-for discord and disorder. Sir, the inquiry was well answered by the distinguished orator and leader on the other side of the Chamber, [Mr. BLACKBURN,] and in the following words, which have been so often quoted here:

For the first time in eighteen years past the democracy are back in power in both branches of this Legislature, and she proposes to signalize her return to power; she proposes to celebrate her recovery of her long-lost heritage by tearing off these degrading badges of servitude and destroying the machinery of a corrupt and partisan legislation.

We do not intend to stop until we have stricken the last vestige of your war measures from the statute-book, which like these were born of the passions incident to civil strife and looked to the abridgment of the liberty of the citizen.

Many others on that side have made, in substance, the same declaration.

This, sir, is the very answer that any person acquainted with American history would expect. Every intelligent person knows that this modern democratic party has left all along the highway over which it has traveled unmistakable evidence of violence and disorder.

For many years this party kept the country "on the ragged edge" of revolution, and finally plunged the differing sections into fratricidal and bloody war. Deserted and betrayed by her northern allies, the South was left to fight it out single-handed and alone. She was fairly whipped into submission and kept for a number of years under reasonable control.

Through clemency and magnanimity on the part of the victors (which I fear was misapplied) the old party has returned to power in the halls of Congress. And we see the result. Let the country and those who may come after us take warning. They abuse our generosity and celebrate their return by dealing new and stunning blows at the very life of the Government by an assault upon the Constitution and the laws of the country; by an attempt to tear away the safeguards which surround and protect the ballot-box. Sir, they do not even come in disguise, but in their old-time character, and the old spirit of contention and strife is still dominant in all their proceedings. Their first movement aims directly and solely at the perpetuity of their party supremacy in the Government. And in this they but follow those practices in which they were long since schooled and skilled. They know very well that the pure and free ballot, fairly counted in every city and State, would soon hurl their party from power and relegate their leaders to private life. Consequently all obstacles to repeating and stuffing at the ballot-box must be speedily removed.

By a system of tyranny and oppression that will forever stain and dishonor the pages of southern history, they have succeeded in stilling the voice of the weaker race and in strangling out their rights and privileges at the polls. The colored people of the South have been virtually disfranchised under a reign of terror and cruelty that will stand forth as a lasting disgrace to American civilization.

But, sir, it has given to the democratic party a solid South, and they now propose to extend their conquests over northern cities and States. The State of New York is their objective point. They have not forgotten the facility with which that State was formerly kept in hand. It was best stated by a quondam candidate of the democratic party for the Presidency, Mr. Greeley, in his famous letter to their later candidate, Mr. Tilden. On the 20th day of October, 1869, Mr. Greeley, in his letter, said:

Mr. Tilden, you cannot escape responsibility by saying, with the guilty Macbeth—

"Thou canst not say I did it; never shake
Those gory locks at me!"

for you were at least a passive accomplice in the giant frauds of last November. Your name was used, without public protest on your part, in circulars sowed broadcast over the State, whereof the manifest intent was to "make assurance double sure" that the frauds here perpetrated should not be overborne by the honest vote of the rural district. And you, not merely by silence, but by positive assumption, have covered those frauds with the mantle of your respectability. On the principle that "the receiver is as bad as the thief," you are as deeply implicated in them to-day as though your name were Tweed, O'Brien, or Oakey Hall.

* * * * * * *

Right well do you comprehend the means whereby the vote of 1868 was thus swelled out of all proportions. There are not twelve thousand legal voters living in those wards to-day, though they gave Hoffman 17,443 majority. Had the day been of average length, it would doubtless have been swelled to at least twenty thousand. There was nothing but time needed to make it one hundred thousand, if so many had been wanted.

It is well remembered that Mr. Tilden was leader of the managing forces and organizations of the democratic party in that State, and that the frauds referred to were not accidental, but were deliberately planned and perpetrated as one of the established methods to party success.

They now find in these supervisor laws a hinderance to similar frauds and practices in the future and the only real obstacle to the coveted prize—the next Congress and the next Presidency. This barrier must be removed at any cost, and that is the work upon which they have entered here.

Why, sir, they did not even wait for their advancing majority in the Senate to reach their seats, but under the intoxication of power and the frenzy of party passion dashed wildly upon our works. They now defiantly inform us that this mad act shall be carried to a successful issue even though they may "sit here until this Congress shall expire by constitutional limitations." Well, sir, such menaces and threats do not alarm us very much. They are not new to northern ears. Gentlemen from the South ought to know the North after a while. Four years of deadly encounter must have taught them something. In 1860 and 1861 the northern people knew they were right, and they stood their ground. In 1879 we again know that we are right, and we will be at our post of duty to the end. We can venture as far in defending as they can go in tearing down the frame-work of free Government.

They now assert with great positiveness that their action in this matter is justifiable and is right. Just so they declared in 1861, and as late as 1864, in their national convention at Chicago, that the war was a failure. But results have since shown that they have been often mistaken heretofore, and they may be in this instance.

But, sir, the most striking and amusing feature of this debate has been the loud protestations on the other side of the House of a desire to avoid "sectional strife." They first hurl these fire-brands into our camp, and then implore of us that we will not be unkind and resist or resent lest it should revive "old animosities." It seems rather late to deplore the conflagration after they have applied the torch with their own hands. It will be very difficult for you, gentlemen, to justify this precipitate and ill-starred act before the people, when we know, and you know, and the country knows that no election of importance under the supervisor laws can transpire until after another regular session of Congress. It was not even possible that any interest should suffer by delaying this action until next fall, and by giving to the country a season of rest and to the people an opportunity to express their wishes and opinions at the polls.

But, sir, it was, as I understand, decided at democratic headquarters that the success of their party in 1880 depended upon the repeal of these laws, and they were impelled to this rash venture by party purposes and advantages. All other considerations dwarfed into nothingness in comparison with party interests, and were made to bend to this one inexorable demand and decree. They dare not trust their fortunes to the well-guarded and well-regulated ballot, and therefore these safeguards and this protection must be broken down. At the same time we find them earnest in adjurations of sectional strife, and constantly pleading for peace.

Mr. Chairman, at the close of the war there was one great actor who said "let us have peace," and meant just what he said. He and his associates hung up their swords, and turned their attention to pursuits and practices of peace. Our people longed for tranquillity, and for good order and good-will. Had the South acted in good faith, all the now gaping wounds would have been long since healed. And if they now desire oblivion for all that is unpleasant in the past, they can easily find the way to peace and concord. They will find always a generous response from the North. Our people ardently desire harmony. But you cannot wrench from us our rights and our convictions. Nor can you reasonably expect harmony if you persist in carrying out the threat with which you have "signalized your return to power." You cannot "tear from the statute-books the last vestige of the war measures," and avoid "sectional strife." Under God the results of the great war must stand at any cost.

You can have peace and harmony and concord by simply obeying the Constitution and the laws of the country. But in view of your constant encroachments and exactions the northern people cannot be blamed for regarding your professions and protestations with distrust and suspicion. We do not know what may be the next step taken and the next demand.

Some things, sir, we cannot yield, and they had better not press these demands too far. We have not yet repented of the part we took in the late war. We do not like to believe just yet that it was any less respectable and patriotic to fight in defense of this Goverment than it was to fight for its destruction. We still believe that the republican party did well in releasing several millions of human beings from bondage, and think the reconstruction laws and those which require the payment of the national debt and pensions to Union soldiers are defensible and should be allowed to stand on the statute-books with many other acts of a similar character which grew out of the rebellion.

But, sir, how soon they may commence their assaults on these we cannot tell, nor when these demands will end. The general spirit and scope of remarks made by scores of speakers on the other side have been in effect that the measures and the policy of the republican party since 1861 have been a series of usurpations and great wrongs, and that the "last vestige" must be stricken from the book of remembrance. Such was the spirit of the entire speech of the distinguished gentleman from Kentucky. The able and usually candid gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. SINGLETON,] in his speech of April 9, used this language:

I acquiesce in the partial repeal of the supervisors law, with notice to all concerned that I accept this as only the first installment of justice due to a long suffering people, and that I shall hereafter claim full payment of the debt by the abrogation of every line, word, and letter of said act.

Similar but more violent and suggestive utterances have fallen from the lips of many others.

In addition to this, sir, the old-time heresy of State sovereignty, or State rights, as it is more commonly called, has been rehabilitated and brought into prominence in this Chamber. Late in the last Congress the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SINGLETON] said, in reply to Mr. Foster, of Ohio:

I owe my first and highest allegiance to the State of Mississippi. That is my doctrine.

And since that time, notably since this new scheme has been under consideration, this dangerous doctrine has been advocated as openly and defiantly as it was in 1860. Under this theory of government, sir, they would again advertise to the world the miserable delusion that this Union of States is no better than a rope of sand, and is as easily disintegrated and destroyed. Now, sir, these declarations do not alarm us, by any means, but they do prove the base ingratitude of gentlemen who hold their seats on this floor through the generous clemency of the North.

Mr. Chairman, if any evidence has been wanting to convince the country and the world that the democratic party is dangerous and cannot be again trusted to administer this Government these exhibitions of bad faith and sectional spite cannot fail to furnish it. It seems rather early for them to forget that we have but recently fought over and settled the question of State rights on the "darkened and perilous ridges of battle." If they forget it the people of the North and West will not.

A great deal has been said about starving this Government to death, or destroying it by some other method; but, sir, it is not in the power of any party on this floor or in this country, from the South or from the North, to destroy this Government. There must be and is somewhere about the Constitution lodged the inherent power of self-preservation.

The time never has been and never will come when a mere handful of men who happen for the time being to hold brief authority in this Chamber or elsewhere can deliberately overturn and destroy this Government. If it should ever come to the alternative of deciding between providing supplies and the extinction of the functions of Government, money would, as I believe, come like rivers of water, voluntarily and without stint, to its relief; but if it should not, then, as a last resort, I am certain that extreme and extraordinary measures would be adopted. Stern necessity in any great exigency would not only justify but demand the sacrifice of certain minor rights in order to save from threatened extinction the vital forces and underlying principles of free government.

No, sir; those who have already assailed, or may hereafter assail, will perish and pass away, but this "Government of the people, by the people, and for the people" will remain to bless mankind long after those who fill these places shall have gone to their long rest and been forgotten.

Now, Mr. Chairman, a few words in relation to these supervisor laws which it is proposed at once to repeal. These laws apply simply to elections for Representatives or Delegates in Congress, and not in any sense to the election of local and State officers; not to small towns or to sparsely settled portions of the country, but to large cities and towns of twenty thousand inhabitants or upward. In these large cities, where an unknown and shifting population favors the perpetration of frauds by repeating and ballot-box stuffing, these laws provide for the appointment of supervisors by the United States circuit court, and from opposing political parties. They are appointed only on request of two or more citizens of good standing, and are required to guard and protect the ballot-box and the rights of voters in such manner as to secure a free and fair exercise of the rights of suffrage and an honest count of the votes. I will ask that several sections of the law may be read, and allow them to speak for themselves:

SEC. 2011. Whenever, in any city or town having upward of twenty thousand inhabitants, there are two citizens thereof, or whenever, in any county or parish, in any congressional district, there are ten citizens thereof, of good standing, who, prior to any registration of voters for an election for Representative or Delegate in the Congress of the United States, or prior to any election at which a Representative or Delegate in Congress is to be voted for, may make known, in writing, to the judge of the circuit court of the United States for the circuit wherein such city or town, county or parish is situated, their desire to have such registration, or such election, or both, guarded and scrutinized, the judge, within not less than ten days prior to the registration, if one there be, or, if no registration be required, within not less than ten days prior to the election, shall open the circuit court at the most convenient point in the circuit.

SEC. 2012. The court, when so opened by the judge, shall proceed to appoint and commission, from day to day and from time to time, and under the hand of the judge, and under the seal of the court, for each election district or voting precinct in such city or town, or for such election district or voting precinct in the congressional district, as may have applied in the manner hereinbefore prescribed, and to revoke, change, or renew such appointment from time to time, two citizens, residents of the city or town, or of the election district or voting precinct in the county or parish, who shall be of different political parties, and able to read and write the English language, and who shall be known and designated as supervisors of election.

SEC. 2016. The supervisors of election, so appointed, are authorized and required to attend at all times and places fixed for the registration of voters, who, being registered, would be entitled to vote for a Representative or Delegate in Congress, and to challenge any person offering to register; to attend at all times and places when the names of registered voters may be marked for challenge, and to cause such names registered as they may deem proper to be so marked; to make, when required, the lists, or either of them, provided for in section 2026, and verify the same; and upon any occasion, and at any time when in attendance upon the duty herein prescribed, to personally inspect and scrutinize such registry, and for purposes of identification to affix their signature to each page of the original list, and of each copy of any such list of registered voters, at such times, upon each day when any name may be received, entered, or registered, and in such manner as will, in their judgment, detect and expose the improper or wrongful removal therefrom, or addition thereto, of any name.

SEC. 2017. The supervisors of election are authorized and required to attend at all times and places for holding elections of Representatives or Delegates in Congress, and for counting the votes cast at such elections; to challenge any vote offered by any person whose legal qualifications the supervisors, or either of them, may doubt; to be and remain where the ballot-boxes are kept at all times after the polls are open until every vote cast at such time and place has been counted, the canvass of all votes polled wholly completed, and the proper and requisite certificates or returns made, whether the certificates or returns be required under any law of the United States, or any State, territorial, or municipal law, and to personally inspect and scrutinize, from time to time, and at all times, on the day of election, the manner in which the voting is done, and the way and method in which the poll-books, registry list, and tallies or check-books, whether the same are required by any law of the United States, or any State, territorial, or municipal law, are kept.

SEC. 2018. To the end that each candidate for the office of Representative or Delegate in Congress may obtain the benefit of every vote for him cast, the supervisors of elections are, and each of them is, required to personally scrutinize, count, and canvass each ballot in their election district or voting precinct cast, whatever may be the indorsement on the ballot, or in whatever box it may have been placed or be found; to make and forward to the officer who, in accordance with the provisions of section 2025, has been designated as the chief supervisor of the judicial district in which the city or town wherein they may serve, acts, such certificates and returns of all such ballots as such officer may direct and require, and to attach to the registry list, and any and all copies thereof, and to any certificate, statement, or return, whether the same, or any part or portion thereof, be required by any law of the United States, or of any State, territorial, or municipal law, any statement touching the truth or accuracy of the registry, or the truth and fairness of the election and canvass, which the supervisors of election, or either of them, may desire to make or attach, or which should properly and honestly be made or attached, in order that the facts may become known.

Sections 2016 and 2018 and several other sections they now propose to repeal and to leave the supervisors utterly powerless, except to view the proceedings at elections as any other spectator would do in case they can obtain access to the polls; not to repeal them by the usual course of legislation, but by attaching to appropriation bills for sustaining the Army and carrying on the various departments of the Government. They admonish the President that if he shall decline to sign bills which his convictions do not perhaps approve, then the virtue of coercion is to be applied. It is for him, not me, to decide this question and his duty in connection therewith. It is for the people to consider and to pass upon the party that is responsible for these extraordinary and uncalled-for proceedings.

Mr. Chairman, it is our boast and our pride that there is on earth one place where the rich man and the poor man can meet as equals and on a common level, where the humblest citizen in the land is the peer of the most favored and most exalted in station. That place is at the well-regulated and well-guarded ballot-box. Each one expresses his will through his vote, and the will of each has precisely the same weight and influence in making and unmaking officers and laws. The guarantee of permanency in our free institutions and our popular form of government is in the rigid maintenance of the free and unobstructed ballot and the fair and honest count of the votes.

These supervisor laws which the democratic party propose now to repeal were wisely designed as a shield and protection to this sacred privilege, and there is no evidence that they have failed to accomplish the purpose for which they were enacted. Party interests alone have required the proposed change, and those who cannot consent to the repeal without surrendering their convictions of right and violating their oaths of office are to be coerced into submission under a menace in the hour of pressing necessity. But, sir, in utter ignorance of the feelings and purposes of the President, and without regard to what he may or may not do, I do not hesitate to venture the prediction that the same unseen hand that brought their late attempt upon the life of the Government to inglorious defeat will also bring this conspiracy to ignominious failure.

Mr. CLARK, of Iowa, addressed the committee. [See Appendix.]

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. Chairman, it has been frequently said upon the floor of this House, and the reference has been frequently made, that in dealing with this question we might look back to the powers that have been heretofore exercised by the House of Commons. We were referred a short time since by the gentleman from New York to the celebrated case of Ashby against White, for the purpose of showing that in that case the court of the king's bench decided that Ashby was entitled to bring a private action for damages for refusal to receive his vote.

Now while it is time, let us look for a moment to this case for the purpose of ascertaining what was the action of the House of Commons in the given case. It is true that it was decided in that case by Justice Holt, and on a writ of error to the House of Lords his opinion was affirmed, that the party whose vote was refused at the polls might bring his private action. Yet the House of Commons, immediately on the bringing of that action by Ashby against the returning officer of Aylesbury, took action and said that it was a breach of the privileges of the Commons of England for any individual to bring an action of that character. And while eleven judges decided, three in particular, that it was a breach of the privileges of the House of Commons, yet after the House of Lords on a writ of error brought before it reversed their action the House of Commons arrogated to itself the power to determine the right and privilege and decided that the court of king's bench was in contempt for entertaining an action of that kind.

After the House of Lords had passed resolutions declaring that it was not a question of privilege for the House of Commons to determine, and after the prorogation of Parliament and after Parliament had been convened again, other parties having brought the same action for damages, an action of trespass on the case, to determine their rights for having their votes refused, not only were the parties arrested and brought before the bar of the House of Commons but the attorneys and solicitors who acted in the case were also brought before the same bar and all were imprisoned.

I speak of this case in order to show that while it was correctly decided that an action did lie for the refusal to receive the vote of the voter, yet the exercise of the power on the part of the House of Commons was arrogant and unwarranted. The action and power of the House of Commons has frequently been cited in the past three weeks; yet it was a power which they were not entitled to exercise, but which they delegated to themselves and exercised in defiance of the law and of the privileges and liberties of the citizens of England. The House of Commons did imprison not only those who brought the action but the attorneys and the solicitors who brought the action for them.

While the House of Lords resisted the encroachment of the Commons, the action on the part of the House of Commons had gained a new impetus on their part, because a short time prior a man by the name of Colepepper at the head of one of the grand juries in one of the counties of England had signed a petition to the House of Commons to vote supplies that the wheels of the government might go on, and they had imprisoned him, and did so time after time until he was obliged to submit and on his knees ask pardon of the Commons. I say that being inspirited by their successes, this controversy was brought on between the Commons and the Lords and resulted in the imprisonment of the attorneys and of the parties who brought the action. And when the House of Lords called on the Queen to allow a writ of error in the cases for a habeas corpus in their behalf, her answer was that it might be proper for her to do so, but as she had no longer any reason to keep the two Houses of Parliament in session she would dissolve Parliament. She did so, and thus by that dissolution, says Hallam, a great constitutional question was avoided.

I speak of this to show that although the famous case of Ashby against White was decided on principle asserted by Justice Holt, yet the action of the House of Commons when referred to in this case and in others was an instance of arrogation of power which they had frequently delegated to themselves but which from that day to this they have never again attempted.

Mr. BRAGG. Has not the supreme court of your own State confirmed the decision in the case of Ashby against White?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I said in the outset that the case of Ashby against White was correctly decided; that he had a right to bring his private action for damages for the refusal to receive his vote. I cited the case, however, to show that the House of Commons of England, like all other numerous bodies, in the exercise of power is prone to excess. The democratic party, inspired by its accession to power in both Houses, has started out in the same career of excess of power, and if continued their lease of power will be brief. I cite it as an exercise of power that was not warranted on the part of the House of Commons by the constitution of England.

The supreme court of the State of Wisconsin did decide a case in reference to the right of suffrage, and it arose in this way: some time before I became a resident of the State of Wisconsin a vote of the people of the State was taken to decide whether colored men should have the right to vote. It was decided, I believe, by the official canvassers that a majority of all the votes cast at the election was necessary in order to adopt it, and hence for a time the colored man was deprived of his vote. After I settled in Wisconsin, in 1855, a colored citizen sued an election officer for refusing his vote, and the supreme court of the State decided that a majority of all the votes cast was not necessary for the adoption of the provision in reference to colored suffrage, but simply a majority of the votes cast on that subject; and from March, 1856, until the present time the colored man has had the right to vote in the State of Wisconsin. Thus the supreme court of our State did affirm the principle of the case of Ashby vs. White.

I have simply cited the case to show that the House of Commons deemed it an infringement on the privileges of the House for an individual to bring such an action, and all who brought such actions were arraigned before the bar of the House, with their attorneys and solicitors, and imprisoned for that act by which they sought to determine their right to the elective franchise which they claimed under the laws of the land.

But I must hasten on. Mr. Chairman, the security against the military power did not consist in the principle cited by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. CARLISLE.] He reminds the House that since 1707 the veto power has not been exercised in England. Now, I desire to state that the reason why the veto power has not been exercised in England since 1707 is the fact that from that time to this when a minister takes his place at the head of the government he assumes the responsibility of the acts of the government. He says in so many words, "I have advised the Crown to take this action; I take the full responsibility upon myself;" and the moment that any measure brought forward on the part of the government is defeated by the House of Commons, that moment either the ministry must retire or the House of Commons must be dissolved and new writs of election issued, so that the question may go to the country. Thus in sixty or ninety days the people can determine whether the government shall be sustained or not. This is the reason it is not necessary for the Crown to exercise the veto power any longer. In the early history of England, as we all know, bishops were lord-chancellors, and lord-chancellors were prime ministers, and the ministry was not responsible for the measures brought forward by the Crown. But from 1707 to the present day it has been understood that the ministry is the government; that when the House of Commons refuses concurrence in the measures of the ministry the latter must retire and a new ministry be formed.

We are told further that in all cases bills of supplies went hand in hand with a redress of grievances. Now, I desire to state as a matter of constitutional history in England that such is not the fact. From the very time that a ministry was formed in England, from the very day when money was appropriated specifically for given purposes, from the very day the law was passed imposing penalties upon the lord of the treasury should he order the payment of one dollar of money for a different purpose from that named in the appropriation, and likewise a severe penalty upon the officer of the exchequer if he paid such warrant—from that time to this the appropriation bills have flowed, as Hallam says, with redundant profuseness, and this is the only security that the liberties of the people of England have required from that day to this. The supplies of the army depend upon the action of the Commons, and no soldier can be paid without an annual appropriation for that purpose. The mutiny act must be passed each year, because without it no officer or soldier could be punished for any offense. Since the establishment of these principles no rider has been attached to an appropriation bill; the supplies have been furnished without reference to any riders. It was only before the people of England had any constitutional guarantee that if they granted supplies for a certain purpose they would not be diverted to some other purposes—it was only before that time that the redress of grievances went hand in hand with bills of supply. And when was that time? It was prior to the revolution of 1688.

At one time Charles the First conducted the government of England without a Parliament for seventeen years. He who was afterward his Lord Chancellor, Sir Henry Finch, revived the old statute in regard to ship-money in order that by this statute and the granting of licenses he might obtain money, and with this money raise a standing army of foreign emissaries and train bands among his own people without regard to Parliament. It was subsequent to that time—subsequent to the time when the act providing for triennial Parliaments was passed, that a redress of grievances was asked when bills of supplies were called for. But never since the day of the act providing for triennial Parliaments, or rather never from the day annual Parliaments were provided to this has there been a single struggle in the Commons of England in reference to voting supplies.

And, Mr. Chairman, I have called attention to this fact to show that to-day we stand upon the same constitutional principles that the Commons of England do. We stand to-day upon the same points; we have an annual session of Congress; we vote our bills of supplies yearly; we have a constitutional provision against voting supplies to the Army for more than two years. We stand upon the same footing constitutionally as the people of England do to-day. From the very hour they attained that point in their constitutional history that we started out with, when we framed our Constitution, up to the present hour, they have never in any instance attempted to "tack" in any form whatever any redress of grievances as a condition of voting supplies.

You will bear with me, Mr. Chairman, as I wish to present one or two further points. One is as to the power of sheriffs. The police power of the realm was always exercised in the earliest ages of the common law of England by the sheriffs. The sheriffs exercised that police power, and in its exercise have always had the power to bring to their aid the posse comitatus of the country, or any armed force necessary to put down riots, or whatever was required to bring about domestic tranquillity.

When the office of lord lieutenant was created the power of that office was, in many respects, made concurrent with that of sheriff. The office of sheriff was the highest and most honorable under the common law of England. In the exercise of the functions of his office the sheriff had all the power that has been given by the law sought to be repealed in this appropriation bill, which gives marshals no greater power than that possessed by sheriffs at common law in England.

I must hurry on. Let me, however, right here call attention to one fact that has been mentioned, that the power of a standing army, that the use of military force has had the tendency to create absolute power and thereby to menace the liberties of the people. Now the tendency toward absolute power in England, the greatest tendency in a long period, was between the reigns of Henry VI and Henry VIII. That tendency to absolute power was at a time when the King had but fifty yeomen as his body-guard, and when there was not a soldier in the pay of the Crown of England; yet, as I have already said, there was a greater tendency in those reigns toward absolute power than has been shown from the time of Henry VIII down to the present time. And why was it? It was because of the encroachment on the part of the star chamber upon the right of trial by jury. It was because of illegal acts on the part of that star chamber and the illegal use of bills of attainder by the Commons. It arose from the imprisonment by the star chamber of jurors who brought in verdicts under their oaths and refused to follow the declaration of the corrupt powers.

Men were most unjustly imprisoned for verdicts which they brought in as jurors, and it was because of those illegal acts on the part, not of a mob, not because of the fear of a standing army, not from any encroachments on the part of any military power, but because of a servile House of Commons in certain instances obsequiously yielding to the demands of the Crown, in others denying any responsibility of the Crown or themselves to the people, assuming supreme legislative and judicial power, denying responsibility to God or man. It was because of illegal acts on the part of the star chamber, and because, too, the House of Commons held that they had the right to exercise supreme power, and that they were not beholden or responsible to the people or the Crown—I say it was illegal acts on the part of the star chamber in a judicial capacity and excess of power; in the Commons, by illegal bills of attainder that promoted the tendency in England to absolute power, and which placed the constitutional history of England in a retrograde scale instead of a progressive one.

Mr. Chairman, the constitutional history of England bristles not so much with bayonets as with the illegal exercise of power on the part of the Commons. In the case of Ashby vs. White referred to a great constitutional question was eluded by the dissolution of Parliament, and the illegal assumption of power by the Commons was again attempted, occasioned by the decision of Lord Denman in the famous case of Stockdale vs. Hansard, in 1837, in which Lord Denman told the jury that the order of the House of Commons was not a justification for any man to publish a private libel. On May 30 of that year the Commons resolved, among other things, that its jurisdiction was sole and exclusive to determine upon the existence and extent of its privileges; that to bring them into discussion or decision by the institution of any suit or other proceeding in any other tribunal is a high breach of its privileges and subjects all parties concerned to its judgment and punishment, thus attempting to bind, by its declaration of law, all subjects between whom in a court of justice a question of privilege might arise, relying for authority upon the dissenting opinion of the judges in the case of Ashby vs. White, and claiming the right to punish at discretion all persons, suitors, attorneys, counsel, and judges who might even indirectly bring their privileges in question in a court of justice. Well may Hallam ask if in the worst times of the Tudors and Stuarts such a doctrine was ever laid down in express terms by any grave authority.

> That the best ground of confidence in the discretion of a Parliament is the mild temper of the government, as numerous bodies are always prone to excess, both from the reciprocal influences of their passions and the consciousness of irresponsibility, for which reason a democracy, that is the absolute government of the majority, is in general the most tyrannical of any.

This war between the arbitrary and limited power of the Commons continued when, in 1840, the sheriffs of London were committed by the Commons for executing a writ of the queen's bench, and although the point raised by such commitment was set at rest by the statute of the third and fourth Victoria, yet this dispute still remains undetermined.

From the foregoing it may be seen that the assertion that redress of grievances in England go hand in hand with bills of supply so far as the liberty of the subject is concerned has no foundation in truth since the days of the Stuarts; that instead of Parliament being the guardian of the liberty of the subject, he has had to crouch under its iron arm until the judiciary lifted him up and said to Parliament, "Thus far canst thou go, and no farther."

How much brighter the page of American history would be if in the struggles for the personal liberty of the subject the judiciary had all stood firm against any encroachments. Familiar with that history, let us turn to the question at issue in the proposed legislation before us.

The gentlemen on the other side of this House have presented to the Executive the alternative to either sign these bills or the nation may go unprovided with any means of life and support. The Constitution provides that the President shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed. The power thus vested is not discretionary, it is not limited; it is an express power in trust, it is supreme in its object, and must be exercised by the President, for a failure to do so might result in the overthrow of the Government.

In Cohens vs. State of Virginia, 6 Wheaton, Chief-Justice Marshall uses this language:

A constitution is framed for ages to come, and is designed to approach immortality as nearly as human institutions can approach it. Its course cannot always be tranquil. It is exposed to storms and tempests, and its framers may be unwise statesmen indeed if they have not provided it, so far as its nature will permit, with the means of self-preservation from the perils it is destined to encounter.

No government ought to be so defective in its organization as not to contain within itself the means of securing the execution of its own laws against other dangers than those which occur every day. It is very true—that whenever hostility to the existing system shall become universal it will also become irresistible. The people make the Constitution and the people can unmake it. It is the creature of their will and lives only by their will. But this supreme and irresistible power to make and unmake resides only in the whole body of the people, and not in any subdivision of them.

The attempt of any of the parts to exercise it is usurpation, and ought to be repelled by those to whom the people have delegated the power of repelling it.

In view of the principles laid down by Chief-Justice Marshall as just cited, and in view of the fact that the Constitution says the President shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed, if in obedience to the laws he deem it his imperative duty to veto this bill and the Army bill that has passed, and the majority refuse any appropriation, what is the duty of the President? What laws are referred to? The laws of the United States. What do those laws have for their object? The answer must be that laid down in the preamble to the Constitution—to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity. So that the object is to maintain the supremacy of the laws and promote the interests of the Government; and if any faction, party, or any State, or parts of these States, attempt its subversion by any means or process whatever, the President may exercise the power necessary to faithfully execute the laws and prevent any attempt, directly or indirectly, to overthrow the Government.

No rightful power can unmake or take away the life of the Government but that which created it. No one part of the people, no political party, or no one State or parts of the States has the rightful power to do so.

Such being the case the President while intrusted with the power given him under the Constitution may exercise it to preserve to the people the Government they have ordained, and may, in the exercise of the power thus granted use the means necessary to attain that result.

It is not too much to say, therefore, that when a majority in Congress refuse supplies, except upon a condition which shall be deemed by the President repugnant to the spirit of our laws, it is his right and lawful prerogative to veto the same to repel such usurpation and arbitrary power. And if supplies are still refused by an arbitrary act of a majority, he may take care that the laws be faithfully executed, and may lawfully exercise the power necessary to attain that result.

In considering this question there is one point of historical interest we may with profit keep in view, and certainly should not forget. In early times the Commons voted a certain share of their own goods. Their last grant of this character was in the twenty-second year of Edward III, in which they granted three-fifteenths of their goods. The Lords granted theirs separately. It is only since the reign of Charles I that grants have been by the Commons, the Lords assenting.

In the case of appropriations by Congress, the appropriation made is not a tax. The Appropriation Committee provides no ways and means, the Ways and Means Committee having all matters of that character in charge. The Appropriation Committee simply ascertain and prepares the estimates for each fiscal year, but have no power to tax one dollar.

Moreover we have already positive laws providing subsistence for the Army and sustenance for the different Departments of the Government; also laws providing how the revenues shall be raised to meet the current expenditures of the Government. But the democratic majority arbitrarily and through the Appropriation Committee say to the people: you cannot for the purposes you have by law provided draw one dollar from the Treasury of the sum you have provided by your revenue laws, unless you will submit to our demands and dictation. Thus the absolute government of a bare majority with its tyrannical, revolutionary, and coercive demands comes to the front with the crown of usurpation on its head to obstruct the Government. In such a condition of affairs and at such a juncture the power resides in the Executive to take care that the laws which provide subsistence for the various Departments of the Government be faithfully executed, and if he finds the democratic majority refuse to open the Treasury for that purpose, that the means already provided by law may be used; he may do as did President Lincoln when he found the door of the Treasury open, so left as the democratic party retired from it into the rebellion not leaving a dollar for the nation's support, he may appeal to the great sovereign of the country, namely, the people, and call upon them to voluntarily step forward and furnish nourishment and succor to strengthen hands and maintain the life of the Government.

Thus faithfully executing the laws already existing, made for the very object expressed in the Constitution, and to attain that just result for which the Government was ordained.

Such, Mr. Chairman, I believe to be the true spirit of our Constitution and laws, for it is "the letter of the law that killeth and the spirit that giveth life." Never were arguments more pregnant with sophistry, more untenable in fact, or more dangerous to free institutions than those brought forward by the dominant party in this House to uphold these illegal and revolutionary proceedings. They have not attempted to show that the laws they seek to amend are unconstitutional; they admit their validity, for they do not attempt the repeal of either but to amend and eliminate a portion thereof.

We now come to the reason advanced for this action, namely, to promote free elections. We deny, Mr. Chairman, that it will accomplish any such result, and believe the very opposite result will be attained. We have shown that if deprived of casting a legal vote any person thus aggrieved can have his action for damages therefor, and in the North the redress is certain.

In the case, however, of the colored people of the South, whose rights in some of those States are daily trampled under foot, that redress is practically denied, and the same power that overawes them at the polls also overawes them in the courts, and if they go to the Federal courts for redress they and their witnesses are arrested on some trumped-up charge made before a State tribunal, and they are thrown into prison. For attempting to exercise their franchise at the polls many have been murdered, others driven from their homes, or taken out and hanged, yet never has one single individual been punished for these offenses; while, on the other hand, never by the presence of any armed force at the polls to protect the voters has a single individual been killed; yet thugs and kuklux, red shirts and white-liners, have swarmed at elections and in the name of free elections have stuffed the ballot-box with tissue ballots, driven thousands of loyal voters from the polls, maimed and murdered hundreds more, and to-day they are fleeing from their oppressors, exclaiming as they go, in the language of the plebeians of Rome:

Since the patricians wish to enjoy the city alone let them enjoy it at their ease. For us Rome is nothing. We have neither hearths, nor sacrifices, nor country. We only leave a foreign city. No hereditary religion attaches us to this place. Every land is good for us. Where we find liberty there shall be our country.

Free elections! Turn your eyes to New York City. Democracy tells us she is there shorn of her jewels by these laws she seeks to repeal. What do we see? Only a week since Tammany society held her election. She would not call for Federal aid if she could. Apprehensive she might be overborne, not by republicans, not by any interference of Federal officers, but fearing the hoodlums of the party, fearing all the slums from which its party has drawn support at the elections would be turned loose upon her, we are told the doors leading to the main hall of Tammany are boarded up, and the main doors on Fourteenth street secured and barred with heavy scantling. In a partition leading across one of the main entrances a door is cut just large enough to admit one man at a time. In this door is a wicket four inches square, through which each one approaching is scrutinized before he is allowed to enter. Inside is a ballot-box of iron weighing two hundred and twenty pounds, guarded by two heavy locks; thus one at a time is allowed to vote, while in the basement are collected, ready for any needed action, two hundred plug-uglies, arrayed in the full panoply of their order, ready to do valiant service in case Tammany is beset by its own offspring, nurtured in its schools, receiving their diplomas from its professors. Thus stood Tammany, like King Lear, cursing its own progeny, claiming its downfall would be but the death-rattle of democracy.

What a commentary on free elections, and this in the city which we are told contains territory that can be encompassed by a ride of one-half hour, out of which may issue an illegal voting power sufficient to decide the next Presidency if these laws be repealed!

Sir, for evils like the present there is a sovereign remedy. As in the past so in the future will it apply a corrective for these great wrongs. That remedy will be found in the voice of the nation, and when it speaks its thunder-tones will reverberate through the land, proclaiming that its triumphs on the James shall not be surrendered on the Potomac.

Mr. RYON, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, the field of discussion covered by the bill under consideration has been so thoroughly, so ably, and so eloquently explored by the gentlemen who have preceded me that there is but little new left that can be said by anybody in relation to it. Nevertheless, at the risk of being obliged more or less to repeat what has been said by other gentleman and said much better than I can say it, I propose to ask the indulgence of the committee for a few moments while I urge some reasons in favor of the passage of the bill which we have before us and why it should become a law.

A great variety of objections has been made to this mode of legislation, the greater portion of which has no relevancy to the merits of the question at all, so that one sitting here and listening to what has been said by our friends on the other side would not fail to think there was a combined and studied effort on the part of the opposition of this House to suppress and keep from the eyes of the public the real controversy going on before the House.

Among the things which have been urged here with a good deal of force was the allegation that as the democratic side of this House consists of a greater number of southern democrats than of northern democrats, that as they were in the majority on this side of the House, they demanded this legislation and northern democrats stood here and yielded to any demand made upon them by their southern brethern. Why, sir, let me say to you that there are but fourteen cities in the South which can be affected in the slightest degree by the execution of these election laws. A half dozen of those cities all together would not contain as great a population as the democratic city of New York or the great city of Philadelphia in Pennsylvania. They cannot be under any condition of circumstances affected in anything like the degree that these laws tend to injure and affect the democratic citizens of the northern half of this great nation. It is not in obedience to the demands of the South, because, no matter though this machinery has been enforced there to the extent that it could be lawfully used under the provisions of the act of Congress, the South is to-day, and has been, and will continue to be, democratic in spite of all their election machinery to the contrary. They are of most importance in the Northern States where the parties are nearly balanced, where a few thousand democrats deprived of the elective franchise determine the results in great States.

Why, sir, I stand here a Northern man with an ancestry in the Northern States extending back more than one hundred and fifty years, with every investment I possess on this earth in the North, with no sort of relations south of Mason and Dixon's line, separate or distinct from or other than the relations which one good citizen of this great nation is bound to bear toward another. And yet I am here to ask the repeal of these laws because they operate harshly and unjustly in the Commonwealth from which I came. I know they have been used in a partial manner so as to deprive one class of citizens of their right to vote. And that was the purpose and intent of these laws when they were put upon the statute-book. And we from the North, democrats as we are, yielding to no living man in our devotion to the North and in our devotion to the whole Union, demand the repeal of these most odious and most unjust measures.

Again, Mr. Chairman, it has been said here that this proceeding is entirely revolutionary. I am reminded of the fact that for eighteen long years our republican friends had absolute and uninterrupted control of both Houses of the National Legislature. During that long period of time they have filled our statute-books full of laws that were passed as parts of appropriation bills. If this mode of legislation be a vicious system, it is a wonder that in that long period of power some republicans did not stand up on this floor and condemn it. It is passing strange that our republican friends did not discontinue the practice that they now condemn with one voice as an odious system of legislation. But, as I have already said, they heaped upon their appropriation bills law after law, passed them with their appropriation bills, and they are to-day upon the statute-books; and many of them make most radical changes in the existing laws of the country. It ill becomes a party with such a record to stand up before the people of this country and denounce a practice which they continued for a length of time that in a court of justice would raise the presumption of a custom. Nevertheless, our friends have made themselves hoarse in declamation upon this subject, and they thought that they had absolutely frightened the country from its propriety. The nation was to fall to pieces; the Union was to suffer dissolution; and the Capitol was about crumbling and falling at our very feet; and the country was thoroughly frightened and terribly disturbed.

Right in the midst of all this clamor and noise, Mr. Chairman, we find the capitalists of the country coming down from that great democratic city, New York, to the very capital of the nation and investing in a single day one hundred and eighty-five millions of their surplus money in the loan of the Government that was about being destroyed; investing, sir, at a rate of interest not to exceed 4 per cent. What a commentary upon this fearful revolution that we were getting up here! It not only shows that the people take no stock in senseless talk upon questions of this kind, but it shows another fact: that because of the wicked and ruinous system of laws which have been adopted by the party in power in this Government, the industries and the business of the country have been prostrated and destroyed, so that capital is more profitably invested at 4 per cent. interest than in any legitimate enterprise in this country. Still our friends on the other side, by appealing to the worst passions of human nature, by tearing open the wounds that we had agreed to heal and never again break open, have sought to continue this state of things, and are still disturbing the peace of this great country at the time when they were predicting and all were hoping that we were about to return to an era of prosperity.

Mr. Chairman, what is this revolution of which we have heard so much in this House within the last ten days? It is simply the repeal of a statute without which this Government lived seventy-five years and prospered, and it will live seventy-five more years better without it than it ever will with it. The repeal of a statute which has no effect upon any power in this Government, which touches no one of the great functions of the Federal Government, which is in no wise essential to the existence of any single one of them, and yet over the repeal of such a statute our friends raise the cry of revolution, and seek to excite and alarm the country. We want this law repealed, sir, not as a revolutionary measure, but because we think our republican friends entirely too honest to have the absolute control of the ballot-box. There is occasionally a democrat in this country that on some great political occasion would like to poll his vote and have it counted among the returns, and who has a patriotic desire to take his fair share of responsibility in the management of the elections of this country. And right here you have the reason why democrats stand up and demand that your partisan laws shall be repealed. It is not a question of constitutionality that we care to discuss in connection with this matter. It is the fairness of the laws which you have enacted for the purpose of controlling the ballot-box. But rather than acquiesce in such repeal I find that the republican Representatives on the floor of this House will steadily vote against supplies to keep in existence the executive, legislative, and judicial branches of this Government. They will turn upon us and tell us that we want to starve the Government to death; and yet the only reason why they refuse to vote with us supplies to maintain these several departments is because we demand the repeal of certain laws that we regard most conscientiously and from observation and experience know to be unjust and partial in their operation.

Our friends have an absolute right to vote as they please upon these measures; but when they do so, if the question goes to the country, let them go home and like fair men tell their constituents that the reason they helped to defeat these measures was because they insisted upon keeping on the statute-books these laws relating to the appointment of deputy marshals. Let them explain these laws to their constituents, and ask them if they approve them.

Mr. HUMPHREY. May I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania one question?

Mr. RYON, of Pennsylvania. Yes, sir; a very short one.

Mr. HUMPHREY. The gentleman has been speaking of Philadelphia. Is it not a fact (I have so understood) that the democrats asked for supervisors in the districts where they were appointed?

Mr. RYON, of Pennsylvania. I do not know how that may be. It is very possible that in order to counteract fraud in one direction they availed themselves of the provisions of the law relating to supervisors; and you will find if you read this bill that the supervisors are not disturbed.

Mr. HUMPHREY. If the supervisors are not disturbed by this bill, we have been (as has been frequently stated) putting chips on our shoulders and knocking them off ad libitum.

Mr. RYON, of Pennsylvania. The provision for the supervisors is left in the law; in that respect the statute is not repealed. Some of the powers of these officers are circumscribed, but they are not done away with.

Again, we are told that the President is going to veto this measure; that he is not in sympathy with the proposition to repeal these laws. If the inquiry is a fair one, I would like to ask, whom has the President ever authorized to make that declaration upon the floor of this House? To whom has he said that this is an effort to coerce him to sign bills which are distasteful to him? I infer that he never said it to anybody. I have a better opinion of his sense of propriety, I have a better opinion of his judgment than to suppose that he would intimate to his nearest and best friend what his possible action would be upon any measure that might be pending before the people's representatives.

Mr. HUMPHREY. May I state to the gentleman that I do not believe the President has ever intimated what he will do in regard to either of these bills?

Mr. RYON, of Pennsylvania. I had supposed from the way our republican friends—not here, but elsewhere all over the country—had spoken of the President that he was making an honest effort to be the President of the people, not of a party. The rottenness of a former administration had created a stench even in republican nostrils; and when the representatives of that party met in convention to nominate a candidate for President, they had to ignore the third-term man and take up a new man, putting him upon a reform platform. When inaugurated, the present incumbent of the presidential chair thought that reform was to be carried out in good faith, as the people expected. The chiefs of the party took a very different view of the subject. They thought that reform consisted in this: that where a man had been kicked out of office for larceny of the public funds he should be elevated to another and a better position that he might have time and opportunity for reform! This diversity of opinion being a material matter, affecting the harmony of this great political party, led to differences that were not easily reconciled. It in fact resulted in a split in that great political organization, and the split was so exactly upon the center as to expose the rottenness upon both sides.

On the 15th of May, 1878, the republican chiefs met in convention in the State of Pennsylvania to place in nomination a candidate for governor. Some came with their war-paint and scalping-knives; others came with the pipe of peace. For a small consideration, consisting chiefly of the promise of a few loaves and fishes, they effected a compromise by agreeing to say nothing about the Chief Magistrate; but to make their rebuke all the more pointed and effective they complimented the administration of Governor Hartranft. No one reading their platform of principles would learn from it that there was such a man on earth as the President of the United States.

In view of facts like these it becomes a matter of public interest to know when this great love-feast was celebrated between the factions, so that you see here in this House so much concern for the presidential happiness. Or is all this for public effect, to keep away from the reading public, the constituencies that sent us here, the true issue involved in this controversy? Is it true in point of fact that there has been no reconciliation between the President and this hostile faction in the republican organization, and that all we have witnessed here in the last ten days in the way of concern for the President and his happiness is no more nor less than a "skim-milk masquerade" on the part of our friends in this House?

Mr. OSMER. Will my colleague allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. RYON, of Pennsylvania. Proceed, sir.

Mr. OSMER. Having the power to pass, independently of these appropriation bills, the repeal of these obnoxious laws, (as you deem them,) what reason can your side of the House give for putting the repeal upon these appropriation bills, never having tried to pass a repealing act separately?

Mr. RYON, of Pennsylvania. My friend from Pennsylvania probably has some knowledge of the facility with which the minority in this House may baffle the best intentions and prevent the passage of the best laws, until by lapse of time this body ought to adjourn. They resolved in caucus, if I am not misinformed, immediately upon the assembling of this Congress, that they would resist the passage of any measure except the appropriation bills. The gentleman now has the reason in part why I for one favor the passage of these repeal measures as a part of the appropriation bills.

I am also reminded—and I may properly say it here—that an effort was made to repeal these laws by separate enactments. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MANNING] some two months ago introduced a bill repealing these laws, and every republican in this House voted "no." It was at a time when the rules had to be suspended, and the republicans voting against it there were not two-thirds in favor of the bill of the gentleman from Mississippi. Having glanced at some objections to the course of proceedings which has been adopted in this case, I will simply add that I can see no reasonable ground of objection to the enactment of laws in a legal, orderly, and constitutional method, such as I believe has been adopted in this case. Having answered the objections so far as I deem it necessary to answer them, I will proceed for a few moments to refer directly and specifically to the nature and character of these laws, and to show the reason, in my judgment, why they ought to be repealed.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Before the gentleman proceeds to that part of his argument, I desire to correct one point. I asked the question of the gentleman if the supervisors were not called for. The gentleman replied that this act did not repeal them. What I meant to say was, were not the marshals called for. I understand that this act does not take away the right of the supervisors to look on at the polls. But I ask if the gentleman's party did not call for deputy marshals in the election at Philadelphia?

Mr. RYON, of Pennsylvania. To what time do you refer?

Mr. HUMPHREY. Last fall.

Mr. RYON, of Pennsylvania. Possibly that might have been. There is not a great deal of objection to the supervisors, because one is to be a republican and the other to be a democrat.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I mean the deputy marshals; were they not called for?

Mr. RYON, of Pennsylvania. That I do not know.

The laws proposed to be repealed by this bill were enacted in 1870, 1871, and 1872. The sections proposed to be repealed are those which authorize the appointment of an unlimited number of deputy marshals, and confer upon them most unusual and extraordinary powers to be exercised at the elections. So much of the laws as relate to the duties of supervisors, and in any respect tend to aid in the promotion of a fair election and an honest count and fair return of the votes, remain in full force on the statute-book. So ne of the sections proposed to be repealed or modified are general, applicable alike to all sections of the country, while others, and by far the most stringent and oppressive of these laws, are applicable exclusively to the great cities and towns of this country having upward of twenty thousand inhabitants. The deputy marshals are empowered by section 2022 of the act referred to to keep the peace, to prevent fraudulent registration, fraudulent voting, or fraudulent conduct on the part of any election officer, and immediately, either at the place of registration or polling place, or elsewhere, and either before or after registering or voting, to arrest and take into custody, with or without process, any person who commits, or attempts or offers to commit, any of the acts or offenses prohibited therein; and in the absence of the marshal's deputies the supervisors may exercise the powers conferred upon the deputy marshals.

The power to arrest conferred upon these deputies under the circumstances indicated in this section is in the last degree arbitrary and despotic, and if the constitutional authority to confer such a power upon these officers was free from doubt or difficulty nothing short of an overpowering public exigency could justify its exercise. The deputy marshals may either before or after registering, either before or after voting, arrest and take into custody, with or without warrant, any person who commits or attempts to commit, or offers to commit, any of the acts or offenses prohibited. Who can deny that the power here given to the deputy marshals may be so used as to deprive the elector of his right to vote? Who can deny that the elector thus arrested would be deprived of his vote under a law which requires the marshal to carry his prisoner before a commissioner, judge, or court of the United States for examination? An attempt or offer to vote brings the citizen within the scope of this act, and the marshal may arrest without information or warrant, and upon his own motion, any qualified elector in this country. The ballot-box is the legal and orderly mode of declaring the public will in this Government. It is the recognized legal way of shaping the policy and working out the destiny of this great country. It is the power to which all parties must yield obedience, willing or unwilling. A free government recognizing the people as the source of all power can only be maintained a free government by securing to the qualified elector the free exercise of the elective franchise.

The elective franchise is not free, nor is it secure in the hands of the voter who is liable to be arrested at his polling place before he has voted by an officer with or without process. The instrumentalities and appliances conferred upon these deputies over the ballot practically constitute them the controlling power in this Government. It is within the reach of possibilities in this country, where political parties are so equally balanced, for these officers to make the ballot-box record a result hostile to the will of the actual majority of qualified voters. Such a power lodged in the hands of a single individual would endanger the liberties of any country, and it becomes a formidable, fearful engine in the hands of irresponsible, corrupt, and bad men for the absolute destruction and subversion of free constitutional government. It is not the part of wisdom to confer the power to destroy the Government upon any person, however good and just he may be. Safety admonishes us to take away the temptation to do wrong by withholding the power to do it.

Who are these deputy marshals, endowed with such extraordinary capabilities over the liberty of the citizen and the citizen's elective franchise? Are they high public functionaries acting under solemn and responsible obligations to the people or the people's Government, renowned for their high moral and intellectual standing, so that the people may repose confidence in them? To this inquiry but one candid, truthful answer can be given. They are responsible to no one on earth. Their official life dies with the closing of the election polls. They are political partisans; the curbstone orators in the advance-guard of republicanism. They draw their inspiration from the slums and grog-shops in our cities, and their patriotism is inspired by the $5 a day, paid with the people's money, drawn from all parties, to work for the success of the republican party at the polls. With such valuable instrumentalities in their hands, paid for partisan political services at the polls with the money of the whole people, is it a matter of surprise that our republican friends in this House have resolved to stand firm in support of these odious, tyrannical, and un-American laws, enacted for partisan ends, not to protect but to pollute and pervert the ballot-box and make democratic districts return republican Congressmen. I have said that these deputy marshals were not responsible to anybody on earth, and to sustain this charge I refer to section 5522 of the crimes act. They may seize and take from the performance of his duties any or all the election officers on the day of election, and leave the electors without the means of holding a legal election. They may deliberately shoot and kill any legal elector in the act of discharging the highest right of citizenship; and they are exempt from the service of any process from any State or United States court until a sufficient time has elapsed to put at least five hundred miles of distance between them and the court having jurisdiction of their crime. Deputy marshals may arrest with or without process. It will be noticed that the crimes for which they may arrest rank in no case in the act of Congress higher than misdemeanors. At common law an arrest may be made without process for treason, felony, and breach of the peace, under certain circumstances, which I will refer to in this connection.

A thousand years of judicial observation and experience in the country from which we derive our common-law doctrines have established the proposition that the right to arrest without process in the cases referred to is consistent with personal liberty on the one hand and the maintenance of constitutional government on the other; but this is the limit of safety. One suspected of a recent felony may be arrested by an officer or a private person without process; and if in point of fact he be a felon, the arrest may be justified; but if he should be innocent of the crime charged, the party arresting him would be liable to damages in an action for false imprisonment. To justify an arrest without process for a breach of the peace the offense must be committed in the presence of the party making the arrest. The Federal statute authorizes the deputy marshal to arrest without warrant officers appointed and acting under the authority of the State laws, also persons claiming rights under the election laws of the States, for divers acts of omission and commission, none of which, however, with one or two exceptions, amount to a breach of the peace. The purpose of these restrictions at common law upon the right to arrest is manifest. It is to maintain the personal liberty of the citizen, without which free government cannot exist. The unrestrained right to arrest at any time is full of danger; but the right to arrest given to the deputy marshals at a time when the citizen is in the act of exercising the sacred rights of an elector is a fatal blow at the life of our free government.

In addition to the exercise of the authority which has been referred to, these deputy marshals are authorized to keep the peace and preserve order at the place of registration and at the polls. Peace and order are most desirable attainments at any place and in any government, but they cannot be obtained by a resort to unlawful methods. Where does Congress get authority to go into a State with Federal officers to keep the peace and preserve order at the places of registration and at the polls? Where does Congress get authority to send Federal deputy marshals into States to supervise elections held under and by authority of State laws; to make arrests, with or without warrant, of election officers and electors for doing or attempting any act or thing in violation of a State law, or omitting to do anything required by the law of a State? It will be admitted that the registration of voters in the States where registration is required is done by State officers acting exclusively under State authority; that elections in all of the States are held and conducted by State officers appointed or elected under State laws, and that all the duties in respect to elections are imposed by the laws of the several States upon these officers; that if these State election laws were repealed there would be no officers and no authority by which elections in any of the States of this Union could be held. It is manifest, therefore, that the laws proposed to be repealed expend their force upon State laws and State regulations. In making a registry of the voters in an election district the officer is required to determine who are entitled to be put on the list. He is required to make a list of the qualified electors in his district. Where does he go for the law to inform him what the qualifications of an elector are? To the Federal statutes? By no means; he looks to the laws of his State; he finds there that the qualifications of a voter are minutely and carefully defined. In determining the right therefore he judges the law and the fact and acts in a sort of judicial capacity. So it is in respect to the officers authorized to hold an election; they judge of the qualifications of a voter by those rules which the laws of the State afford them, and as judges of the law and the facts determine in a sort of judicial way who are entitled to vote at any election. In deciding the right of a citizen to vote, questions difficult to decide not infrequently arise. The election officers, in the most perfect good faith, differ with the deputy marshal or Federal official as to their duty to receive or reject the vote of such citizen, and the Federal officer has at once a case of fraudulent conduct in the officers of the election and he proceeds immediately, with or without warrant, to arrest and take them before a commissioner, Federal judge, or court, to be tried. In Pennsylvania the willful violation of any duty imposed upon a registration officer or any election officer is made a criminal offense and punished by the infliction of severe penalties. The willful omission of any duty imposed upon registration or election officers is also made a criminal offense, visited by severe penalties. I have no doubt the same may be said of nearly all, if not of all, the States in the Union. The individual who fraudulently registers, fraudulently votes, or obstructs or interferes with the elections or any voter at an election, is severely punished by the laws of Pennsylvania. Just at this point the Federal election laws, which it is proposed to repeal by the bill now before the House, come in and denounce as crimes the very same acts and omissions which by the laws of Pennsylvania are made crimes, and subject the same persons to trial and punishment in the Federal courts. How can there be a concurrent jurisdiction over the same citizen for the same act? How can the same citizen for the same act be subject to double punishment, once in a State court and again in the Federal court? If these Federal election laws are constitutional they must be exclusive and the States must retire from the contest and give up any attempt to enforce their own election laws, otherwise we encounter the fifth article of the amendments to the Constitution, which provides that no "person shall be subject for the same offense to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb." But I have already shown, in connection with this subject, that we have no general election laws, except State laws, and without them we have no machinery for the holding of an election. There is another view in respect to which these laws ought to be repealed. They act upon persons holding office under the laws of the States and performing the duties imposed upon them solely and exclusively by State laws. Can Federal laws impose duties upon a State officer which he will be bound to perform, and for the non-performance of which he may be proceeded against criminally?

In Prigg vs. The Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, 16 Peters, 540, the Supreme Court of the United States held that Congress could not impose duties upon a State officer that he would be bound to perform; that he might perform them if he chose to do so, but that the Legislature might prohibit him from performing such duties at any time. If this be a correct view of the subject it would seem to follow as inevitable that if Congress has no right to impose duties upon officers of a State, by a much stronger reason Congress would have no shadow of right to inflict punishment upon officers of a State for their violation of the laws of the State by which their official duties are prescribed.

As bearing upon the same general subject, Minor vs. Happersett, 21 Wallace, page 170, decides the following proposition:

The Constitution does not define the privileges and immunities of citizens. For that definition we must look elsewhere. In this case we need not determine what they are, but only whether suffrage is necessarily one of them. It certainly is nowhere made so in express terms. The United States has no voters in the States of its own creation. The elective officers of the United States are all elected, directly or indirectly, by State voters. The members of the House of Representatives are to be chosen by the people of the States, and the electors in each State must have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature.

Senators are to be chosen by the Legislatures of the States, and necessarily the members of the Legislature required to make the choice are elected by the voters of the State. Each State must appoint, in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, the electors to elect the President and Vice-President. The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives are to be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof, but Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the place of choosing Senators. It is not necessary to inquire whether this power of supervision thus given to Congress is sufficient to authorize any interference with State laws prescribing the qualifications of voters, for no such interference has ever been attempted. The power of the State in this particular is certainly supreme until Congress acts.

When the Federal Constitution was adopted all the States, with the exception of Rhode Island and Connecticut, had constitutions of their own. These two continued to act under their charters from the Crown. Upon an examination of those constitutions we find that in no State were all citizens permitted to vote. Each State determined for itself who should have that power.

McCrary, Law of Elections, says:

Subject to the limitation contained in the fifteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, the power to fix the qualifications of voters is vested in the States. Each State fixes for itself those qualifications, and the United States adopts the State law upon the subject as the rule in Federal elections, as will be seen by reference to section 2 of article 1 of the Constitution, which provides as follows:

"The House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States, and the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature."

The qualifications of voters for presidential electors are also to be fixed by the States, as will be seen by reference to section 1 of article 2 of the Constitution. Inasmuch as Representatives in Congress and presidential electors are the only Federal officers to be chosen by popular ballot, it is manifest that all controversy concerning the right of individuals to vote, whether at a State or Federal election, must be determined by reference to the local or State law upon this subject.

The right of suffrage is not a natural right, but a legal right, derived in this country from constitutions and statutes. It is regulated by the States, and their power to fix the qualifications of voters is limited only by the provisions of the fifteenth amendment to the Constitution, which simply forbids any distinction on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

The recent amendments to the Constitution confer upon Congress only the power to protect the newly enfranchised citizens, and confer no power on Congress to legislate generally for the regulation and enforcement of the right of suffrage in the States. This view of the question is supported by an elaborate opinion delivered by Justice Bradley in The United States vs. Cruikshank, 13 Am. L. Reg., N. S., 630. This case is the last authoritative utterance upon the subject, and will be accepted as the correct interpretation until the Supreme Court of the United States changes it.

These authorities recognize very clearly and distinctly the doctrine that there are States, and that the Union is made up of States; that one peculiarity of the Federal Union is the clear and well-defined recognition of a double sovereignty; that within constitutional limits the Federal power is supreme and paramount, and that it lies in the powers expressly granted and necessarily implied; that in all other respects, except where power was surrendered to the Federal Government to be used for the benefit of all, the States have supreme authority. The United States declares who may be citizens, but cannot declare who shall exercise the elective franchise. Every voter ought to be, and probably is required to be a citizen, but every citizen is not a voter. There is not a State probably in the Union where a citizen merely, without other qualifications, would be allowed to exercise the elective franchise. The power in the State to determine who shall vote at the elections is vital. Upon it the existence of the State may depend. This deputy-marshal law confuses and confounds all these distinctions between State and Federal powers, and attempts to control the qualifications of electors by making a United States official the sole and final judge of the right of any citizen to vote at an election, and to enforce that control by a right to arrest before the voter has exercised his right to vote. This brings us to a consideration of the practical working of these laws.

Sixty-nine cities in the United States contain upward of twenty thousand inhabitants; fifty-five in Northern States, fourteen in Southern States.

In answer to a call for information by the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice, the Comptroller of the Treasury reported that in the fall of 1878 there had been expended in about four Northern States for supervisors and deputy marshals over two hundred and two thousand dollars, and several accounts were not adjusted yet.

Philadelphia, with republican judges in all the courts, with the principal city departments in the possession of the republican party, with thousands of dependents and expectants ready to do the work of the party; republican mayor; 1,200 republican policemen; registration of voters chiefly in republican hands; 686 voting districts in the city; more than two-thirds of all these districts controlled by republican officers; the day before the election last fall the marshal of the eastern district of Pennsylvania appointed 773 deputy marshals for Philadelphia at a cost to the Government of $7,600, and the supervisors cost $27,440. Every man appointed deputy marshal was an active republican, and they were all active in influencing votes for the republican candidates.

Now I ask is it just, is it fair, that the money of the whole people should be taken from the Treasury and used as a campaign fund to put in office the candidates of one party?

That deputy marshal-law never was intended to be fair nor its administration for the good of the country. If it had been intended for good or wise purposes the appointment of these officers would not have been given to political partisans. I am ready to vote for any fair law that will secure honest and fair elections; but I will never vote for election laws to be executed by the politicians of either one of these great political parties. Look at the political level of the great moral and intellectual city of Philadelphia where when Marshal Kerns sounded his bugle-blast for the ingathering of his chosen deputies first came the drunken bloat from his cellar groggery; next came the republican bulldozer and criminal; next came the bummer and repeater armed with a black-jack; next came the man of grip and gather, to gather in republican voters and grip and push from the polls democrats; next came the ballot-box stuffer with his pockets full of republican ballots; next came the man to keep the peace, and he kept his peace while repeaters voted; next from the den of infamy and shame comes the proprietor of the house of prostitution, and with him from their hiding places come the repeater and thief. For the correctness of my description of these officers I refer to pages 31, 38, 39, 56, 112, 113, 145, 146, 155, 156, 163, and 164 of the evidence taken before the Senate committee. Armed with the badge of Federal authority, these veterans in their respective vocations went forth to do and to die in the cause of honest elections. Such are the practical workings of these laws. The men who put the machinery of these laws in motion are selected for their known political service for their party. They have never arrested a republican for fraud upon the ballot-box; nor have they ever performed an impartial duty at the polls. The laws protect and legalize fraud upon the ballot-box. No fair man can justify the abuse of power by these deputy marshals, and no fair man will ask the continuance of such a power over the elections in this country.

Mr. ATHERTON. Mr. Chairman, since the beginning of this debate, each political party has hurled at the other the accusation of an entire responsibility for the extra session of Congress. The country wants repose. Who is responsible? The democrats at the last session could have procured the passage of the necessary appropriation bills, if they had waived their demand for fair and impartial trial by jury, free and untrammeled elections, and the subordination of the military to civil authority. On the other hand it is equally certain that the republicans could have secured them by abandoning their demand for the continuance of certain measures "born of the passions of the war" that were obnoxious to our institutions and that were generally admitted to be no longer necessary; that is to say, the iron-clad test oath, the jury law, the supervisors and marshals law, and the use of the Army at the polls. One party controlled the House, the other the Senate. One of them would not vote for appropriations with nor the other without these measures. Hence the dead-lock and the extra session; and each party must bear its just share of the responsibility for the result.

The people, however, know that this unfortunate disagreement, producing the extraordinary convening of Congress, is the result of a demand upon one side for principles in legislation as old as Magna Charta and as sacred as that for which martyr ever suffered or patriot died—for local self-government, impartial juries, free and fair elections; and on the other for prejudice, partiality, and ignorance in the jury-box, Federal interference in elections, both by officers unknown to the laws of the State and by the presence of armed men at the polls.

Our party demands admitted needed reforms, the other the continuance of existing abuses. The country is to be congratulated, however, as well as commiserated, and for a reason not contemplated by either party at the last session. Being convened in extra session an opportunity is afforded for legislation in the interest of the people. With both branches of Congress democratic, not only in name, but I hope in fact, its majority is ready to look out upon the wants of the people and legislate for their best interests. Among other things, restoring silver to its former place in the currency, favoring all just measures of financial reform, stimulating enterprise, and, so far as Government may, furnishing to labor a just reward.

Without entering upon general legislation at this time I think the end indicated may be accomplished without the exhaustion of any or but little additional time, and the country at large may have a reason, different from what its authors intended, to rejoice over the stubborn refusal of the republicans in Congress "to grant a redress of grievances," at the last session. So with these surroundings we of the present Congress are brought into the arena of action and duty, and it becomes us to diligently look over the field, take our bearings, weigh the argument, and, with the eyes of the nation upon us and under the responsibility of our official oaths, decide the questions at issue with an eye single to the best and paramount interests of the country. I do not flatter myself that in the discussion I can present any new facts for consideration. The whole field has been traversed, and the greater and the less important matters and considerations have all been brought forth and paraded with wonderful research and matchless power and eloquence. As we approach the close of this forensic struggle about all that is left is to resume, to sum up before the matter is submitted to the arbitrament of a final vote.

To one question of importance involved in the debate I have given some attention—the question of securing to the accused in every criminal accusation a fair trial by an impartial jury. I first call attention to the statutes relating to the qualification and challenge of jurors in the Federal courts. Section 821 of the Revised Statutes reads:

SEC. 821. At every term of any court of the United States the district attorney or other person acting on behalf of the United States in said court may move, and the court in their discretion may require, the clerk to tender to every person summoned to serve as a grand or petit juror or venireman or talesman in said court the following oath or affirmation, namely: "You do solemnly swear (or affirm) that you will support the Constitution of the United States of America; that you have not without duress and constraint taken up arms or joined any insurrection or rebellion against the United States; that you have not adhered to any insurrection or rebellion, giving it aid and comfort; that you have not directly or indirectly given any assistance in money or any other thing to any person or persons whom you knew or had good ground to believe to have joined or to be about to join said insurrection or rebellion or to have resisted or to be about to resist with force of arms the execution of the laws of the United States; and that you have not counseled or advised any person to join any insurrection or rebellion against or to resist with force of arms the laws of the United States." Any person declining to take said oath shall be discharged by the court from serving on the grand or petit jury or venire to which he may have been summoned.

It will be seen that this and the preceding section provide for the exclusion from the jury-box of every person that has either taken up arms in any insurrection or rebellion against the United States or adhered or given any assistance in money or other thing to any person known to have joined, or there was reason to believe had joined or was about to join, any insurrection, or was about to resist the execution of the laws of the United States. It excluded not only the brave and impulsive youth that followed to the front the flag of his State, but even the father that in paternal affection, perhaps regretting his act, assisted the son to money or clothing, knowing his purpose.

And now, in the progression of political events, what do we see? The test oath modified so that confederates may enter Congress, sit in the Cabinet, (as Judge Key does to-day, Postmaster-General of the United States,) preside in the courts as judges, taking the modified oath, but commending to the lips of jurymen an oath they could not take themselves and driving men from the jury-box for the want of a qualification they, the judges, do not themselves possess.

During the discussion at the last session of Congress numerous instances were cited of judges, district attorneys, clerks, and marshals of the Federal courts who were secessionists, and among them were Hon. R. W. Hughes, on the bench in Virginia; Judge Dick, of the western district of North Carolina; Judge George S. Bryan, of South Carolina; Judge Settle, on the Federal bench in Florida; Judge Hammond, of Tennessee; and Judge Baxter, who now presides in the United States courts of my own State. I cannot stop to give the names or number of district attorneys in like condition, but quite a list has been named.

Now, how absurd is the proposition, that while men are deemed fit to sit in the Cabinet, as the constitutional advisers of the President, participate in the proceedings of Congress, and preside in the courts, that is, to fill the highest positions as law-makers, law expounders, and as law enforcers without taking the iron-clad oath, that a juror must be driven from the panel because he cannot take it. And how absurd and ridiculous it is to see a district attorney, who cannot take the oath, challenge a juror because he cannot take it; and the Federal judge who must himself refuse it exclude the juryman because he, the humblest actor in the court, must also refuse to take it.

It should be repealed, in the first place, to wipe out an incongruity in the law and to produce uniformity. It should be modified or repealed, in the second place, because its existence is a premium on ignorance and prejudice.

It is a matter of difficulty in the Southern States to procure jurymen who can take the iron-clad oath. And in this connection the vicious mode of selecting jurymen in the Federal courts might as well be mentioned. They are, under an existing custom having something of the sanction of law, selected arbitrarily by the clerk and marshal of the United States court. These officers are almost universally republicans. In the reconstructed States they are perhaps universally so, and generally intensely partisan. The judge is a republican; the clerk and marshal are republicans. The two latter look over the district and select men to act as jurymen. They are republicans and are generally ignorant and prejudiced colored men.

Now a large proportion, at least a very large number, of the alleged offenses for which men are now being arrested and tried in the Southern States are those growing out of alleged violation of such laws as section 5506 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, reading as follows:

Every person who, by any unlawful means, hinders, delays, prevents, or obstructs, or combines and confederates with others to hinder, delay, prevent, or obstruct, any citizen from doing any act required to be done to qualify him to vote, or from voting at any election in any State, Territory, district, county, city, parish, township, school district, municipality, or other territorial subdivision, shall be fined not less than $500, or be imprisoned not less than one month nor more than one year, or be punished by both such fine and imprisonment.

The acts or facts constituting an offense under this statute are illy defined. Confederation to hinder or delay a person from doing any act to qualify him to vote or from voting might in the eye of a jealous or prejudiced mind be inferred from many acts most innocent in their nature.

It is alleged that the republican party in the South are urging prosecutions under these statutes on an extensive scale, for the purpose of "intimidating" white men and preventing them from taking any part in the conduct of elections, and thereby regaining their lost power in that section. Without inquiring as to the truth of the charge, we do know that the southern papers come to us teeming with accounts of the wholesale indictments and arrests for alleged violation of the election laws. These people are dragged from their homes and taken hundreds of miles, incarcerated and tried—and before what kind of a court and jury? How is the jury transformed into a patent machine warranted to convict? As I said, the judge is a republican and known to be. The district attorney is of like politics and a fierce partisan. The clerk and marshal have been given their places for services rendered their party. The jury, their creatures and partisans, selected as such, come to decide the guilt or innocence of the accused, who are generally known to belong to the opposite party. If a man perchance gets on the panel who may be intelligent or impartial, the district attorney requires the clerk to tender him the iron-clad oath, and if he refuses to take it the judge excludes him. On the trial intelligence and impartiality are driven from the jury-box. The smallest circumstances are magnified into pretended proofs of guilt, and with all the power and influence of the court and its officers on one side, and with an ignorant jury inflamed by partisan prejudice against the accused, the trial has but one result, and that is, with proof or without, to speedily register a verdict of guilty against the defendant, to be followed by the vindictive judgment of a partisan court.

Such a trial is a mockery of justice and a flagrant breach of constitutional right. The original Constitution in general terms secured to the citizen the right of trial by jury, but the people, jealous of their rights in that regard, demanded more explicit guarantees. The First Congress after its adoption also proposed article 6 of the amendments to the Constitution, and the States subsequently adopted it. It secured to the accused a speedy public trial by an impartial jury of the State or district where the crime was alleged to have been committed. Impartial is the essential word added by the constitutional amendment. The machinery heretofore adopted to select juries in the Federal courts is not designed or intended to secure a constitutional jury. Instead of selecting the peers of the accused, they select those far below him in the social, moral, and intellectual qualities. Instead of selecting the fair-minded and impartial, the system secures the unfriendly and the prejudiced. It is the hollow form of a constitutional jury—the sounding brass and tinkling cymbal—not the fairly selected, fair-minded, intelligent body that should decide all questions touching the life, liberty, or property of the citizen. Instead of convicting the guilty and vindicating the innocent, the system registers the guilt of all. "It holds the word of promise to the ear, but breaks it to the hope."

I am much afraid that a southern jury in a Federal court would never have inspired in Blackstone the matchless tribute to trial by jury found in his Commentaries. In book 3, page 379, he indicates incidentally the remedy for such a jury system as disgraces the Federal courts of the South. In speaking of the superiority of a jury over a single magistrate to determine questions of fact, he says:

> Here, therefore, a competent number of sensible and upright jurymen, chosen by lot among those of the middle rank, will be found the best investigators of truth, and the surest guardians of public justice.

They are not to be selected by partisans, but chosen by lot. Not from a peculiar class, but generally from the body of the citizens. Now, how do we propose to purify the jury-box by the legislation attached to this bill?

First. By a modification of the oath to be administered, allowing a juryman to qualify by the same oath by which the presiding judge qualifies himself for official station.

Second. By compelling a selection of names from which jurors are to be drawn from a large list furnished by the clerk, and a commissioner appointed by the court, but of different politics from the clerk.

When this is done we will again see intelligence, dignity, and independence enthroned in the jury-box, and the verdict will again mean guilt or innocence in fact as well as in name; and the grand birthright of freemen granted under the laws of Ethelred and confirmed in the reign of William the Conqueror will be restored to the State and the people. And, "unless the blood which courses our veins has degenerated from the vital fluid which made the Anglo-Saxon race great and free," we will forever maintain steadfast and under all circumstances the great principle of intelligent, impartial, and independent juries. In evil and in good report, in victory or defeat, in weal and in woe, as long as the sun drives his steeds through the sky, as long as the shadows follow the sides of the mountains, as long as grass grows or water flows, we will consistently and persistently insist on the preservation and maintenance of this bulwark of constitutional right, in truth and in fact, in substance as well as in name.

For lack of time I cannot discuss at length the other political provisions of this bill. The evils to be corrected and the grievances to be redressed are well understood. These do not so much touch the southern people as they do us. The machinery cunningly devised and the artillery shotted to the muzzle, to be used against the South as we supposed, has been turned upon the democratic communities of the North. The power of the Federal Government has invaded States and unlawfully interfered with their elections. A horde of supervisors, marshals, and their deputies, receiving large pay from the people's money, under the pretense of guarding the election of members of Congress, have interfered with the election of every candidate on the same ticket. They were strangers to the laws of the State, yet assumed to construe and enforce them—not in due course of law, for they waited ordinarily for neither affidavit nor warrant, but arrested without affidavit and without warrant. In most instances the parties arrested never knew in any legal form the nature of the accusation against them; never saw the witnesses; had no trial, speedy or otherwise; were arrested before voting, huddled together, detained till after the election, and then the purpose and end of the arrest was silently confessed by their discharge without formal complaint or the chance of a vindication by public trial.

On a recent occasion, in the city of New York, Mr. Davenport, on the night before the election, on the affidavit of his own clerk, issued warrants and on the day of election caused four thousand citizens to be arrested and deprived of their votes.

I find the following graphic pen picture of the facts before me, embodied in the RECORD at the last session, and I think not seriously disputed. I commend its perusal to every person who may think the liberty of the citizen to exercise his right of suffrage is not seriously menaced under the practice that has grown up under this law:

> Such a scene as the room of this court presented on that election day has never before been witnessed in this city or in this country, and it is to be hoped never will again. From early morning until after the polls were closed these rooms were packed and jammed with a mass of prisoners and marshals. Not only were they crowded beyond their capacity, but the halls and corridors were thronged with those who were unable to obtain admission; so that the counsel representing the prisoners and the bondsmen who were to be offered to secure their release had the greatest difficulty and were frequently unsuccessful in obtaining entrance. In addition to all this was this delectable iron "pen" on the upper floor, in which men were crowded until it resembled the "black hole of Calcutta," and where they were kept for hours, hungry, thirsty, suffering in every way, until their cases could be reached. With scarcely an exception these men had gone to the polls expecting to be absent but a short time. Many of them were thinly clad. Numbers had sick wives or relatives; some were sick themselves. There were carmen who had left their horses standing in the public streets; men whose situations depended upon their speedy return; men who wished to leave the city on certain trains. Every imaginable vexation, inconvenience, injury, and wrong which the mind can conceive existed in their cases, so that it was painful to the counsel who were endeavoring to secure their release to approach sufficiently near the railing to hear their piteous appeals and witness the distress which they had no power to alleviate. And over all this pushing, struggling, complaining crowd Mr. Commissioner John I. Davenport sat supreme, with a sort of oriental magnificence, calmly indifferent to everything but the single fact that no man who was arrested was allowed to vote. And after all this tremendous exhibition of the power of this great Government, after this exhibition of what a United States commissioner and chief supervisor of elections can do if he has a mind to, what was the result?
> Surely if the offenses which these persons had committed were of so grave a nature as to require these wholesale proceedings; if the morals, the peace, and outraged laws of the community required to be vindicated by the summary arrest of four thousand persons on a single day, it was certainly necessary that the law should be enforced to the end, and that the offenses which were so dangerous as to require this arbitrary action should be punished.
> But nothing of the kind was done. As these men were brought up before the three commissioners who sat in judgment they were asked if they had voted. If they had not they were required to promise that they would not do so. If to escape the terrors of Ludlow-street jail they surrendered their rights as American citizens and made the promise thus exacted, as the great majority of necessity did, they were released upon their own recognizance. If they did not, they were held to bail. If they had voted, although if not properly naturalized such vote was an additional offense instead of a palliation for the crime charged against them, they were immediately released. After sundown, when the polls were closed and it was too late for any one to vote, the doors appear to have been thrown open and all set at liberty.

Of all thus arrested at that time but one was ever tried, and he was acquitted, and acquitted upon a ground that established the innocence of all.

Such laws are a disgrace to the civilization of the age. An election where the voters are allowed to vote only one way is a cheat and a fraud. The other side of this House can declaim loudly against "intimidation" when a southern colored man is the supposed subject, but calmly behold an officer of the Federal Government, surrounded by the badges of authority and hundreds of subalterns and minions ready to do his bidding, arrest and imprison thousands, deprive them of the elective franchise, "intimidate" the entire foreign vote by contesting naturalization papers and arresting all who attempt to vote thereon; and they enter no protest, but will "starve the Government" to save the law. It will be a grand step in the right direction when the republican party can see and respect the rights of a German or Irishman to the same extent they do those of a negro.

Some minor objections are made because these conditions of repeal are attached to appropriation bills.

The Apollo Belvidere of the other side of the House, in opening this discussion on the Army bill, declared that this mode of repeal was revolutionary, and the other athletes of debate on the same side re-echoed the sentiment in chorus.

It has since been shown that in every Congress since the republicans came into power substantial legislation, in the shape of both enacting and repealing statutes, have been constantly attached to appropriation bills. A list of such bills is attached to the speech of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. BARBER,] delivered in this House April 4, 1879, showing that between 1862 and 1875 eighty instances of the kind appeared, and during all that time not a gentleman on the other side of the House shouted "revolution."

The familiar instance has also been adduced of Andrew Johnson being deposed from his position as Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy by a rider on an appropriation bill, and he compelled to humiliate himself and relinquish his high prerogatives to keep a republican Congress from "starving the Government to death." Where were the stalwarts then that now cry "revolution."

It is said, without contradiction I believe, that one of the very statutes now sought to be repealed came into existence as a rider on an appropriation bill. Where, too, were then the distinguished orators who now so declaim against "revolution" and in favor of the free consent of the Executive? When did the change come over the spirit of their dreams? By their silence then and their earnest protests now we have the wonderful doctrine proclaimed that it was lawful—yea, commendable—to bring into existence a great body of statute law by attaching it to appropriation bills; that then the President might be properly and lawfully stripped of his constitutional powers by such means; but if a democratic Congress attempts to repeal a law thus enacted it is "revolution" and "unconstitutional governmental starvation."

As the debate proceeded the republicans have been partly driven from the position first assumed.

On the 19th of this month I find the following reported in the RECORD. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] said:

The whole system of putting such riders on bills is, as I have said, vicious and ought to be abandoned. But it is not revolutionary. And the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] whose speech lies before me, under the title of "Revolution in Congress," has experienced a thorough revolution in opinion since the 8th of June, 1872, if he now believes the practice to be revolutionary.

Mr. GARFIELD. Will the gentleman allow me to correct him? I had supposed that there was nobody in this House who at this late day would say that I had ever asserted that it was revolutionary to put a rider on an appropriation bill. I never said so in my life. It is not in any printed, written, or spoken remarks that I ever made; and I suppose the gentleman from Pennsylvania in his mere iteration of such a charge, which is entirely foundationless, is obliged to take it up second-hand. I disclaimed absolutely such a view over and over again in the speech to which the gentleman refers.

Mr. TOWNSHEND, of Illinois. The gentleman had better take back the speech that he made on the Army bill.

On the 20th day of this month the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BREWER] alluding to the closing hours of the Forty-fifth Congress said:

We on this side of the House did not then claim, nor do we now claim, that Congress had not the constitutional power to ingraft upon the appropriation bills the proposed political legislation, but we only sought to combat, as we do now, the policy of such a course.

The constitutional power to enact general legislation as riders on appropriation bills is admitted by those high in authority in the republican ranks, and has been confirmed by the repeated and constant course of legislation of a republican Congress, and it does not now lie in their mouths to question it. They are estopped by their own acts to allege its impolicy. Besides, every reader of history knows that the "practice of withholding supplies and thereby coercing a redress of grievances" is as old as English liberty. The power to originate bills to appropriate money is left by the Constitution to this House, and we may originate them upon or without condition.

It is said on the other side of the House that the President will veto the appropriation bill with these conditions attached. Whether he will or not we neither know or ought to know, or what we will do in case of a veto we know not. We will not cross the stream till we reach it. But if the representatives of the people, now fresh from their constituencies, in both Houses of Congress, representing the voice, the latest expressed wish, and the majesty of the nation, pass these bills we have no right to suspect they will be vetoed. I think it would be very safe to assert that he will not do it, unless you of the republican side "intimidate," "hinder," "delay," "obstruct," and "confederate and combine together" to prevent and obstruct him "in the free exercise of his right" to give his assent to the bill. If he could use the provisions of the southern election law against you in this regard, few of you would remain long beyond the clutches of that statute.

In conclusion, I have to say that the democratic party in Congress have adopted as a part of their unalterable creed and ultimate demand that the iron-clad test oath shall be modified so that the intelligence of the people may preside in the jury-box; that fair and impartial juries shall hereafter be impaneled, and constitutional rights restored and protected; that elections, the creatures of States and the birthright of a free people, shall be disenthralled from the interference of officers foreign to their customs and laws; and that the sheen of bayonet and menace of arms shall recede from the sacred presence of freemen while exercising their elective franchise, the highest prerogative of American citizenship.

He who would demand less is ignorant of the value of his birthright, and he who would recede from the demand would deserve the execration of a free people.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, if the questions involved in this discussion were those of merely common legislative interest I should prefer to still remain a silent participant in your proceedings. But the issues now forced upon us by these hybrid and misnamed "appropriation bills" forbid that any Representative of an intelligent and patriotic constituency should fail to do his utmost, however imperfectly, to defend the liberties assailed and the great interests brought in peril.

For the harmony and progress of the country I regret this new sectional agitation. Against reviving confidence and prosperity, against the just demands of business and the daily necessities of labor, it is at once a "crime" and a "blunder." The democratic party has forced it upon the country. This extra session of Congress was not made necessary by any disagreement of the Forty-fifth Congress as to any appropriation necessary for the Government. The majority in the House determined to compel both the Senate and the President, under the threat of starving them into submission, to register and indorse the edict of that majority in favor of desperate partisan legislation. These political measures were inserted in the appropriation bills from which the majority refused to separate them. The Senate in the exercise of its own undoubted right of judgment, declined to yield its approval to these demands. The Forty-fifth Congress expired by limitation on the 4th of March, without having passed any appropriations for the Army or for the legislative, judicial, or executive expenses of the Government. The Senate and House now both in the hands of the democracy, a joint caucus of that party has decreed that the President shall abdicate his constitutional duty, and whether his judgment and conscience "approve" these mongrel measures or not he shall sign them or the Government shall stop.

The President has given no indication what will be his course on these measures further than the well-known and inflexible integrity of his purposes. But the whole discussion on the democratic side has been an assault upon the constitutional rights of the minority, the undoubted prerogative of the President, and the just claims of a portion of the people.

A democratic caucus has decreed that three great measures of political and partisan legislation shall be inserted in the appropriation bills now pending or that these necessary bills shall not pass. What are these measures? First, the repeal of the law allowing either the military or civil power to keep the peace at the polls; second, the repeal of the jurors' test oath; third, the repeal of the laws passed to provide proper safeguards in the elections of members of Congress.

The real issue in this contest it is impossible to mistake. The democratic majority claim the absolute right to compel the Executive to "approve" whatever measures they may pass, or to refuse to grant the supplies without which our Government cannot exist. They declare that unless the Army shall be used only as they direct in a certain case, it shall not be used for any purpose, but that it shall perish.

The discussion of the pending bill has been full of strange anomalies. In listening to it for weeks past I sometimes could scarcely believe I heard aright. The party which in the hour of peril abandoned the Constitution, and the men who for years sought even by the horrors of civil war to overthrow it, are here claiming to be its only authorized interpreters and defenders. From the lofty way in which they spurn the opinions and the work of those who saved that great charter of rights, it would seem that they regard themselves as a sort of Constitutional Priesthood, specially raised up and anointed as expounders and guardians of that sacred instrument. But, strange as it may seem, almost the only thing I have not heard denounced by them within the last four weeks as unconstitutional is the attempt to destroy the Constitution itself.

We have heard from the other side bitter denunciation of the men who stood by the Union and of the measures by which they defended and maintained it, but not one word of rebuke or condemnation for the men or the methods by which it was sought to destroy it. It would seem to have a strange quality of being binding only against its friends, but void against its foes. The fatal heresy of State rights, of which the rebellion was the logical outgrowth, is still upheld and defended just as lovingly as though it had not been overthrown in that conflict. But for half a century the democracy has been a revolutionary party. For half a century it has taught its followers to exalt the powers of States, to deny the sovereign nationality, and to despise the oneness of united America. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CHALMERS] in abusive terms declared that for eighteen years our party had made of the Republic not only "a military" but "a drunken despotism," "reeling through the land," and "debauched the Government of our country."

Mr. Chairman, this Union lives to-day because of the loyalty and valor of the republican party, and it can but be proud of its illustrious men and its great achievements; not that it saved it without the aid of thousands of the brave democrats of the North, who in being patriots rose above partisanship. Has that gentleman forgotten that when the republican party received the control of this Government its Treasury was empty, its Navy and its Army scattered, its credit dishonored, and it stood a by-word among the nations. Your last democratic President—God grant he may be the last forever—had proclaimed to this country and to the world that this great nation had no power to preserve its own life. Then it was, I say to the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. CHALMERS,] that "it reeled like a drunken man." Then it was that, to borrow his own words, "it rocked like a ship at sea without chart, compass, or rudder." But the Ruler of nations had appointed its great captain, and it outrode that wild storm. Whether it is yet to be scuttled by pirates is in the great future. Mr. Chairman, the republican party in its long lease of power through these dark and stormy years has doubtless made many mistakes, and it may be has done many wrongs, but its record is the grandest page of American history, and over all and above all no one man, not one of its four million men in all those years ever raised his arm against his country's flag.

Mr. Chairman, through all its disguises, in spite of the pretexts thrown around it, and the eloquent special pleading in its favor, the real objects of these various measures placed upon the appropriation bills is to take away from the Government of the United States the right to protect citizens at elections of national Representatives. No democrat on this floor has proved that any man of his party has been intimidated or prevented from voting as he desired. But the authority and power of the National Government is to be got rid of in the interest of the heresy of "State rights," sometimes mildly called "home rule," and then with no supervisors in New York, and no "civil" or military power at the South to keep the peace at the polls and protect the weak, New York and the South can be made solid for the democracy by free fraud and organized murder. Gentlemen, your pretense of zeal for "free elections," so desperately urged even while you have it your own way at the South, will mislead neither the intelligence nor the patriotism of the people of this country.

You stand committed against allowing the black man of the South freely to exercise his political rights. North and South you have proclaimed that this is a "white man's government." The very names of some of your most powerful organizations in the South—"White Leagues" and "white-liners"—mean all of this and more. Your papers and your platforms declare it, and abundantly attested facts give bloody proof that it is true.

Eleven years ago, Mr. Chairman, as a spectator, I sat on the floor of this House and heard the then leader of the democracy here, in a learned, exhaustive speech, plant his party on the basis of eternal hostility to the political rights of the black man. I read from the Congressional Globe, second session Fortieth Congress. He says:

My theory, my principle, and I believe the principle of the democratic party, is one before which all other issues—tariffs, currency, taxes, armies, navies, all mere questions of the hour—dwindle into comparative insignificance. The only real living issue towers above all these, and that is, Is this, or is it not, a white man's government?

The first great proof of the negro's inferiority, and consequent reason that he should not vote, which he adduced is the style of his hair. I will give you his very words, as he cried out with startling emphasis, and I ask the Clerk to read them.

The Clerk read as follows:

The very hair which crowns his head is not hair, but it is wool, wool and wool only. He who will take the trouble to examine it through the microscope, the micrometer, and microtome will see that its structure is that of wool and not of hair. The hair of a white man is cylindrical. The section under the microscope appears perfectly circular, and is provided with a medullary canal, while the wool of the negro is flattened, so that its section exhibits an elongated ellipsis, in the axis of which no medullary canal is seen.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, of Ohio. How monstrous the idea that any being, a section of whose hair exhibits "an elongated ellipsis," and not only so, but with no medullary canal in it, should ever be permitted by his vote to imperil our institutions! [Laughter.]

But the learned statesman did not stop even here. He declared that the nostrils of the negro were different from those of the Caucasian, which, he says, "form two nearly rectangular triangles, the hypotenuses of which are turned outward." But not to stand on the hair and nostrils alone as full proofs of his incompetency to vote, he relied, as his third great argument, on the fibula, which, he says, "curves outward, so that the knees are more apart than those of the white man." [Great laughter.] The difficulty of this great democratic discovery that the right to vote resides in the shin-bone is, what is to become of the bow-legged Caucasian? [Laughter.]

If there was any doubt now left as to the ruinous results of negro voting this learned democratic leader settled it forever by declaring his "prognathism" is such "as is confined to the lowest races of men, among them the negro." [Laughter.]

He summed up by declaring, "He has not the capacity of any species of popular government; he is not a brother if he is a man, and I will never consent to divide self-government with him," but it "will be resisted in the elective tribunals everywhere;" and adds, "If we degrade this Government into a southern negro Congo government it is as well to take into partnership the ourang, the chimpanzee, and the gorilla." The "fibula" and the "prognathous" carried the democracy in this House at that time, and they took the ground unitedly that the black man should never be permitted to vote. About that time the last of the great amendments to the Constitution was ratified against the bitter opposition of that party, both North and South. After these muniments of the black man's freedom, made necessary by the inexorable logic of the war, had become part of our Constitution, there to remain while the nation lives, the democratic national convention declared them to be "unconstitutional, revolutionary, and void." From that time to this that party has in spirit and in reality stood on the ground that political rights were for white men alone. True, in 1872 the democracy did, by a platform utterance, condone the fibula and the elliptical hair for the "usufruct" of his vote. [Laughter.] That was only in case he voted the democratic ticket. But that race never lacked the intelligence to know their real friends, and so they never voluntarily voted with that party.

In 1872 two leading United States Senators, still members of that body, united in an official report to Congress, in which concerning negro suffrage they declare:

There can be no permanent partition of power nor any peaceable joint exercise of power among such discordant elements. One or the other must have all or none.

And so, Mr. Chairman, from the hour when James Brooks in this Hall set your party on the basis of the denial of manhood or political rights to the black man, that party has sought to trample these rights in the dust. The design in part of these laws you seek now to repeal is to protect him in their exercise. Having given him the rights of a citizen, the Government cannot without infamy allow him to be deprived of them. No truer words were ever uttered on this floor than those of the eloquent gentleman from Texas, [Mr. MILLS,] when, a few weeks ago, he said:

A government is an institution to protect her people, and cannot fail to do it without being guilty of dishonor.

Will you say the black man can freely exercise his right of franchise in the South without this Federal protection? Why, you are pledged that he shall not. Your platforms and your papers are filled with declarations that he shall not. Only a few years ago, after the amendments were ratified, the governor of Maryland in his message to the Legislature said:

This Government was never intended to be shared by the African race. It is a white man's government exclusively.

January 8, 1868, a very large democratic convention met in this city. The president, Judge Dunlap, said:

Shall the people degrade themselves by making slaves the political equals of the men of the North and the South? Never; no, never.

One of the toasts of that convention was, "The Government of the United States, the exclusive creation and property of the white man."

For years the "color line" has been the slogan of the South. Do you expect the people of the country to believe that the men who waged a desperate war with this great Government to make slavery perpetual will now, in spite of your prejudices, your promises, and your platforms, allow these men, born of ages of submission and degradation, to freely exercise against you this new right?

You know it is only a pretense. You know that there are volumes of official proof that the South is solid by systematic outrage and violence. On this floor only two years ago Mr. LAMAR, then a member from Mississippi, in speaking of one of these, said "that no excuse or palliation can possibly be found for these outrages and this barbarism." And the men who spent years in an attempt to rend in twain the Union and the Constitution are now alarmed lest the protection of the citizen shall in some way be a disregard of that same Constitution. But it does not mislead the intelligence or the patriotism of the country. It means that the National Government is to be stripped of sovereignty. It means that the Constitution is to be interpreted as it was by the extremists of the same party in 1832, when South Carolina proclaimed her right to nullify any act of Congress to which she disagreed, and as it was interpreted by the rebellion of 1861, which was supposed to have been overthrown in battle, but which now and here to-day reasserts itself alike in the arrogance of its old domination, in its disregard of human rights, and in its fresh assault upon the national sovereignty, or any interpretation of the Constitution which shall leave its power to preserve its own life.

The people of this country know that the great men who framed our Government meant that it should lack no element for self-preservation. Fine-spun theories of constitutional law do not deceive them. They know that the democratic doctrine, whether expounded by Calhoun or Buchanan, or the State-rights brigadiers of this House, means the degradation or the destruction of the national sovereignty. Just now, as it holds the legislative control, it seeks to exalt that and practically nullify the Executive. Suddenly that party is alarmed to find that a President may have the power to arrest vicious legislation, and in advance a democratic caucus seeks to coerce that officer from the exercise of his sworn duty and his plainest constitutional prerogative by the threat of withholding the means necessary for the great and beneficent functions of the Government. The fact that that party has always advocated and defended the veto power does not seem in the least to influence its present hostility to it. In ignorance or disregard of the fact that the framers of our Constitution, after careful and mature deliberation, placed it in that instrument as one of its necessary checks to legislative encroachment, they declare it to be a dangerous abuse of power. It was not inserted in haste or without definite purpose. In that convention James Madison said:

Experience in all the States has evinced a powerful tendency in the Legislature to absorb all power into its vortex. This was the real source of danger to the American constitutions, and suggested the necessity of giving every defensive authority to the other departments that was consistent with republican principles.

Mr. Morris concurred in thinking the public liberty in greater danger from legislative usurpations than from any other source. * * * When a strong personal interest happens to be opposed to the general interest, the Legislature cannot be too much distrusted. Much has been said of the intrigues that will be practiced by the Executive to get into office. Nothing has been said on the other side of the intrigues to get him out of office. Some leader of a party will always covet his seat, will perplex his administration, will cabal in the Legislature till he succeeds in supplanting him.—Elliot's Debates, volume 5, page 361.

Far-sighted surely, if not prophetic, of the dangers and designs of legislative party usurpation. But not yet can such results be consummated. The warnings of the fathers shall bring heed and guidance, if not safety, to the people.

George Mason, the great Virginia commoner, said:

The defense of the Executive is not the sole object of this revisory power. He expected even greater advantages from it. Notwithstanding the precautions taken in the constitution of the Legislature, it would still so much resemble that of the individual States that it must be expected to pass unjust and pernicious laws. This restraining power was therefore essentially necessary. It would have the effect not only of hindering the final passage of such laws, but would discourage demagogues from attempting to get them passed.—Debates, vol. 5, page 347.

Colonel Mason was one of the wisest men of his day, but he had never seen the Forty-sixth Congress at work on an appropriation bill, or he never would have decided what would discourage demagogues from attempting to get such laws passed.

Some of the members of that convention were in favor of an absolute veto. Mr. Randolph urged the necessity of three-fourths instead of two-thirds of each House to overrule the negative of the President; but in its present form it was placed in the Constitution by a unanimous vote.

In advocating its adoption, Madison urges this as one of its special benefits. He says, in the forty-eighth number of the Federalist:

The legislative department is everywhere extending the sphere of its activity, and drawing all power into its vortex. In a government where numerous and extensive prerogatives are placed in the hands of an hereditary monarch, the executive department is very justly regarded as the source of danger, and watched with all the jealousy which a zeal for liberty ought to inspire. But in a representative republic, where the executive magistracy is carefully limited, both in the extent and the duration of its power; and where the legislative power is exercised by an assembly, which is inspired by a supposed influence over the people, with an intrepid confidence in its own strength; which is sufficiently numerous to feel all the passions which actuate a multitude; yet not so numerous as to be incapable of pursuing the objects of its passions, by means which reason prescribes; it is against the enterprising ambition of this department that the people ought to indulge all their jealousy and exhaust all their precautions.

Thomas Jefferson himself had long before urged the same view. I read from his Notes on Virginia. He says:

All the powers of government, legislative, executive, and judiciary, result to the legislative body. The concentrating these in the same hands is precisely the definition of despotic government. It will be no alleviation that these powers will be exercised by a plurality of hands, and not by a single one. One hundred and seventy-three despots would surely be as oppressive as one.

Since the foundation of the Government this power has been exercised by almost every President, beginning with Washington. It has been used about fifty times, mostly by democratic Presidents. They have indorsed and defended it. You have indorsed it in the fullest measure in your national platforms. To attempt to repudiate or resist it now merely to serve a desperate party purpose is the very audacity of revolutionary treachery. Do you care nothing for the examples of your own illustrious Presidents and the authorized avowals of your own party, both of which you so profess to venerate? The democratic national platform of 1856 contains this declaration:

Ninth. We are decidedly opposed to taking from the President the qualified veto power by which he is enabled, under restrictions and responsibilities amply sufficient to guard the public interest, to suspend the passage of a bill whose merits cannot secure the approval of two-thirds of the Senate and House of Representatives until the judgment of the people can be obtained thereon, and which has saved the American people from the corrupt and tyrannical dominion of the Bank of the United States and from a corrupting system of general internal improvements.

Not only was this declaration repeated in the democratic platforms of 1860, but the same platforms announce that democratic principles are in their very nature unchangeable. Either democratic principles have greatly changed, or we have here only a spurious article of that time-honored institution.

But let it be remembered that the veto against the National Bank, so fully indorsed in the above resolution of the national convention, was exercised by a democratic President against a democratic House, a democratic Senate, and against a measure which had been recommended by a democratic Secretary of the Treasury, and had been declared constitutional by a democratic Supreme Court. And yet while the democracy exalt the name of Jackson for this the most arbitrary use of the veto power ever made since the foundation of our Government, they are here on this floor denouncing it as an "unconstitutional power,"a "questionable prerogative," and declaring that if a republican President shall dare to exercise it against irregular and most dangerous legislation, the Army shall be left without rations, the Agricultural Bureau, the Pension Office, and the courts shall all be closed, the executive functions of the Government shall be stopped, and the light-houses along seventeen thousand miles of coast shall be darkened. For the first time in our history it is threatened that revolution shall be the answer to an executive veto from a party fully under the control of men lately in armed revolt against the Government.

President Polk in his message to Congress, December 5, 1848, says:

It is not alone hasty or inconsiderate legislation that he [the President] is required to check; but if at any time Congress shall, after apparently full deliberation, resolve on measures which he deems subversive of the Constitution or of the vital interests of the country, it is his solemn duty to stand in the breach and resist them. In deciding upon any bill presented to him, he must exercise his own best judgment.

* * * * * * *

Any attempt to coerce the President to yield his sanction to measures which he cannot approve would be a violation of the spirit of the Constitution, palpable and flagrant, and, if successful, would break down the independence of the executive department and make the President, elected by the people and clothed by the Constitution with power to defend their rights, the mere instrument of a majority of Congress. * * * If he surrender this power or fail to exercise it in a case where he cannot approve, it would make his formal approval a mere mockery, and would be itself a violation of the Constitution.

In this line of democratic precedents, on the 17th of February, 1855, President Pierce sent to Congress a message vetoing the French spoliation bill, in which he says:

It is not incumbent on the President to sign a bill as a matter of course, and thus merely to authenticate the action of Congress, for he must exercise intelligent judgment or be faithless to the trust reposed in him. * * * While the Constitution thus confers on the legislative bodies the complete power of legislation in all cases, it proceeds, in the spirit of justice, to provide for the protection of the responsibility of the President. It does not compel him to affix the signature of approval to any bill unless it actually has his approbation, for while it requires him to sign if he approve, it, in my judgment, imposes on him the duty of withholding his signature if he does not approve. In the execution of his official duty in this respect he is not to perform a mere mechanical part, but is to decide and act according to conscientious convictions of the rightfulness or the wrongfulness of the proposed law.

During the last year of the term of the last democratic President a great and beneficent measure of wide public interest, the homestead law, was killed by an executive veto; but that party threatened no revolt, nor even condemned the act, though in that veto message it was offensively declared that the grant of a homestead would "go far to demoralize the people," thousands of whom had petitioned for that beneficent measure of wise and elevating legislation. But the southern masters of the party had condemned it, for it was in the interest of free homes and free labor, as they are now aiming to "wipe out" legislation equally in the interest of the weak and the defenseless.

To justify their assault on a plain constitutional principle our opponents have taken a line of argument anomalous and amusing, if neither logical nor sincere. But what could they do? They could not appeal to the Constitution, for it was hopelessly against them. They could not urge party authority, for their national platforms openly indorse the veto and its use. They could not seek refuge behind their own precedents, for Madison, Monroe, Jackson, Polk, Pierce, and Buchanan had all freely used and most of them stanchly defended this time-honored democratic usage. What should they do, for a change of base was necessary to meet the desperate exigency of the new conspiracy?

In the closing hours of the last Congress a distinguished and versatile Senator [Mr. THURMAN] conceived the vagary of defending new and revolutionary measures of American legislation by English precedents of two hundred years ago. He went so far as to declare:

The question is whether or not that power which the House of Commons has exercised for now centuries gone by can be exercised by the House of Representatives, modified to some extent by the Constitution of the United States.

* * * * * * *

England was saved from despotism and an absolute monarchy by the exercise of the power of the House of Commons to refuse supplies except upon condition that grievances should be redressed.

Since that time Charles I and Edward have been constantly on parade in both branches of Congress, and our debates have become a confused mass of ancient history. British precedents are to govern us. Monarchical methods are to interpret our Constitution. Madison is obsolete. I have listened to this debate for a month without hearing a democrat name Jackson, for the House of Commons is the new Moloch of democratic worship. The pretended followers of Jefferson are now suddenly enamored with the English precedents, policies, and methods which that sturdy republican so honestly hated. Jefferson says he found the English heavy with beef and beer, and worshiping only wealth, rank, and power. The democrats of the Forty-sixth Congress find them altogether lovely, for they were often conspiring against the executive. No wonder some of these leaders think "intelligence and property" should govern. It would seem that, as slavery is dead, that party must have some idol of caste-power to worship.

The distinguished gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] the other day said:

This weapon [the refusal of supplies] has reformed the British monarchy, purged away its despotic principles, secured public liberty and the personal rights of man by the splendid muniments of law and an independent judiciary, and brought the whole government under the influence and control of the will of the people.

Alas! "the will of the people" has no control in England, unless by people you mean only certain classes—classes privileged in some way, either by birth or wealth or power. No human being is recognized as having any political right in England in virtue of his manhood. Only a few years ago one of her great ministers exclaimed in Parliament, "What have the people to do with the laws but to obey them?" This is the real spirit of British institutions. The throne and the miscalled Commons alike are built on trampled rights. England's power is a colossal fabric, made vast by conquest and dowered with the spoils of the whole earth. Illustrious by literature and great in achievement, yet she regards humanity only as it may be a means of power or a source of danger.

Among all the nations of Europe her government is the only one which admits two hereditary branches. The King represents prerogative. The House of Lords represents birth-aristocracy. What does the Commons represent? Property or wealth-aristocracy. Is this true? Does it not really represent the people, as we are told it does every day in this debate? How can it with only a fraction over one-third of the adult men voting? The elective franchise itself is an aristocratic system. It is placed on a property basis. The majority of the men of England have no vote or voice in the election of that Commons. How, then, can it be a reflection of the will of the people? True, they have had from time to time parliamentary reform and have enlarged the sphere of the elective franchise, but it is always only a question of how much property shall give this right. In the time of Charles I, so often alluded to, the contest was simply between the King and a few thousand people of England, or between aristocracy and wealth.

The Commons of England really represents mainly the land of the country. More than twenty million people live in England. Thirty thousand men substantially own the agricultural land of that country. Sixty-two men own six million acres of the soil. Two hundred of these landowners, mostly of the "privileged orders" and many of them members of the House of Lords, a few years ago returned a majority of the House of Commons. In the debate on the late reform bill it was shown that there were in that house two hundred and five members closely related to "peers of the realm," and of the six hundred and fifty-eight members only about two hundred had neither title, office, pension, or patronage. Even above this basis of flagrant mockery of popular liberty the members are so distributed as to give supremacy to the landed aristocracy.

In a late Parliament a single earl, owning eleven townships of land of more than two hundred and sixty thousand acres and containing four boroughs, was able to return seven members. The boasted reform of 1832 was settled on the basis of aristocratic supremacy. Lancashire, with a manufacturing population of over a million, and Lymington, called a seat of landed gentry, with three thousand three hundred inhabitants, had each a member. Yorkshire, the seat of the woolen manufacturers, with twelve hundred thousand people, had the same representation as two boroughs with a joint population of six thousand. By the boasted reform bill of 1866 the franchise was somewhat extended, merely as a measure of self-protection, and for months the high debate in Parliament ran upon the mighty issue whether it should require a rental or ownership of fifty or one hundred dollars to fully qualify and prepare a man to vote. In all the mass of precedents, good and bad, that make up the so-called British constitution, for they have no written constitution, I challenge any man to find an act, or law, or line of recognition of the political status of any human being in right of his God-anointed manhood.

Compared with this system of feudal pomp and mockery of liberty, and contrasted, too, with the sickly worship of them so fashionable and so constantly heard just now in various places, how refreshing and healthy to recall the brave, true words of the men who framed our Constitution. In that convention Franklin denounced the distinctions based on property. Wise George Mason said:

> We all feel too strongly the remains of ancient prejudices, and view things too much through a British medium. A freehold is the qualification [for voting] in England, and hence it is imagined it is the proper one. The true idea, in his opinion, was that every man having evidence of attachment to and permanent common interest with the society ought to share all its rights and privileges. Was this qualification restrained to freeholders? * * * Does nothing besides property mark a permanent attachment?—Elliot's Debates, v. 5, p. 387.

Now, the haughty barons it was who wrested from King John a charter of their feudal privileges, and not of popular rights. The conflicts between the Commons and the King and between the Commons and the Lords are the antagonisms between the rank of birth, the aristocracy of accident, and the no less exacting and absolute aristocracy founded in England on property and power. As the King's prerogatives are not limited by any written constitution, but settled only by precedents and sometimes by special acts, it is inevitable that there should be uncertainty, extortions, conflict. We have had a vast amount of random talk about "supplies" and "grievances," founded largely on misapprehension of facts. A large part of the "supply" granted to an English monarch is either to carry out his own arbitrary plans, as in the case of the ship-money demanded by Charles I, or, as often happens, vast sums for his own personal indulgence. May, in his Constitutional History, says:

> It was not till in the reign of Charles II that Parliament established the principle of appropriating supplies to specific services by statute, and to these were added, at various times, special grants for extraordinary purposes. It has been customary to grant the King, at the commencement of each reign, the ordinary revenues of the Crown, which were estimated to provide, in time of peace, for the support of His Majesty's dignity and civil government and for the public defense. * * * Whatever remained of this annual income, after paying the necessary expenses of the government, was at the King's absolute disposal, whether for the support of his dignity and influence, or for his pleasure and profusion. Not satisfied with these resources for personal expenditure, there is no doubt that Charles II applied to his own privy purse large sums of money specially appropriated by Parliament for carrying on the war.

This shows at a glance how grievance and supplies were constantly connected. The same connection has existed under that system ever since; but for two hundred years no House of Commons has voted to stop the supplies to carry on the government, though often those bills are loaded with the most absurd and odious burdens. Within the present century Windsor Castle, one of the royal residences, has received for improvements $15,000,000. The natural children of William IV have received in "supplies" $15,000, and the natural children of George IV no less than $500,000 in grants from Parliament. Half a million dollars have been granted to royal dukes and duchesses, and in one bill of "supplies" there was granted for the repairs of the Queen's kitchen garden at Frogmore $115,000, for the royal yacht $100,000, for the repairs of Pimlico Palace $750,000, and thousands more for what are well named "mysterious pensions."

The present Queen, one of the wisest and most moderate of England's rulers, absorbs yearly for royal prerogative and imperial pomp millions of money largely wrung by rental, tax, and excise from the millions of her people, who have no more voice or part in making the laws by which they are governed than the dogs in the royal kennel, to which a liberal "supply" was recently granted. At her marriage Parliament granted to the Queen $1,400,000 annually for the royal household expenses, besides the revenues of the Duchy of Lancaster, which in 1875 yielded three hundred thousand more. In short, the Queen and royal family receive in supplies over $6,000,000 to furnish the royal household and stables, the royal children, and the royal kennel. The other day I read in a London court journal that the Queen had now in Windsor Castle nine million dollars' worth of plate, and on the same page of the same paper is an account of the riot of starving men in the Walton manufacturing district, asking for work or bread.

Under such forms of government no wonder grievances grow up, and even wealth becomes weary of granting supplies. Under our system, with a written Constitution, minutely defining the scope and sphere of each of the co-ordinate branches, there can be no grievance, in the English sense, against a President. He has no prerogative. His powers and duties are directly granted and carefully guarded by the Constitution and the law. He, as much as this House, is the representative of the people. He is charged with the execution of the laws. If bad laws are on the statute-book it is absurd to call that a grievance against him. If he differ with the Legislature the Constitution tells him expressly what he "shall" do; and to call that dissent a grievance is to impeach that Constitution, and to resist that established principle is to conspire against the Constitution.

If the President oversteps the boundary of his rights, impeach him. That is the constitutional remedy, and the only one. Why shall the whole nation suffer in the loss of trade, in the loss of confidence, in the alarm of capital, in the stagnation of enterprise, and in the paralyzed functions of the Government for any wrong the Executive may do? It is only a pretense. The people know it is a desperate and revolutionary attempt to assure your own supremacy by means without precedent or warrant in law or Constitution. Driven from all your own usages and principles, you fly to the musty records of the imperial system which our illustrious fathers disowned and renounced. They told us, too, that our system was not designed to conform to any model.

In the convention Mr. Morris said:

> There is one difference, however, in the two cases [the King and the President] which disconcerts all reasoning from the British constitution. The British executive has so great an interest in his prerogatives and such power for means of defending them that he will never yield any part of them. The interest of our Executive is so inconsiderable and so transitory and his means of defending it so feeble that there is the greatest ground to fear his want of firmness in resisting encroachments. He concurred in thinking the public liberty in greater danger from legislative usurpations than from any other source.—Elliot's Deb., vol. 5, p. 346.

In a discussion which occurred in Congress twenty-two years ago, the radical difference between our Government and that of Great Britain was put with great force by Senator Cass, a man of commanding influence in the democratic party. I read from the Congressional Globe, second session Thirty-fourth Congress, page 12:

> Gentlemen talk of stopping supplies. Even in England it is rather a flippant remark, and I do not think has occurred there for nearly two centuries. The last time it was done was, I think, in the time of Charles I. That is a tripartate government, an antagonistic government, with two hereditary bodies and one elective body. The radical difference between the two governments is, this is the government of the people and that is the government of the sovereign. The Queen there inherits the sovereignty. The supplies which the Commons may stop are not the supplies of the people. The government is not the government of the people Here, if you stop the supplies of the Government, whose supplies do you stop and whose Government do you check? The Government of the people. You stop the supplies of the people.

Mr. Chairman, during the progress of this discussion I have been not a little surprised to find gentlemen on the other side so blindly devoted to English precedents and methods. In many ways they are utterly at variance with the spirit of our Government. The mere mention of some of these, it seems to me, will convince us at once that they are utterly unsuited to our practices. English law has always dealt cruel punishment to those who have risen in rebellion against her power. Not stopping at death and confiscation of property of rebels, she has blotted out by attainder the civil rights even of their children. How utterly abhorrent are such laws compared with the mild and more than forgiving spirit of American legislation! So fully are we imbued with this humane unselfishness that not even the most devoted worshipper of English precedents has gone so far as to sanction these cruel and unwise customs. British barbarity even shot rebels out of loaded cannon, and has secured her power, strange as it may seem, by bloody penalties rather than by conciliation and forgiveness.

Incredible as it seems to us, the old and unrepealed English law of 1570 still forbids that a rebel shall sit in Parliament, for it declares that he is dead in law if not, as he generally is, in fact. Now, such a law is utterly unsuited to us. It would break up this Congress, defeat reform, and indefinitely postpone that political millennium so feelingly anticipated by the noted gentleman from Mississippi [laughter] [Mr. CHALMERS] when this Government, so long "debauched" by those who rescued it, shall be ruled by these "purer and better men." But I leave the whole question of English precedents, still in doubt whether some of their usages are wise or otherwise.

In the discussion of these measures much has been said about the Army and the peril of standing armies. Since the democracy has been in power in this House a continuous assault has been made on our little Army. It seems to carry with it unwelcome associations to our opponents, for it is still, small as it is, the symbol of the power that was the bulwark of the Union. So from year to year the attempt is made to reduce it, to harass it, to humiliate it, and now to starve it. Mr. Chairman, no other first-class power on earth would call our brave little band of twenty-five thousand a standing army. Our forefathers were jealous of standing armies, it is true, but they had in their minds the vast armies then kept by the great powers of Europe. Frederick the Great then had two hundred thousand soldiers in arms. The French had three hundred thousand, and soon increased to seven hundred and seventy thousand. The British Army was nearly two hundred thousand strong.

In discussing this very question, urging the adoption of the Constitution, James Madison estimated a safe basis to be one to one hundred inhabitants, or an army of thirty thousand at that time, which would give us now at the same ratio an army of about three hundred and sixty thousand men. We have one to every eighteen thousand, or sixty to every million of the inhabitants. This little band is needed to protect our frontier of thousands of miles, and to man our sixty fortifications and arsenals. In many of the Southern States there is not a single United States soldier, and only eleven hundred and fifty-five in the whole South. The cry about a standing army is intended to arouse prejudice and to degrade and weaken still more the power of the National Government. Our Army is no "hireling" force but a part of the people, and inherits the proud and grateful memories which cling to that grand victorious host, the first and only great voluntary army known in the history of our race, whose glory was not conquest, but liberty, whose triumph was not oppression, but peace.

With these tender and holy memories yet fresh, of its sublime sacrifices, its illustrious achievements, and its quiet return to the ranks of peaceful industry, you cannot arouse fear or prejudice against our little Army of twenty-five thousand men. It may defend; it cannot endanger. It will protect; it cannot oppress. Had the statesmen of this country done their part of the great work as well as the soldiers did theirs, the land would now have peace, rest, and prosperity. This Congress would neither be in session, nor so constituted as to alarm the confidence, paralyze the reviving industries, and imperil the peace of the country.

Mr. Chairman, I would rejoice to know that the bitterness of our great sectional conflict could fade into forgiveness and forbearance if not into forgetfulness. Your party will not let it be so. You cannot deny that the Government, through its victorious party, has treated you and your great crime with a mercy and magnanimity unmatched in history. This very Congress is filled with proofs of a forbearance of which no nation ever before dreamed. The people were beginning to accept it in the hope of a true reconciliation. Five years ago, standing among the new graves of the brave dead of my own county, in a public address, I said:

> Remember that only when impotent resistance to the inexorable law of freedom and of progress on the one hand, as well as all proscriptions and distinctions of civic rights on the other hand, shall be buried by victor and vanquished, will the living be at peace and the dead truly glorified. Then only will reconciled enemies become united and one, not only in common valor and bitter experience, in interest and destiny, but in patriotism and heart, in peace and good will, with
> "One hope, one lot, one life, one glory."

Would it might be so. You are to-day making it impossible. As the original fire was of your own kindling, so this new stirring of the embers is your work. From the solid South comes an assault upon every department of the Government in which nationality still lives. The cry against Federal supervision at national elections, as it is plainly written in the Constitution, is an effort to get rid of the presence and power of the Government in the States. Then we know what will happen. For years you have declared the freedman shall not vote, and your fair promises and soft words have been followed by cruel massacre and superfluous crime. You tell us it is wicked and "sectional" to speak of these outrages, but not a word of condemnation of the outrages themselves. You commit an impudent invasion of the rights of every northern soldier or citizen when you thus build a bandit power on the crushed franchises of three million people, and trample the dearest rights of man under the bloody and brutal feet of might and murder. It is the glory of power to heed the cry of the humblest sufferer, and this great Government will not forsake the men it has lifted from chattels into citizenship.

Mr. Chairman, if reconciliation comes it must come with an equal recognition on both sides. It must come with justice, with obedience to law and to the sovereignty which the framers of our Constitution proclaimed must be "supreme." We will agree that our battered shields shall be hung up side by side as trophies of a common valor, but we will not agree that the dogmas which led to that awful conflict shall be honored and enthroned. We will not agree that loyalty shall seek pardon of treason. We will not agree that the unmatched defense of our Union shall ever be written down other than as everlastingly right. We will not agree that any man in any section of our land shall be despoiled of his political rights or ask in vain the shelter of our flag. We will not agree to exalt the perils or sanction the heresies that must endanger if not destroy our majestic possibilities.

In the past the republican party has dared, against prejudice and passion, to stake its power and anchor its legislation on what the great commoner of England has so well said is the only safe foundation, "the basis of eternal right." No party can afford to disregard this great truth. But I rejoice that there are forces higher and better than laws. There is a guidance wiser than that of statesmen. Free labor, free homes, open schools, the wealth of field and mine, are the irrepressible forces of national life. The truest thought and the wisest liberty are born to victory. The true end of political conflict is to find out and establish the right as the bed-rock of all wise legislation. So grounded and so governed our Union shall become an indestructible thing, our Constitution truly interpreted shall bear no seed of death, and through the ages the world shall take heart from the example of a mighty nation grandly illustrating the wisdom of liberty, the safety of progress.

Mr. FORT. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. FORT having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. BLACKBURN reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 2) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. HUMPHREY. In pursuance of the order of the House made this afternoon, I move that the House now take a recess until ten o'clock to-morrow morning.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at ten o'clock p. m.) the House took a recess until to-morrow morning at ten o'clock.

AFTER RECESS.

The recess having expired, the House (at ten o'clock a. m., Thursday, April 24) resumed its session.

LEGISLATIVE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. I move the rules be suspended and the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of proceeding with the consideration of the legislative appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. BLACKBURN in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes.

Mr. SCALES. Mr. Chairman, this debate drags its slow length along. The subject is exhausted and yet the debate continues. I would gladly have seen it ended many days ago, but it was not the pleasure of the House so to order. I therefore claim the attention of the committee.

Let us for a moment retrace our steps and see what are the issues. It is proposed, first, to repeal so much of the law as authorizes the use of troops at the polls to keep the peace; second, so to amend the law in relation to jurors in the Federal courts that the test oath shall be repealed and that the jury list shall be made up and drawn in the presence of and by persons of both political parties, so as to insure absolute fairness and impartiality; third, to repeal the law which authorizes the use of supervisors and marshals at the polls, with this exception, that two supervisors may still be appointed for each precinct to attend at registration and at the polls merely as witnesses. I mention them all here, for they are in the same line of reform and have more or less contributed to the debate. A mere statement of the case decides it. As an original question it would not admit of debate. Cover it up in the passions engendered by the war and in the bitterness of political strife, and it becomes a grave question. Imagine for a moment a proposition introduced into the convention of our fathers that framed the Constitution that the President, who is Commander-in-Chief, should at his discretion use the Army to keep peace at the polls, and that he should at discretion appoint supervisors and marshals to attend at the polls, with the power to arrest voters either with or without process, what do you think would have been the result? It would have been rejected with scorn and indignation. From that day down to the breaking out of the late war, a period of over seventy years, there were no such laws and none dared to propose them.

The Government is based upon the will of the people, and that will should be expressed absolutely free from fear, favor, or any undue influence. This will is the source of all political power; corrupt the fountain and the stream will be corrupt. The legislative and executive branches of the Government derive their powers from the people, and are but agents to carry out their will under such restrictions as the people in their organic law have imposed. Let this will in any way be coerced, or subjected to even the shadow of force, and you strike a blow which, if followed up, must shiver to atoms the granite foundations of the Republic. It has been said that up to this time there has been no abuse of this power. Suppose this were true, does it prove that there never will be an abuse of the power? The President, from the very nature of the case, is more or less a partisan, and he himself is to be voted for. Members of Congress are to be elected, and party supremacy is dependent upon the result of the elections. Will he act in the interest of party? He may not, I trust he would not; but a people jealous of their rights will be slow to trust him.

Is it true that there has been no abuse of this power? Loud complaints and charges come from all over the country. It has been made the subject of investigating committees by Congress, and it is claimed that hundreds of voters have been disfranchised and many elections carried by these officers in the interest of party. It is not necessary to decide how this is. I will not undertake to do so now, but in all frankness I ask all parties is it not a dangerous power in the hands of an opposing party? The republicans have it now, but hereafter it may elude their grasp and may go into other hands. Will republicans then feel safe? I am proud to say in this matter that the democrats and greenbackers are together, and so they will stand until these obnoxious laws are repealed and the will of the people left free. Repeal these laws and all parties are placed upon the same footing, and all will go before the people upon their merits.

The framers of the Constitution gave to the several States the power to prescribe the qualifications for electors and to make the necessary regulations to secure free and fair elections. I believe this power is wisely bestowed. The people of the States are vitally interested in that branch of the National Legislature that alone has the right to originate bills to levy taxes and disburse public money, and they alone should have the power to have their interests ably and faithfully guarded.

In the wide expanse of territory embraced by this great Government there must and will be great diversity of feeling and interest. There must be compromises for the common good, so that the burdens and privileges may be shared equally by all. Let the Representative feel his dependence upon his State and her laws, and you place upon him a responsibility which guarantees faithfulness to its interest, without in the least interfering with his duties to the General Government. The General Government is made up of all the States, and if the interest of each State is faithfully represented and guarded, it must follow that the whole cannot suffer. Give this power to Congress alone, which is so far removed from the people, and you weaken responsibility, and in the same proportion lessen the faithfulness of the Representative. It has been asserted time and again that the democratic majority in seeking the repeal of these laws seek but to perpetuate their own power. I believe these laws are unconstitutional and dangerous to liberty, and for these reasons, above all party, they should be repealed; but at the same time I do not hesitate to declare that the only hope of the democratic party is in free elections. How is it with the republican party? If the democratic party, as is charged, seek the repeal for party ends, is it not also true that the republicans see in their perpetuation an indefinite lease of power to them? We need only recur to the history of this law and its execution, now so familiar to the States, to place this beyond controversy and develop the true inwardness of this contest. Let me again state the issue; its importance demands it.

The presidential campaign of 1880 is just before us. The frauds, intimidation, and coercion of that of 1876 brought this country to the verge of ruin. Both sides claimed the election, both sides charged fraud, and no man was bold enough to deny that frauds of the most startling character had been committed; the question was who did it. It was referred to an electoral commission made up of Representatives, Senators, and judges of the Supreme Court. The democratic party, relying upon the justice of their cause, intrusted the whole matter to a body, a majority of whom were of a different political complexion, but it was said they were judges and were above party. The result showed that the confidence was misplaced, and that party spirit wherever found overrides all other considerations. The commission was eight to seven. They decided that they could not go behind the frauds. They would not hear the proofs even; the rights of the States were so sacred that even fraud if committed in the States was too sacred to be unearthed. The decision was made not in justice or good faith but by reason of eight to seven. The country was cheated and a man made President who it is believed was never elected. With this precedent before us the democratic party desired as far as practicable to free elections from all unfair outside influence, and proposed the repeal of these laws. They wish all parties to go into the next campaign upon what they have done and propose to do, and let the people at the polls, free from all Federal influence or power, decide between them. Not so the republicans; they must have the Army and the supervisors and marshals and deputy marshals; they must have them at the polls. To pay these they will control near $300,000. In 1876 these supervisors and marshals cost $275,000; in 1878 $202,000 of the people's money, and they can employ them without limit. With these men and this money and this power thrown upon their side they propose to go into the election of 1880. With it they hope to win; without it they sink to rise no more.

The pretext is that if these laws are repealed you cannot get fair elections. What a commentary upon republican institutions! What a slander upon the people! If true, the people are no longer to be trusted. If true, it sweeps away the entire foundation of republican government. But it is said we seek our purposes in the wrong way; that we put the repeal upon an appropriation bill, and threaten to starve the Government unless the President signs it, and this is said to be revolution. Let us examine this a moment. It is a grave allegation, and, if true, too much honor cannot be awarded the faithful watchman who has discovered and proclaimed the treasonable purpose. But if untrue, then he who charges it is a traitor, a mover of sedition and strife, and deserves the scorn and indignation of an outraged people. What are the facts? The amendment is upon an appropriation bill, but it is there by the rules of the House as decided by the Chair, and sustained by a majority of its members, and by innumerable precedents established by the republican party themselves. There is no revolution, then, in placing a rider upon an appropriation bill. If more proof were needed, we have now the declaration from all the prominent men on the other side that there is nothing wrong in this. Where, then, does revolution come in? It is said that two prominent Senators of the democratic party at the last session of Congress claimed that they had a right to withhold supplies in order to secure a redress of grievances. Was this necessarily a threat? Was it intended to coerce any one? Not at all. These gentlemen did but give expression to their conviction that these laws should be repealed; that the safety of the country, as far as it depended upon fair elections, demanded it. They unhesitatingly declared that in obedience to that power vested in Congress by the Constitution to originate and pass appropriation bills they could not wisely give a dollar to keep troops at the polls or to pay supervisors and marshals and deputy marshals to watch over and control the elections, and this is the head and front of their offending.

The party, it is true, held a caucus for conference, and conference only. No one was bound by its action, and it was so announced. In that conference we agreed that we would seek to incorporate these amendments upon the appropriation bills, first, because we believed that we could reduce expenses without injury and greatly to the benefit of the Government $275,000; second, and more important still, because we hoped to secure free and fair elections. These were our convictions, and we acted upon them without regard to the convictions of others or what would be their action. Must we yield them at the wild and partisan cry of revolution? Must we surrender to the Executive at his bidding, lest the wheels of Government may be stopped by him? Away with such doctrine! It destroys the independence of the different branches of the Government and commits all legislative power to the President. This is the extent of the revolution, no more and no less.

But, Mr. Chairman, let us return to the last days of the Forty-fifth Congress and see the beginning of this matter and its progress to the present time.

On the 15th of February, 1879, (page 18 of the RECORD,) we find Mr. Hale, a leading republican from Maine, advising Mr. Hanna, of Indiana, not to put an amendment in which he was interested on the appropriation bill, for the reason that it would not pass. I give his language:

> Mr. HALE. Let me suggest to my friend from Indiana that if this appropriation be put in a separate bill it is much more likely to go through, if any appropriation bill goes through, than it would do if attached to a long appropriation like this, on which we are promised to be antagonized with special legislation, and if we got into a dead-lock the appropriation bill will not go through.
> But I do not think any one here will take the responsibility of antagonizing a bill to pay the arrearages of pensions so as to make the machinery efficacious. If the gentleman attaches it to this bill with all its incumbrances, he will not accomplish what he desires.

This was before any amendment had even been proposed, and I believe even before the form of the amendments and their extent had been agreed upon. There was a rumor and but a rumor in regard to them, and yet so eager was this active and irrepressible party leader to stir up strife and rekindle again the fires of sectional hate that he could not wait. Like the war-horse he smelleth the battle afar off, and determined, so necessary was conflict to his party, that if it did not come otherwise, to provoke it. This is the first threat and the first effort at coercion. Again, on the 19th of February (page 45 of the RECORD) he uses this language:

> I cannot predict the result. I can only say for one I believe this side of the House is determined that this revolutionary legislation shall not obtain. I can say for myself that ten years' experience have taught me no parliamentary wit and no device and no plan under the rules of the House which shall not be resorted to if this amendment is ruled in to prevent it being passed here and now on this appropriation bill.

Again, on the forty-eighth page:

> Mr. HALE. Now, I only want to say a word further, and I do not say it in any menacing way; I do not say it except in the spirit of sober warning. This side of the House believes sincerely that if this body of law be struck from the statutes, the laws of the several States afford no protection to the citizen when he seeks to exercise the right of suffrage.
> We cannot and will not endure it.

Where then was the distinguished gentleman from Ohio, whose patriotism has been so much shocked by the wicked efforts of the democratic party to starve the Government. I would not do him injustice; it is a grave matter; let him speak for himself, and out of his own mouth we shall judge him. February 19 (page 56) he says:

> Now, Mr. Chairman, if the effort to accomplish these purposes be persisted in, the minority will meet it in the spirit of the Constitution and by the fullest exercise of all our rights of resistance. We shall resist the repeal of these laws whether it take one night, two nights, ten nights, or all the days during which this Congress lives. [Applause.] Not by our consent shall you remove from our statute-books these muniments of the elective franchise. When you succeed you must do it because you have the full power to do it, and not by our help or our consent.

Where was the distinguished gentleman from Michigan, whose bugle-blasts have so often summoned the republican clans to the contest in his patriotic struggle against revolution:

> Where, where was Roderick then?
> One blast upon his bugle-horn
> Were worth a thousand men.

Alas!

> How vain are all things here below;
> How false, and yet how fair!

He is found on the side of the Hessians. He and his clans are deliberately, willfully, and of malice aforethought on the side of revolution—rank, criminal revolution. They were in the minority; they sought to defeat a decided majority and to stifle its will. To do this every effort was resorted to. They declined to vote to prevent a quorum, and well-nigh was it accomplished. I remember well the occasion, and the bitter disappointment manifested by the revolutionists when they failed. My friend from Illinois [Mr. FORT] and from Minnesota, [Mr. DUNNELL,] deeply absorbed no doubt in the consequences of revolution, for the moment forgot the situation and when their names were called, contrary to express orders from king caucus, voted. An earnest effort was made by each of them to withdraw their votes, but the House would not allow it. Another vote was recorded by a pure-hearted old gentleman on that side. He voted against the amendments. A rush was made for him and he was asked, "Why did you vote?" In the simplicity of his nature he replied: "I voted against the thing because I thought it ought not to passs." In this way three votes were added to the democrats, a quorum was secured, and the revolution failed. This was indeed revolution. Is it doubted? Let us hear again what the distinguished gentleman from Ohio says within the last ten days, (April 5, page 18, RECORD:)

I never claimed that it was either revolutionary or unconstitutional for this House to put a rider on an appropriation bill. No man on this side of the House has claimed that. The most that has been said is that it is considered a bad parliamentary practice; and all parties in this country have said that repeatedly.

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] evidently thought he was making a telling point against me when he cited the fact that in 1872 I insisted upon the adoption of a conference report on an appropriation bill that had a rider on it; and he alleged that I said it was revolutionary for his party to resist it. Let me refresh his memory. I said then and I say now that it was revolutionary for the minority party to refuse to let the appropriation bill be voted on. For four days they said we should not vote at all on the sundry civil appropriation bill because there was a rider on it, put there not by the House but by the Senate.

I was sorry the rider was put on, and moved to non-concur in the amendments when they came to the House. But when the minority on this floor said that we should not act on the bill at all, because the rider was put upon it, I said and now say it was unjustifiable parliamentary obstruction. We do not filibuster. We do not struggle to prevent a vote on this bill. I will be loyal to the House that I am a member of, and maintain now as I did then the right of the majority to bring an appropriation bill to a vote.

This not only proves revolution but it was revolution without justification or excuse; for up to that time according to his own admission we had done nothing but what we had a right to do under the law. What was the object of this revolution? In the language of the same gentleman I answer it was to "starve the Government." Was it heroic? No. Was it chivalrous? No. Was it unmanly? Yes, an unmanly effort to starve the Government, by preventing necessary legislation, and preventing even a vote upon it.

Thou therefore which teachest another, teachest thou not thyself? Thou that preachest a man should not steal, dost thou steal? * * * Thou that abhorrest idols, dost thou commit sacrilege? Thou that makest thy boast of the law, through breaking the law dishonorest thou God?

Let me affectionately commend these sacred and yet pertinent words to gentlemen on the other side.

Then you were as anxious about the Senate as you now are about the President. You feared to trust them even though you had a majority there. Why this effort to forestall the Senate? Why this great haste? It was a party necessity and not an inch of ground must be yielded without a contest. Fight the amendments, get up revolution and sectional hate, and you starve the Government but you save the party. On the other hand, give the people free elections, and you save the Government and starve the party. True to their past history, they made the election and the Government was sacrificed. Look at their record. By their corruptions they have robbed the Treasury, by their extravagance impoverished the tax-payers, and by their legislation in favor of the moneyed power they have literally starved the laboring classes. And now they will stop the wheels of Government before they will allow free elections to the people.

At the last session we defeated the revolution and passed the bill in the House. It was defeated in the Senate. A conference was asked and obtained. We believed these laws as they stood were unconstitutional, and yet in the interest of compromise we modified our demands and asked for the amendments as now proposed; they refused, and hence this extra session. Where does the responsibility rest? The Senate is now democratic. Hence we hear the cry next raised that we intend to coerce the President. Who speaks for him to-day? Who is authorized to do so? The whole argument is based upon the fact that the bill will be vetoed. This fact is either assumed or is within the knowledge of some one. If known, and has been spoken by his authority, I undertake to say that such conduct is highly criminal and without a parallel. It is an effort to intimidate the legislative branch of the Government by threats of the Executive. It is revolutionary and dangerous, and shows the importance if not absolute necessity of taking from him all power over elections. If it is assumed, then it may be that all this storm has been raised without cause. He may sign the bills, and if he does, all is quiet and peace. This was feared, and the President must be forestalled, and he must be coerced by a party necessity into a veto. A caucus of the party had been held, and it was reported that a distinguished gentleman in that caucus had said that "if we had Grant we would know what to depend upon; but as for this fellow we know not whence he is or what he will do;" and then they proceed to make him do what otherwise he might not do. But it is said that some of these measures as they stand were introduced by democrats and passed by them. They are all in the same line, as I have shown, and I propose by incontestable evidence to show what democrats thought of this legislation. On the 20th of February, 1879, page 49, Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin, said:

Mr. Chairman, the opposition of the democratic party to the law now proposed to be repealed has been consistent, unremitting, and logical. In 1871, after the events of 1868, * * * men high in the democratic counsels, like the late honored Speaker Kerr, declared this legislation not only to be "unconstitutional and utterly void," but a "violation of common honor and common decency," and he was followed and sustained by distinguished democrats like the gentleman from New York, [Mr COX,] Mr. Eldredge of my own State, Mr VOORHEES, Mr. BAYARD, and others equally eminent, by whom this legislation was characterized as "outrageous and infamous," "surcharged with malice," "a blow at self-government," an "advance toward a constitutional empire," and the officers to be appointed under it, in language expressive if not elegant, were likened to the "locusts and lice of Egypt."

This, then, is no new thing with the democracy; not the democracy of the South but that of the North, East, and West; not the democracy that, as is alleged, endeavored to shoot the Government, but the democracy that stood by the Union and aided the Government to the extent of their power and influence in shooting down the rebellion. It is with them a living principle, whether many or few, strong or weak, at all times and under all circumstances they have been consistent. Democrats, this is your record; you have a right to be proud of it. As a democrat I rejoice in it; and had I the power I would with a pen of fire, in letters of living light, write it upon the heavens, that all might look up and read and see in these principles the perpetuity of republican institutions.

The Constitution declares that all bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives. The Senate shall have the right to propose or concur in amendments as on other bills. Why was this given to the House alone? The reason can be found in the fact that the Representatives come directly from the people and are directly responsible to the people. They are familiar with the business, trade, and occupation of each locality, and understand what should be protected and what and how much burdens each should bear. Justice Story takes this view. In volume 2, page 47 and page 340, we find the following:

It may be fit that it should possess the exclusive right to originate money bills, since it may be presumed to possess more ample means of local information and it more directly represents the opinions, feelings, and wishes of the people; and being directly dependent upon them for support, it will be more watchful and cautious in the imposition of taxes than a body which emanates exclusively from the States in their sovereign political capacity.

What is all this worth if it is subject without restriction to the will of the Executive? Nothing; literally nothing. The clause is meaningless and the privilege intended to be conferred worthless. In the present legislative appropriation bill there are now one hundred pages, and many items on each page. If the President can veto without restriction any item which may not commend itself to his judgment or whim, he can block the wheels of Government, for he will have full power over all taxes and all disbursements of the people's money. The veto power is given in general terms; but surely it was not intended to override this provision in the Constitution which intrusts to the House alone the power to originate revenue bills. I can now recall but one instance of the veto of an appropriation bill, and that was because there was incorporated into it an amendment which violated the Constitution and infringed the prerogatives of the Executive. All the precedents are the other way. In 1876 even General Grant, as bold and imperious as he usually was, submitted to this principle. He found serious grounds of complaint against the sundry civil bill for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1871. He declared that such a bill was disastrous to the public interest; and yet he says, "I do not feel warranted in vetoing an absolutely necessary appropriation bill," and signed it.

Again, in 1865 the republican party, who had possession of both Houses of Congress, placed on an appropriation bill a clause which deprived the President of a part of his prerogative as Commander-in-Chief of the Army. If there was ever a case in the eyes of all men from the framing of the Constitution down to the present time which called for the prompt exercise of the veto power, this was one. But Mr. Johnson would not take the responsibility of stopping supplies. He protested, but signed it. We have in this bill placed before Mr. Hayes upward of $18,000,000, an ample amount to meet all the demands of the Government. Will he turn his back upon it because Congress has declared in an amendment that they will not pay one dollar to the Army or to the marshals at the polls? If so, let him take the responsibility. The South has been dragged into this debate and held up as again in revolution. The charge is wicked and slanderous. We above all things do not want agitation, but peace. The country will do us the justice to remember that this controversy is not of our seeking. We have convictions deep and strong; and as Representatives we have dared to express them, and this is our only offense. It is admitted on the other side that this repeal does not affect the South and is not intended for that section. On the 19th of February, 1879, (page 51 of the RECORD,) the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] declares:

Mr. FRYE. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that this is a question affecting the South at all. This law has been upon the statute-book since 1872, and the republican party has disappeared in the South as the dew disappears before the rising sun. The South will be solid for the democratic candidate for the Presidency in 1880, law or no law, supervisor or no supervisor, United States marshal or no United States marshal.

But the South cannot elect a President of the United States. Something else is necessary. What is it? The electoral vote in the State of New York. There is the difficulty; there is the reason for this requirement of the repeal of this law. New York must be carried by the democratic party in 1880 in order to elect a democratic candidate for President. With this law upon the statute-book gentlemen know perfectly well that New York cannot then be carried for the democratic party.

In the face of all this the revolution of the South is harped upon day after day and by every republican orator. The reason is manifest. Without this there could be no sensation, and without a sensation the people are with us.

Mr. Chairman, the unhappy war through which we have passed has been made the fruitful source of much strife and much unwise and mischievous legislation, yet I hope and believe that its results are not all evil. We have learned on both sides to know and appreciate our own people, their valor as well as their devotion to principle. This will make us tolerant and more cautious in infringing upon the rights, liberties, and opinions of each other, and will, I trust, give us an everlasting peace. The soldiers who fell on both sides were martyrs to principle; and if it be true that the blood of martyrs is the seed of the church, then surely the blood of these brave men, so freely shed all over our land, will water afresh the tree of liberty planted by our fathers. It shall grow and strengthen and spread until its shadow shall be cast over all nations, furnishing shelter not only to the unborn millions of our own children and children's children, but to the oppressed and down-trodden throughout the world.

Mr. Chairman, give us free elections, and a brighter day will dawn upon us. I speak in the spirit of prophecy. I have watched the day-spring from on high. In 1881 there will be another watchman upon Columbia's wall. His vision, his patriotism, and his platform will take in the entire country—the East, the West, the North, and the despised South as well. No more will we see section arrayed against section in civil dissensions and political strife; no more will we hear the croaking of the ill-boding crow that this land with its heritage of liberty is to be destroyed by revolution and starvation. But in its stead we will hear the joyful proclamation as it is borne upon the wings of the wind from Maine to California amid the ringing of bells, the thunder of artillery, and the gladsome shouts of a redeemed and united people:

> The winter is past, the rain is over and gone; the flowers appear on the earth; the time of the singing of birds is come, and the voice of the turtle is heard in our land.

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I am obliged to my friend and colleague [Mr. SCALES] for yielding a portion of his time to me.

In the discussion which has been pending for some weeks in this Hall, the Army appropriation and the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bills have been considered together, and this discussion has assumed a much wider range than is necessary for a full, fair, and complete consideration of the bills themselves or of the political features, as they have been termed, incorporated in the bills. In my judgment, it is one of the strongest evidences of the propriety and justice of the measures proposed, that gentlemen who oppose them have to go beyond their legitimate consideration to find reasons—reasons did I say?—no, not reasons, but grounds of appeal to passions and prejudices and bitter, unpatriotic sectional hates, to urge against them.

What is it that we propose to do? Gentlemen on the other side, launched upon the stormy sea of passion and guided by partisan fears and partisan hatreds, have gone so far from reason's shore as to lose sight of the real issues, and, mistaking the rotten ship of the republican party on which they are embarked for the old ship of state which carries, and will safely carry, the fortunes of a restored Union held together by the strong bonds of a common interest, of mutual respect and fraternal esteem, and by just and impartial laws for each and every part of that Union—bonds of union which democrats North and democrats South intend to cement, and which they will not permit to be severed by any sectional party or parties—mistaking, I say, their rotten hull for this noble old ship, and feeling that the coming wave of another popular election will carry them to the bottom or wreck them on some political shore where they can no longer feed upon the spoils of office and plunder the public Treasury, they raise the howl of "revolution" and the despairing cry of "starvation," and these are the arguments and the only arguments which they address to this House or to the country.

Now, sir, let us bring our republican friends back from this stormy sea for a moment and see what it is that we propose and what it is that they, in their insane or pretended fears, call "revolution" and "starvation?"

First. We say that we will pass the appropriation bill for the Army; that the Army shall be fed and clothed and supplied with everything necessary for it, but it shall not be used at the polls, unless "on the application of the Legislature or the Executive, when the Legislature cannot be convened," and then only to protect the State against "domestic violence," as is provided by the Constitution. We say the Army shall not be used simply at the call of a deputy marshal for mere police duty; no such use is warranted by the Constitution; no such use is demanded or can safely be permitted in a country of freedom and law where the military power should be subordinate to the civil authority, and we will not vote one cent of the public money for any such use.

Our republican friends say—for if they do not mean that they mean nothing—they say unless you permit the Army to be "used to keep the peace at the polls, (for that is the only issue between us on the Army bill,) and that means, unless you permit the Army to be used as a political power to enable us to control elections and retain power, then the Army shall have no money and the Army shall starve. Wring it and twist it as you will, and this is the attitude of our republican friends on the Army bill: "Let the Army be used to keep the peace at the polls or we, the republican minority, will defeat the appropriation bill and the Army shall starve or be disbanded." This is the logic, this the irresistible conclusion of their argument. The argument means this or it means nothing. If this is not the fair deduction from their premises, then all they have said is nonsense.

Second. Judges of the Federal courts can require jurors to take what is called the test oath. This oath excludes from the jury-box every soldier who served in the confederate army, (and everybody knows that almost the entire white male population of the South was in that army,) and it excludes all who in any way gave aid and comfort to any one engaged in that army. Under this power Federal judges and district attorneys (some of whom cannot themselves take the oath which, in the interest of party and in trials for political offenses, they require of jurors) can pack juries and pollute the very fountains of justice; and this has been done, and done under the forms of law. The test, as is stated in the public prints, has been applied to democratic jurors, while republicans are not challenged. I am glad to say that this complaint does not apply to the judges or attorneys of my State.

We say to our republican friends, we will vote money to sustain the judiciary, but none of it shall be used to pay packed juries. Let the fountains of justice be pure and unpolluted—let us have fair courts and honest juries. The right to be tried "by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed" is guaranteed by the Constitution, and we only ask that this guarantee of a most sacred right of freemen shall be observed. But our republican friends say: "No. If you do not leave it in the power of Federal courts to pack juries, by applying the test oath, we, the minority, will see that no money is allowed the courts, and justice shall die." If their argument does not mean this, it means nothing, and is nonsense.

Third. We say the Department of Justice shall have the money necessary for all legitimate purposes, but we will not vote money to pay deputy United States marshals (all or nearly all of whom are partisan republicans and appointed—notoriously and unblushingly appointed—for partisan purposes) to control elections and destroy freedom at the polls. Hundreds of thousands of dollars have been paid to these deputy marshals, and this has been a corruption fund in the interest of the republican party. Our republican friends say, "No, unless you give us money and permit us to employ deputy marshals at the polls, we, the minority, will see to it that this appropriation shall fail."

Fourth. We say the supervisors shall not have power to arrest citizens without warrant, and they shall not interfere with a free ballot. Remembering the services rendered by such partisan, political tricksters as Commissioner and Chief Supervisor John I. Davenport, who by his illegal, partisan use of power deprived hundreds and thousands of citizens in New York of their right to a free ballot, and remembering the partisan services of the thousands of supervisors appointed not in the interest of free elections but of party, our republican friends say "No, unless you allow supervisors at the polls with all the powers which we have given them, the appropriation shall fail and the wheels of Government shall stop." If their argument does not mean this, it means nothing, and all their talk is nonsense. How sincere they are is well illustrated by the case of Dean vs. Field, in the Forty-fifth Congress. By the returns of the poll-holders and by the supervisor's report Dean was entitled to his seat, but every member on the republican side of the House, except Mr. Butler, of Massachusetts, voted to seat Field.

In 1876, 4,863 supervisors and 11,612 deputy marshals were employed at a cost of $285,912, and in 1878, 4,881 supervisors and 4,725 deputy marshals were employed at a cost of $222,714, making over 26,000 in all, at a cost of more than $500,000; and I suppose no one on the republican side will be so wanting in candor as to deny that the bulk of this money was spent in the interest of the republican party and not in the interest of free elections. No one, I suppose, would be willing to be regarded so simple as to imagine, for instance, that Davenport was appointed for any honest purpose. For three-quarters of a century this Government had fair elections without the aid of deputy marshals and supervisors, and since their use there have been more frauds and villainies perpetrated by their aid than at all the elections from the foundation of the Government down to the day of their first appointment.

Has Congress the constitutional power to pass the pending bills? Unquestionably it has. Is there anything in them which violates the Constitution or interferes with the prerogative of the President or any other branch of the Government? No one will dare say that there is. No one who has any reputation to lose; no one who has any knowledge of the law, or whose opinion is worth a straw, will have the effrontery to say that there is. No one on the other side has ventured to say that there is; and yet gentlemen on that side, with a perversity of vision and a disregard of logic incomprehensible to me, say that it is revolutionary in us to do that which they admit we have the perfect legal and constitutional right to do, and which they themselves have done on many occasions, and on one at least when they willfully and deliberately invaded the constitutional rights of the President.

The gentleman from Michigan says that the majority says to the minority, "Yield your judgments to ours." Well, there is a difference of opinion—not about the legal right or constitutional power, but about the propriety of passing these bills, there is a difference of opinion, and there must be some settlement of this difference. The Constitution provides that "all bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives." I have not time now to discuss the reasons for giving to this House this power; but if it be revolutionary and little else than treason, as says the amiable, polite, considerate, and accomplished statesman from Michigan, [Mr. BURROWS,] who waves the bloody shirt so gracefully, and who, as he snuffs its odor, bellows over it as a herd of oxen at the smell of the blood of a slaughtered mate; if it be revolutionary for the majority to say to the minority, "Yield your judgments to ours or the supplies shall stop," what is it when the minority says to the majority, "You of the majority, yield your judgments to ours, or the supplies shall stop?" If one be revolution and starvation, what must the other be? I think I can find a partial answer to this question in the very polite language which the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] applied to us, "It is a compound—pardon the expression—of idiocy and insolence seldom equaled, never excelled." Of idiocy in supposing that a thinking people can be deceived by it, and of insolence and arrogance in supposing that the minority is the Government, that the republican party is the state. "I am the state," said Louis XIV. "Stand aside, I am holier than thou," said the Pharisee. In arrogance it excels Louis, and in comparison the Pharisee is a pattern of humility.

Now, sir, one would suppose that the questions at issue could be determined upon their merits; but, as I have said, the discussion has taken a wide range. Our republican friends have regaled us with all the horrors of the late war. For the want of better argument, all sorts of bad purposes have been attributed to us. We have been told that we were trying to starve the Government, that we were, using a polite epithet of the courtly and courteous statesman from Michigan, [Mr. BURROWS,] "co-conspirators," and the changes have been rung on treason, rebellion, slavery, the fugitive-slave law, and old John Brown has been again marched to the front; "full high advanced" the bloody shirt has waved, borne farthest to the front by some who did not so well like its appearance when the blood had a fresher smell; and my esteemed friend from Iowa has given us a very touching sermon, with the old fugitive slave and bloodhound for a text. He has discovered, and is filled with pride by the discovery, that the republican party has done what "no other party dared try to do." My friend has discovered, and "if he never utters another syllable on the floor of Congress" he "wants it remembered," that the declaration that "all men are created equal," as proclaimed by the Declaration of Independence, was only true in theory till his party made it a very fact and a very truth.

Well, sir, I confess that under the good old ways of democracy men were, in fact, born and grew up and were not created as Adam was, but my friend and his party have changed the mode and they are now, in fact, created equal. Will my friend tell us whether they will stay so? He says that during the eighteen years since the republican party came into power "the country has prospered financially and otherwise as no nation on the globe ever did prosper." Now when the millions of impoverished people in this land, millions impoverished by the financial policy of my friend and his party, when the laboring masses whose labor gives strength and power to this country, when the toiling millions read the gentleman's talk of prosperity, and look around them and see that this prosperity has been for the few, not the many, for the favored class who deal in untaxed bonds and enjoy the benefits of monopolies created by his party; when they see that only the favored few have been financially prosperous and by the aid of his financial policy have hoarded millions; that while business has been stagnant, thousands have been bankrupted and millions of working people have with difficulty been able to make bread, they will hardly be able to see this prosperity and they will be more grateful to my friend and his party for having established the absolute "equality of all men," at their creation if he will discover some plan to keep them so after they are created.

Mr. PRICE. Will the gentleman permit me a moment?

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina. My time is limited. It would give me pleasure to yield to my friend, for whom I have great personal regard, if I had the time. "Sambo and Jane, and Sallie and John" were "created equal" with my friend, but somehow my friend has gotten a long way ahead of them. It is true that he has aided "Sallie" by spelling her name S-a-l-l-i-e, but he will not let them stay equal with him. The equality will not "stick." A distinguished friend, who is in the habit of enforcing strong arguments by apt illustrations, tells a story of a man in the early days of the postage-stamp, when prepaid postage was three cents and unprepaid was five cents, and when the adhesive mucilage was not so good as it is now, he found great difficulty in making the stamp adhere to the letter, and, being anxious that his correspondent should know that it was prepaid, he wrote across it, "Paid if the picture sticks." Having created all men equal, will my friend support a juster financial system that will tend to keep them so? Will his equality stick?

But, sir, appeals of a more injurious character have been made to passion and prejudice by the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. BURROWS.] He asks in an impassioned style:

> Should we yield now, how long will it be before upon an appropriation bill for the support of the Post-Office Department a provision will be incorporated excluding from the southern mails, as was done in times of the slave power, all printed matter tending to instruct the colored people in their political rights and responsibilities; and then say to the President, "Sign, or no mails!"

The gentleman is drawing upon a diseased imagination. He will not dare say that any single individual on this side of the House ever suggested or thought of such a thing. Our people are being taxed to their full capacity to educate the colored people equally with the white. In my State, and in all the Southern States, so far as I know, no distinction is made; the school fund is applied pro rata. Again he asks:

> How long before upon an appropriation bill for the support of the judiciary will a provision be incorporated making an appropriation for the payment of slaves and the Supreme Court menaced with starvation to extort from it a decision that the constitutional prohibition was never constitutionally adopted? "Mr. President, sign, or no court."

Like the former, this has no foundation. The intimation that any member on this side, or that any representative man of the democratic party, suggests or contemplates any such purpose would be as unfounded as the suggestion that the gentleman from Michigan could go to heaven with an unforgiving temper.

> From pride, vain-glory, and hypocrisy; from envy, hatred, and malice, and all uncharitableness, good Lord, deliver us.

Again he asks:

> How long before upon some appropriation bill a provision will be attached submitting an amendment to the Constitution abolishing the three great constitutional amendments? "Mr. President, sign, or no support."

Well this has less foundation, if possible, than either of the others. If the gentleman knows anything of the Constitution he ought to know that that instrument cannot be amended in that way. While the questions suggest the change, he cannot find any democrat, who represents any constituency, who ever proposed or thought of proposing such a thing. If I could be so insolent and unjust, I could with as much propriety ask how long will it be before the gentleman from Michigan will commit some great crime—murder, arson, burglary, or larceny—and with more propriety, for these are within the range of his power. He knows that we could not, if we would, do any such thing, and he has not the shadow of warrant or authority for intimating that we would if we could. If the question was asked of any intelligent man in my section, his reply would probably be, "You must take me for a fool, or you are,"—well, I will not say.

It takes two-thirds of Congress and three-fourths of the States to amend the Constitution, and to suggest that there is any danger of such amendments is the suggestion of folly. No one has proposed such amendments. No one that I know of has suggested them.

Again he asks:

> How long before a provision will be incorporated upon some appropriation bill for the re-establishment of slavery?

I think no such attempt will be made until it shall become the interest of republican politicians and Christian statesmen in the republican party, and then it cannot be done; for it requires the consent of three-fourths of all the States, and we will see that the attempt shall not succeed. And so of the other questions propounded by the gentleman. But then his imagination was running at large in fields in which Gulliver would have delighted to roam.

The gentleman from Michigan gave utterance to many harsh expressions calculated to provoke harsh replies, such as:

> It has been stated that your conduct in 1861 was honorable and heroic, meaning I suppose as contrasted with what is now proposed, but I am prepared to characterize the rebellion of 1861 as treason, and your purposes of to-day but little else, and, so far as the South is concerned, an exhibition of the basest ingratitude. Is it fitting for you to smite the hand that fed you and sting the breast that warmed you back to life? Have I exaggerated your purpose?

And he applied to gentlemen on this side such epithets as "co-conspirators." It may suit the gentleman from Michigan to use such language, but we do not intend to be drawn into anger by it. "In vain is the net spread in the presence of any bird." If the gentleman thinks that by his denunciations he is serving any patriotic purpose, I hope he feels better after the discharge; but he cannot be gratified by provoking us to angry words in reply, and if upon calm reflection he can find any consolation in having used them, I can only regret that any constituency should have sent to this Hall one so ignorant of our character, our purposes, and our aims. If he knew us better, it would perhaps humiliate him to know that gentlemen on this side are as ardently devoted to civil liberty, to the Constitution and laws of our country, and to the preservation of free government for all the people of every race and creed in the whole Union as is the gentleman himself, and, by deprecating sectional hatreds and doing all we can to eradicate them, I am sure that we are wiser if not better friends of the Union than they who so constantly appeal to the bloody past to arouse and keep alive sectional strife.

A friend from Alabama tells a story of a little boy who had his smaller brother down and was trying to maul him with his hammer, and because the little fellow at the bottom persisted in pushing him off, he vociferously called on his mother to make his brother "let him alone and behave himself." When the mother inquired what was the matter, he replied, "Johnny won't let me maul him on the head with my hammer." Whether the lamb drinks the water from the brook above or below, the wolf will not be pleased. I sometimes think some of our friends on the other side are like the big brother—sometimes like the wolf.

But, after all, the talk about "starvation and revolution," of which we have heard so much lately, is but the whip-poor-will's flight; it is a cry to deceive. When a trespasser comes near the nest of the whip-poor-will it flutters off and feigns being hurt. I have seen them feign death, and, taught by perfect instinct, act their part in a style which Forrest or Booth could not excel, and which the most accomplished Desdemona of the stage might envy. The republican nest has been disturbed.

Demetrius of old raised a cry lest "the temple of the great goddess Diana should be despised," not because he cared anything for the temple or for the goddess, but he was the manufacturer of idols, and his craft was in danger. Like Demetrius, our republican friends know by what "craft" they have their wealth.

I have been more than once struck by the fact, Mr. Chairman, as others must have been, that sentiments of a united brotherhood, of a restored Union, of kindly feelings, and of justice and equality for all parts of the country, East, West, North, and South, meet with hearty favor and applause on this side of the House. I have been as often pained to hear the bitterest utterances of sectional hate applauded on the other. On this side northern men and southern men, Federal soldiers and confederate soldiers, sit in harmony, and in the spirit of a true brotherhood forget that there has been a family feud. In the temple of liberty which our fathers built for us, we worship together, and the preservation of that temple is our dearest aim and our highest purpose.

Mr. COBB addressed the committee. [His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. Chairman, if this House, as is claimed, has the right to make such conditions in the appropriation of money as it may deem fit and proper, the insertion of sections which are not naturally a part of an appropriation bill, with a view of forcing their passage ought never to be made, whatever precedents may be quoted, unless in cases of direst necessity.

As I do not regard the repeal clauses under discussion as of sufficient immediate necessity to justify their insertion upon this appropriation bill, I shall vote as I voted, and as my party voted upon the political sections in the Army bill, namely, to strike them out. If the House decide to retain them, as in case of similar sections in the Army bill I shall deem it my duty to vote for the appropriation bills, but with no view of forcing executive approval.

As for the merits of these sections as separate propositions, I heartily favor most of them. I, however, question the wisdom of such sweeping curtailments of the duties and powers of the supervisors. The present laws give to the Executive a most dangerous power if he should choose to abuse it, a power that could render an election a mere farce, a power that I am sure the republicans would be unwilling to give a President not of their own party; and if these laws are only satisfactory to the party in power they are unsafe. Indeed, many republican members have stated that they would vote for most of these repeal clauses in a separate bill.

I do not question the right of this Government nor its duty to throw around the ballot-boxes where its officers are to be elected all necessary safeguards; but it is claimed by Representatives from all parts of the country that the powers now granted have already been abused in localities, so far as to practically disfranchise legal voters and change results of elections, and they produce very voluminous proof of this. Again, some sections of the country are extremely restive under what they regard an interference by the General Government in their elections.

We have heard in this debate very much about Louisiana and other localities in the South. I respectfully submit to the republican party that has tried so hard to alarm the country over the proposed repeal of these recent partisan laws whether, if your pictures of things, in Louisiana for example, are correct, this Government is justified in further pursuing your policy of fourteen years in this State. You have experimented with Louisiana in your own way; your test oath, marshals, supervisors, and Army have been applied as counter-irritants for many years; not only that, but you have sent down visiting statesmen to see and prescribe; not only that, but when, notwithstanding all your efforts, the votes did come in wrong, you have doctored them up to suit the necessities of the case; so it was all the same. And yet according to your own story, hell must be better governed than Louisiana. I once knew a boy whose father was overbearing and suspicious; his sharp eye was always on the lad; never trusted him; always complained of him; told him he was bad, whipped him because he was bad; often condemned him to a diet of bread and water, and forever excited his evil nature, until everybody looked askance at the boy and thought he was on the double-quick for perdition. Finally, at eighteen, he ran away among strangers, and for the first time was spoken kindly to and appreciated for what was good in him. Self-respect asserted itself, a feeling of responsibility and manhood came. That which was evil in him lay dormant, and he became an honor to society. You have treated Louisiana about as that deacon treated his boy. Now, for Heaven's sake, as Louisiana cannot run away, take hands off; call her of age; trust her; and see if this experiment will not bring better results. Reverse your policy every way. You contracted the money of the country just at the time Louisiana and other Southern States were coming back into the Union penniless, bereft of everything but their acres, until there was not enough left for the North even, as President Grant stated in his message of 1873, before you converted him.

Now open the doors of business and prosperity to her people and to those of other States as well, by supplying their greatest want, an abundant, reliable circulating medium, not in a way to rob but to enrich them. I say again, reverse your policy that has resulted only in ruin and anarchy. Give to your wayward children a chance to earn their bread, and, well fed, well clad, see if they do not become jewels in your crown.

HUNGER, LIKE RUM, IS THE MOTHER OF CRIME.

If such measures fail, it will then be soon enough to talk of further interference. The echoes of the civil war have filled this House like the thunders of Hades for weeks. Stentorian lungs have proclaimed on one side "You did it!" and the quick echo from the opposite side "You did it!" until we are constrained to say, in the words of another: "Is this unnatural, unnational, un-American war to go on forever?" Is there to be no end?

Abraham Lincoln once said, "Under God this nation shall have a new birth of freedom;" but it is more and more evident that those parties which are unable to lay aside the passions and language of war can never minister at this new birth of freedom. Before me on my right I see gentlemen who distinguished themselves during the war by their bravery, gentlemen whose shoulders a few years since glittered with golden stars, and on my left I see honorable gentlemen whose devotion upon the opposite side won for them equal rank. I observe that on both sides the epaulets and all other traces of the war are dropped from their garments, so their former rank as soldiers is known only to history. Would to God, as you have thrown off outwardly every insignia of war, you had also purged from your hearts all its prejudices and hatreds.

The greatest tribute to Washington was that he was first in peace. I fear there are few among the late military officers now before me over whose ashes it can finally be said: He was not only a brave soldier but distinguished himself equally as a legislator, by his efforts to heal the asperities of war and unify and bring prosperity to our whole country.

No sooner was this unfortunate debate opened than a general on the right [Mr. GARFIELD] charged upon the majority the purpose

TO STARVE THIS GOVERNMENT.

I desire to reply to him and to the many who have reiterated his words, that it comes with a poor grace from him or any representative of his party to charge others with purposes of starvation. I would remind them that their party has brought more American citizens to comprehend the meaning of that terrible word starvation than any other cause in the history of our country. When the friends of Pericles recited his virtues around his deathbed, he interrupted them and said: "You forget the only valuable part of my character. None of my fellow-citizens were ever compelled through any action of mine to assume a mourning-robe." Alas! through the action of your party in legislating for usurers, bankers, and monopolists, you have compelled the whole land to assume a mourning-robe, and starved out more industries, more hopes, more prosperity than any war in the history of the world ever crushed out. I read an item from a New York Tribune of recent date, which is only a sample of such items with which we have become too familiar:

SALE OF A DELAINE FACTORY.

PROVIDENCE, RHODE ISLAND. The manufacturing property of the Atlantic Delaine Company in this city was sold at auction to-day for $300,200. Providence men were the purchasers. The property cost over $2,000,000.

Manufacturing establishments in the East are salable at one-sixth their cost, while starvation wages are paid to the laborers employed, and the army of unemployed, wrecks of republican legislation, are treated as criminals. How fares the West, the great productive West under your legislation? I read from the same Tribune an instructive item:

REDUCTION OF INTEREST IN MINNESOTA.

SAINT PAUL, MINNESOTA.

Both houses of the Legislature have passed a bill reducing the legal rate of interest from 12 per cent. to 10 per cent.

A futile effort of the Minnesota Legislature to protect the men who feed the world from being starved out under your financial legislation that has doubled every debt in the land.

In the district which I have the honor to represent, which is almost purely agricultural, I take from a recent republican paper the statement that ten cows were sold for $2 per head at forced sale. In the same county, one of the most fertile in the United States, well watered, and supplied with railroads, and having as enterprising a people as can be found in the country, the chattel mortgages recorded in 1870 numbered nine, in 1878 they numbered nine hundred and forty, and I learn from letters that the highways are already filling with emigrant wagons, conveying the farmers of the Northwest who are starved out from the richest garden land in the world, a little further West to seek a new home among savages. This is at present the reward of industry in the United States.

But what is the condition of the people here in this District, under the shadow of this Capitol, the most favored spot in the country, for here the General Government expends annually for wages, salaries, &c., about $20,000,000? Forty-five hundred families or about eighteen thousand persons have been kept this winter from starvation by one relief association, the Provident Aid Society, as just reported to me by its president.

The last Congress appropriated $15,000 to fill an old canal in this city, really to give employment to idle, suffering workingmen. Eight thousand promptly applied for work at $1 a day. This appropriation, then, was not sufficient to give two days' work each, to the army of unfortunate sufferers in the streets of Washington, and illustrates the sad results of the starvation policy of the republican party; and I want to remind the republican leaders before me, who are so anxious lest the Government be starved out, that there is a flourishing soup-house on E street where charity feeds hundreds of American citizens daily on broth at a penny a meal that under your long maladministration of the affairs of state are unable to feed themselves and their families, and it would not be an unjust retribution if the Government that has driven the workingmen into soup-houses in a time of abundant harvests and bursting granaries should itself have to TASTE THE SWEETS OF SOUP-HOUSE CHARITY.

"One touch of nature makes the whole world kin." I believe if this happened, the Government would be brought to sympathize at last with the suffering people.

A few years ago our people and press mentioned with pride the constant large arrivals of immigrants in our ports. All were welcome, (though they were poor, ignorant of our customs, and even of our language,) because they were regarded as sturdy recruits to the great army of American laborers, whose mission it was to subdue this vast continent and make it bud and blossom as a rose. We even placed a money value of about $800 upon every one of them, because their labor was thought to be worth that to the country; but how is it now? Any accession of labor is dreaded as an evil. There is so little demand for it that a mechanic or workingman has little more to say about his wages than a slave, even when he can obtain employment, and there is a determination on the part of the States and governors, for the first time in our history, to punish poverty as a crime. Connecticut has just passed a blue law—no, a black law. Here it is:

AN ACT CONCERNING TRAMPS.

Be it enacted by the senate and house of representatives in General Assembly convened:

SECTION 1. Every tramp shall be punished by imprisonment in the State prison not more than one year.

SEC. 2. All transient persons who rove about from place to place begging, and all vagrants living without labor or visible means of support, who stroll over the country without lawful occasion, shall be held to be tramps within the meaning of this act.

SEC. 3. Any act of beggary or vagrancy by any person not a resident of this State shall be prima facie evidence that the person committing the same is a tramp within the meaning of this act.

SEC. 4. Any tramp who shall willfully and maliciously injure any person, where such offense is not now punishable by imprisonment in the State prison, or shall be found carrying any fire-arm or other dangerous weapon, shall be punished by imprisonment in the State prison not more than three years.

SEC. 5. Any sheriff, deputy sheriff, constable, special constable, or policeman, upon view of any offense described in this act, or on speedy information thereof, may without warrant apprehend the offender and take him before any competent authority for examination, and on his conviction shall be entitled to a reward of $5 therefor, to be paid by the State.

SEC. 6. All mayors, wardens, and selectmen are empowered and required to appoint special constables whose duty it shall be to arrest and prosecute all tramps in their respective cities, boroughs, and towns.

SEC. 7. This act shall not apply to any female or minor under the age of sixteen years, nor to any blind person, nor to any beggar roving within the limits of the town in which he resides.

SEC. 8. Upon the passage of this act, the secretary of state shall cause to be printed durable copies of this act to be sent to the several town clerks, who shall cause the same to be posted in at least twelve conspicuous places, six of which shall be in the public highway.

SEC. 9. This act shall take effect on the 28th day of April, 1879.

Approved March 27, 1879.

There is nothing lacking but the blood-hounds and the auction-block to complete this picture; but in place of the hounds we have hired spies, and in place of the auction-block the State pays $5 a head, then farms out her slave labor to the highest bidder. If this act came from a State south of Mason and Dixon's line, every republican paper in the North would print it as indisputable evidence of a determination on the part of the South to at once reinstate slavery. The honorable member from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] who represents the city where this act was passed, condemns with choice rhetoric (?) the men who propose to reverse the policy by which his party has filled the land with tramps. That gentleman is extremely sensitive over extraneous matter upon appropriation bills and the financial theories of the nationals, while his party at home are enacting laws to imprison and disfranchise the poor of his State,

LAWS THAT WOULD MAKE A NERO BLUSH.

The penalty for stealing $15 in Connecticut is $7 fine and thirty days' imprisonment; for asking a crust of bread, if an outsider, it is one year in State prison at hard labor.

A temperate, industrious, and skillful but penniless mechanic came to me in Hartford, Connecticut, and begged me to find him employment in Des Moines, Iowa, saying he would walk out there if I would give him any encouragement. That law would cause his arrest and imprisonment if he should start now; but supposing he could by traveling nights, and stealing food rather than begging, run the gauntlet of Connecticut's spies, the republican governor of Iowa has just issued a proclamation instructing the sheriffs of counties and the mayors of cities to keep a sharp lookout for such men, arrest them and put them to work on stone piles or highways. It is not strange, under the circumstances, that discontent is assuming alarming proportions in this country. There is an unprecedented exodus to the Territories. The western-bound trains are crowded with men from nearly every State, whose hopes have been blasted, whose property has been sunk or snatched from them under unjust laws. Many have fled to Australia and other countries—anywhere to get away. Even the negroes in the South, like northern workingmen, are driven to seek a home on the cold prairies of the West.

The mayor of Saint Louis was so alarmed by the arrival of the first squads of these laborers that he issued a great proclamation to prevent others from coming, and tried to get the river-boats to return these.

The arrival of a few thousand Mongolians upon our western coast, although they are everywhere admitted to be industrious, frugal, and peaceable, has set the nation into a fever of excitement, and we are taking emetics, and possibly will continue to do so, until these unfortunates are spewed out into the suffocating country from whence they came. They come to America for the same purpose as the millions from other lands who have preceded them, namely, to better their condition. Their virtues, such as industry and economy, are regarded as objections and assigned as reasons for driving them hence, because under our laws there is not work enough in this vast undeveloped country for half our American-born laborers; and can we see our own children starve that Asiatics may be fed?

Before we reverse our time-honored policy of open doors and a welcome to all the world, and drive out and shut out foreign labor from our land; before the edict goes forth that "the Chinese must go," let us say to every law that has robbed labor and blasted enterprise, the national banks must go! the national bonds must go! the land monopolist must go! the law that bars out silver from our mints must go! the mountain of idle money in the Treasury must go into the channels of business! the millions that have been absorbed by coin bonds must go out once more to make glad the heart of the toiler and redeem the bonds that bind him hand and foot.

YOU MUST GO FROM THE STATUTE-BOOKS;

When we have accomplished this, if we still find starvation wages and general distress, it will be in order to adopt the ancient civilization of the Chinese and barricade our land with a Chinese wall to keep out foreign laborers; then name our country the American Empire, for it will no longer be a republic. But this latter contingency will never occur under a system of finance adapted to our form of government and to our boundless territory and resources. Under such a system the overflow of other lands could never depress our labor or produce markets, and cause low wages and jealousies. All would be prosperous, and our enterprise and development would become the admiration and wonder of the world.

The determined policy of the republican party has been to fund our debt into coin bonds that cannot be paid for a generation, and to build upon this corner-stone a banking system that for a parallel of injustice to the people and favoritism to a class stands without a rival. What is a Government bond? It is an instrument for taxing the whole people for the support of the holder; an invention for taking from the producer the fruits of his industry, and giving it to a man who is thereby relieved from the necessity of productive labor. It is a scheme for building up an idle, useless class in society, and subordinating this great Government into a tax-gatherer for the benefit of that class.

I do not believe that it is the object or duty or office of this Government to tax the people for one dollar more than is necessary to sustain the Government economically. I for one am unwilling to see it degraded into a machine for building up a class of citizens at the expense of the masses. It is all wrong. It is a form of despotism which should be unknown in a republic. It is but

THE ECHO OF THE SLAVE-DRIVER'S LASH IN OUR LAND.

It is an ingenious, refined system of oppression, and it is bolstered up by cunning appeals to the honor of the robbed; but, torn of its disguises, it will soon be understood by the people in all the length and breadth and depth of its infamy.

Once our fathers were taught of the divine right of kings; they heard it everywhere, in schools, colleges, and churches, but they refused to acknowledge that right, and, after indescribable struggles and sufferings, disproved this axiom of despotism. Next we were taught that slavery was a divine institution. The clergy preached it; the Constitution was construed and laws framed to defend and strengthen it; but the people destroyed it in spite of false teachers and law-makers, in spite of all its intrenchments.

Now we have a new form of despotism as popular as its predecessors. Some preachers are preaching for it. Mr. Joseph Cook, of Boston, threatens revolution rather than see it overthrown. National honor is again appealed to that it may be sustained, and that is your bond scheme; but, gentlemen, false teachers and preachers, cunningly devised laws and refunding acts will never long hold the people in bondage to your latest engine of oppression. You have not only placed many of these bonds, by means of syndicates, in the hands of foreign capitalists and potentates, but by refusing to provide our people with necessary money to carry on their industries and furnishing nearly one-half our currency through national banks, making it enormously expensive to the borrower, you have forced our railroads and all parties that could to borrow money of foreigners rather than at home; so that we have again, as before the Revolution, the privilege of cultivating our fields and manufacturing our products for the benefit of foreigners; of toiling not only to sustain our domestic princes, but also foreign potentates upon their thrones and lords in their palaces. We do not shout

LONG LIVE THE KINGS AND QUEENS,

but toil early and late to sustain them with our choicest products and are tributes under republican rule to the leading despots of the world. Our boasted balance of trade of nearly $300,000,000 per annum does not come to us in coin, but largely in coupons and interest receipts. Last year, with a trade balance of $257,000,000 in our favor, we actually had to send abroad about four millions of coin and bullion to balance up our interest and other accounts. Happy people! hewers of wood and drawers of water to foreigners!

To show the natural results of this foreign-debt policy, I insert an item which I have just clipped from a New York paper:

The Khedive of Egypt and the keen-witted foreigners who raise his revenues have a stern sense of "the sacredness of contracts" that would put our American bondholders to the blush. The Khedive has borrowed immense sums abroad to expend on his pleasures, and now as the French and English bondholders must be satisfied, the "fellahs" are far worse treated than our negro slaves were. The natives from the district around each sugar factory are compelled to abandon work in their own fields and furnish gratuitously the manual assistance needed in the government mills and plantations. The people are driven with whips to their work in the field by men who have not that sense of ownership which in a large degree tempered the cruelty of slavery. In some of the villages the people are past help, sitting naked like wild beasts, eating roots and suffering with the endurance of despair.

The United States Treasury in its long conflict with the enterprise and business of the country has completely triumphed, and after stopping the wheels of industry has mortgaged the future enterprise of the country for a generation with thirty-year bonds, and now asks the people it has robbed to applaud the very results brought about through their losses. As well might Wellington have asked Napoleon to cheer over Waterloo; like the king of Babylon who after breaking down the walls of Jerusalem, destroying its homes, and enslaving the people, then bade them to sing. "They that wasted us, required of us mirth," as the psalmist puts it, but they hung their harps on the willows and refused to sing. So now the men who have wasted the people and robbed them for many years are asking us to sing the triumphs of resumption in the face of our desolated homes and new thirty-year bondage. If we do sing over resumption this will be our song:

"There are ninety and nine, that live and die
In want, and hunger, and cold,
That one may revel in luxury
And be lapped in its silken fold;
The ninety and nine in their hovels bare,
The one in a palace, with riches rare.

They toil in the fields, the ninety and nine,
For the fruits of our mother earth;
They dig and delve in the dusky mine,
And bring her hid treasures forth;
And the wealth released by their sturdy blows
To the hands of the one forever flows.

From the sweat of their brows the desert blooms,
And the forest before them falls.
Their labor has builded humble homes,
And cities with lofty halls;
And the one owns city, and homes, and lands,
And the ninety and nine have empty hands."

The people have no heart for rejoicings; but, instead, their inborn independence will assert itself, and they will break the shackles you have forged for them to wear. They will not long be enslaved. The bonds will be paid, and never again will this Government extort usury of the people. We will pay the last farthing, but paid they shall be—

"But the night, so dreary, and dark, and long,
At last shall the morning bring,
And over the land the victors' song
Of the ninety and nine shall ring,
And echo afar, from zone to zone,
'Rejoice! for labor shall have its own.'"

If you inquire how is Government to raise money in time of war I answer, just as it raises men. You seize a citizen and make a breastwork for bullets of his body, and is the rich man's money any more sacred than the poor man's blood?

The people have been loath to withdraw their confidence from the republican party and believe that it has betrayed them, but the sad experiences through which they are passing, after unceasing promises at every election for years of better times just ahead, are opening their eyes. I have the honor to represent a district which has heretofore been overwhelmingly republican, and I wish I could faintly picture the determination of the people in their demands for relief. It was whispered in many localities by opponents during my canvass that I would fail the people when elected and forget my enthusiasm in their behalf. Repeatedly old men, who had been republicans since the organization of that party, came upon their staffs and told me with trembling voice if I failed them, forgetting their demands, I could never return to them alive.

Do you believe you can smother this fire? Do you believe you can satisfy these outraged citizens by continuing into 1880 your sectional quarrels? I tell you, if you try it, it will not down.

WHAT THE PEOPLE WANT IS BREAD, NOT BLOOD.

When I think of the thousands bereft of home, of employment, of everything that makes life dear, by no fault of theirs, I am amazed at their patient endurance and long suffering; but I advise prudence in your further legislation, and immediate measures of relief to the country. It is wise, and safe as well. Beware! The flight of a bird, the sound of a single human voice, has been known to start the Alpine avalanche.

I appeal to the majority of this House. You are now responsible not only for the measures passed by Congress, but also for any failure of needed legislation. You are watched by fifty millions of people, who have given you your majority because in parts of the country you denounced the ruinous policy of the republican party. How dare you trifle with your pledges to the people? Have you signalized your entry upon this great responsibility by an effort to force through measures of relief for the people? No! Bills to repeal the obnoxious laws that are making a poor-house of this nation? No! no! but, on the contrary, to repeal laws which though objectionable are not responsible for the poverty and suffering of the people, and for one month no bill for their relief was even allowed to be introduced. Dare you face your impoverished constituents after adjourning this House without having prevented the further increase of our bonded debt and provided for its speedy liquidation; without having divorced the national banks from the National Treasury; without having opened wide the mints to the silver mines of the country; without having unlocked the United States Treasury and given back to the people the mountain of idle, useless money in its vaults which they are paying interest upon? If you do, may the Lord have mercy on your souls!

What the people demand, what they will have, is relief, and any party that trifles with this demand, that prefers to resurrect the thrice dead issues of the past rather than to stay the hand of the spoiler that is laying waste the people, will be held responsible for the sufferings of the present and the calamities of the future.

Mr. GILLETTE. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. DE LA MATYR.]

Mr. HENDERSON. Before the gentleman from Iowa takes his seat, I would be glad to ask him a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield?

Mr. GILLETTE. I yield to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. HENDERSON. The gentleman has stated here that the republican party, as a party, was responsible for the contraction of the currency and the starvation of the people. I want to ask him if he does not know that immediately following the conclusion of the war a resolution was adopted by this House, and voted for by democrats as well as republicans, showing it to be the universal sense of all parties and of the country that there should be a contraction of the currency in order to prepare for a resumption of specie payments, and that the contraction of which he complains was made in pursuance of this resolution under the administration of Andrew Johnson while Mr. McCulloch was Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. GILLETTE. My friend from Indiana complains that I am yielding too much of the time which I promised to him. But I will answer the question of the gentleman from Illinois. I hold that the party which has the majority in the House of Representatives and the Senate of the United States and whose Executive sits in the presidential chair is responsible for the legislation of the country.

Mr. HENDERSON. I wish to ask the gentleman another question.

Mr. GILLETTE. I am not here to apologize for hard-money democrats any more than to approve of what has been done by the republican party.

Mr. HENDERSON. I wish to ask the gentleman if he believes that the payment of the public debt of the country is in any just sense a contraction of the currency?

Mr. GILLETTE. The gentleman from Indiana to whom I have yielded the balance of my time refuses to yield further.

Mr. DE LA MATYR addressed the committee. Before he concluded,

Mr. REAGAN said. It is almost twelve. I move that the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana has seven minutes of his time remaining.

[The remarks of Mr. DE LA MATYR were resumed when the House next resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. See page 816.]

The motion that the committee rise was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BLACKBURN reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 2) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at eleven o'clock and fifty-nine minutes a. m.) the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a communication from the Paymaster-General, calling attention to certain deficiencies in the appropriations for the pay of professors at the Military Academy for the years 1878, 1879, and 1880, and in the appropriation for the cadets at the Academy for the year 1879; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented the memorial of the United States Internal Revenue Store-keepers' Association of the first and third districts of Ohio, the sixth district of Kentucky, and the fourth district of Indiana, remonstrating against a clause of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, now pending in the House of Representatives, reducing their salaries; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the memorial of F. S. Stumbaugh and L. F. Eggers, of Kansas, presenting additional reasons why there should be an investigation into the election of Hon. JOHN J. INGALLS as Senator from the State of Kansas; which was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. VEST presented a resolution of the Legislature of Missouri; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands; as follows:

Whereas the conditions have not been complied with and said lands are yet withdrawn from the market: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Missouri as follows:

That our Senators in Congress be directed and our Representatives be requested to use their efforts and influence in securing the passage of an act donating to the State of Missouri said lands, that the State may offer the same for sale, and apply the proceeds of the sale of said lands to the payment of certain bonds issued in aid of said Iron Mountain Railroad.

Second. That the Secretary of State be directed to furnish each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress with a copy of this preamble and resolution.

Approved April 18, 1879.

MICHAEL R. McGRATH,
Secretary of State.

Mr. INGALLS presented the petition of George W. Parris, praying for arrears of pensions; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

MRS. CAROLINE S. WEBSTER.

Mr. DAWES. I have in my hand the petition of Caroline S. Webster, of Marshfield, Massachusetts. The circumstances attending this petition and the nature of its prayer are so peculiar that, with the indulgence of the Chair, I will state them as they appear in this memorial.

Mrs. Webster is the widow of the late Colonel Fletcher Webster, of Marshfield, the son of Daniel Webster. While Mr. Webster himself spent his entire life in the civil service of his country, entering the lower House of Congress in 1813, and with scarce any interruption closing it as Secretary of State in 1852, his two sons gave their lives to their country in the military service of the Government. His youngest son volunteered his services and gave his life in the war with Mexico. He had left only one son. Mr. Webster himself died in 1852 and left this son, the only one, to bear his name to posterity.

Colonel Fletcher Webster held various civil positions with honor, and gave promise of distinction. Early, however, in the war of the rebellion, as early as April, 1861, he, following the example of his brother, volunteered his services to the Government, and at the head of a Massachusetts regiment entered the service of the United States, and, serving with distinction, fell at the head of his regiment in 1862. Thus passed away all of the male members of the family. His widow with her children went to the homestead in Marshfield, and from that time devoted herself to the care of the papers and valuables that Mr. Webster left for his country in their old homestead at Marshfield, depending upon such means of support as she was able to obtain from that estate. In April of last year, by an incendiary fire, the homestead at Marshfield was consumed, and with it everything of value in it to the country and to the family, with the exception of a few pictures and some things of minor value, leaving Mrs. Fletcher Webster without any other support than the pension of $30 a month which had been granted her by Congress. She now prays Congress to increase that pension to $50 a month.

Under all the circumstances connected with the history of the name, as well as the services of her husband, for which she was granted the pension originally, and the fact that she is reduced by these casualties to want and dependence, it does not seem unreasonable that the prayer of her petition be granted. It is accompanied by a bill which I ask may be read twice at this time, if no one objects, and that both the petition and the bill be referred to the Committee on Pensions, who I trust will find ample ground for granting the prayer of her petition.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 484) for the relief of Mrs. Caroline S. Webster; and it was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, if my honorable friend who sits in front of me [Mr. EDMUNDS] was not in the habit of objecting to having anything passed by unanimous consent without a reference, I would ask that that bill should be put upon its passage; and if I thought I should be sustained in it I would move that the pension be made a hundred dollars a month. We voted a pension of $3,000 per annum for life to the widow of Mr. Lincoln. We voted a pension of $2,000 per annum for life to the widow of Admiral Farragut.

The petitioner whose name is now before us is the surviving representative of all that there was of the name of Webster. She represents two heroes, as my friend has said, who sacrificed their lives in war for their country. She represents and inherits all that Mr. Webster has done for the country. I believe myself that the great mass of the American people, North and South, and East and West, would hold up both their hands in approbation of a unanimous vote in Congress to the effect I have suggested. I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be passed in that form.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I think I must fulfill the mission that the Senator behind me has imputed to me, and say that the bill should go to a committee. The bill that we passed to grant a pension to Mrs. Lincoln went to a committee and was duly considered. I think the people of the United States, although they are very grateful in the respects my friend has mentioned, also have a great interest in the orderly and deliberate progress of legislation. Therefore adhering to what has been stated of me I think the bill ought to go to a committee in the regular way.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill cannot be considered at this time.

Mr. DAWES. May I add, although the disposition seems to be nearly unanimous in the Senate not to do general business, that the committee will ask the Senate to make this case an exception if they find it, as I have no doubt they will, a proper bill to report, and that the Senate, whatever may be their disposition as to general legislation, will make this bill an exception.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill has been referred to the Committee on Pensions.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. JOHNSTON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 485) giving the consent of the United States to the prosecution of the suit of G. W. Custis Lee for the recovery of Arlington on certain conditions; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. TELLER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 486) to provide for the payment of Joseph H. Jenkins for services rendered by him as clerk to the secretary of the Territory of Colorado; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. PADDOCK asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 487) to provide for the appointment of an additional circuit judge in the eighth judicial circuit; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 488) supplemental to an act entitled "An act for the apportionment of Representatives to Congress among the several States according to the ninth census;" which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. PLUMB asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 489) for the relief of James P. Worrell; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BOOTH asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 490) in relation to certain fees allowed registers and receivers; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. LOGAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 491) for the relief of Cyrus Thomas, disbursing agent of the United States Entomological Commission; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 492) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to issue $10,000,000 of 4 per cent. bonds for the payment of arrearages of pensions; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SAULSBURY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 493) directing the removal of obstructions from the harbor at the Delaware breakwater; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. HILL, of Georgia, it was Ordered, That Mrs. Fannie A. Thompson have leave to withdraw her papers from the files of the Secretary of the Senate relating to the bill of last session for the relief of the heirs of General William Thompson.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 1343) to provide for certain expenses of the present session of Congress, and for other purposes; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. No. 218) changing the name of the National Bank of Commerce of Cincinnati, Ohio, to the National Lafayette and Bank of Commerce of Cincinnati, Ohio; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the Chair be authorized to fill the vacancy in the Committee on the District of Columbia occasioned by the resignation of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES.]

The motion was agreed to; and the President pro tempore appointed Mr. PADDOCK to fill the vacancy.

APPOINTMENT AND REMOVAL OF SENATE EMPLOYÉS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there are no concurrent and other resolutions the next business in order is the resolution offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALLACE] on the 17th instant, to amend the standing order of the Senate in regard to the appointment and removal of the employés of the Senate, the pending question on which is the last amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.] The Senator from Vermont moved to add to the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. PENDLETON,] which was adopted, what will now be reported.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

But no officer or employé of the Senate who served in the forces of the United States in suppressing the late rebellion shall be removed except for cause stated in writing to the President of the Senate and approved by him in writing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the Senate ready for the question?

Mr. ANTHONY. I call for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I believe the question is on agreeing to the amendment that I had the honor to offer yesterday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes, sir.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to say upon that subject that I think the remarks made yesterday in opposition to it, as an undue limitation upon the power of these officers, are not well founded in the respect that it was said it never existed before. The rule as it stood before, and as it stands now, until the proposition adopted yesterday shall become the law of the Senate, was that no employé could be removed without the assent of the President of the Senate. Now the majority of the Senate proposes to withdraw that conservative and controlling power from the President of the Senate and leave it absolutely in the discretion of the Secretary and of the Sergeant-at-Arms. The time has come, then, for putting on this limitation to preserve from removal, except for just cause, the two or three soldiers referred to in the amendment I have offered.

The objection, therefore, does not apply at all that this thing was never done before. It was never necessary to do it before, because the rule applied to them and to everybody else; nobody could be removed. But the Senate seems determined to have everybody removed at the wish of the Secretary and the Sergeant-at-Arms, or perhaps, as I suspect, against their wish but according to the wish of the people who want places. Now is the time to provide that these soldiers shall not be crowded out by mere place-hunters, and if they are to go out they are to go out for a reason that is satisfactory to the President of the Senate.

That is the state of the case, Mr. President, and that is the question we are to vote upon.

Mr. WALLACE. Mr. President, so much has been said upon the subject of the binding effect of this rule and of the fact of its not being broken during a period of twenty-five years, that I have taken some pains to look at what the record shows upon that subject.

This order was adopted as a standing order of the Senate on the 15th of July, 1854. Then there was a democratic Senate, and it so continued until there came a republican Senate in 1861, when the first movement was to elect a republican Secretary of the Senate. Mr. Asbury Dickins was the Secretary of the Senate, and Mr. John W. Forney was elected his successor, five Senators voting for Mr. Asbury Dickins, four for another gentleman, and the republicans as a body voting for Mr. John W. Forney. That was on the 15th of July, 1861. Mr. Dickins had not died; Mr. Dickins did not die until October, 1861. He was in full life and was voted for by a part of the minority on this floor. In 1868 Mr. Forney resigned, and at that time Mr. Gorham was elected. Mr. Dickins came into office in 1853; he was elected on the 17th of March, 1853. I find that on the 15th of July, 1854, this standing order was adopted, about the repeal of part of which there is so much complaint. I find that on the 16th of March, 1860, another order was adopted, which was in these words:

Resolved, That any vacancies now existing, or which shall hereafter occur, in the places of messengers of the Senate, by death, resignation, removal, or otherwise, such vacancy so existing or occurring shall not be filled by the appointment of other messengers until it is so ordered by the Senate.

That was adopted by a democratic Senate on that day. It remained the order of the Senate until the 12th of July, 1861, when a republican Senate having come in, Mr. Hale, the chairman of the republican caucus, proposed to repeal it. He said, on the 12th of July, 1861:

I offer the following resolution; and if there be no objection, I ask for its present consideration:

"Resolved, That the resolution of the Senate of March 16, 1860, in relation to the appointment of Senate messengers be, and the same is hereby, repealed."

Following this, on the 19th of July following, on page 206 of the Congressional Globe, I find that a resolution was adopted in these words:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized to fill any vacancy in the office of messenger of the Senate now existing or hereafter occurring by removal, resignation, or otherwise.

This is the form of the standing order of the Senate so far as messengers are concerned and this I find no repeal of. It remains to-day, so far as my examination goes, as the standing order of the Senate upon that subject, Thus the messengers are absolutely now under the control of the Sergeant-at-Arms.

I have taken some pains to look as to the truth of the boast that there were no changes made in 1861, or since. I find that on the 30th of September, 1861, the regular pay-rolls show fifty-three employés of the Senate. Of these seven died in service and there were six of the others on the rolls in January, 1879. So that there were from 1861 of these ancient officers remaining on the rolls in January, 1879, of the fifty-three but six. Take the six and add them to the seven who died in the service and we have thirteen, which take from the fifty-three leaves forty rotated out of office because other and new Senators had come into place here and their special friends needed place.

I take then the pay-roll of June 30, 1869, and contrast it with the pay-roll of January, 1879. I find that the total number of officers on the pay-roll in June, 1869, was sixty-nine; that there were remaining in service in January, 1879, but twenty-one of these. So that in the less than ten years which elapsed between June, 1869, and January, 1879, forty-eight men were rotated out of office as the result of the boasted practice.

This is in actual practice the effect of republican standing by this rule, the standing order of the Senate. These facts are shown by the pay-rolls of the Senate. Let us see further. In 1853 one D. R. McNair was elected Sergeant-at-Arms of this body. He came from the State of Kentucky. In 1854 this standing order was adopted. Mr. D. R. McNair was then Sergeant-at-Arms and remained so until a republican Senate came here on the 5th of July, 1861, when a caucus of republican Senators met and resolved to remove Mr. D. R. McNair, and to put in his place another gentleman, Mr. George T. Brown, of Illinois. Mr. Hale, the then chairman of the republican caucus, came into the Senate and moved that Mr. George T. Brown be elected Sergeant-at-Arms. He was elected by a party vote of 29 to 9. Was Mr. McNair in sympathy with the rebellion? He did not go with the South. He came originally from Kentucky, but after 1853 he lived here, and he died in this District. They wanted him removed for a party cause and for nothing else.

Let us see what the record shows on this subject. On page 10 of the Congressional Globe of 1861, under date of July 5, I find Mr. Hale moving the election thus:

Resolved, That the Senate do now proceed to the election of a Sergeant-at-Arms and Doorkeeper.

The resolution was agreed to.

The result was:

Mr. George T. Brown received 29 votes; Mr. D. R. McNair, 9; Mr. George Brown, 2; Mr. R. Beale, 1.

George T. Brown, having received a majority of the whole number of votes, was declared elected Sergeant-at-Arms and Doorkeeper.

Then Mr. Hale said:

I offer the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate pay out of the contingent fund of the Senate to D. R. McNair, late Sergeant-at-Arms, an amount equal to the salary of Sergeant-at-Arms from the 5th of July instant until the first Monday of December next."

He follows it with this statement:

Mr. President, I will let that lie over until to-morrow, but I beg the indulgence of the Senate to make a single statement about it. At the last time of the election of a Sergeant-at-Arms by the Senate, when Mr. McNair was chosen, a similar resolution to this was passed in favor of the retiring Sergeant, Mr. Beale, except that Mr. Beale's salary was paid to the close of the fiscal year. But for this extraordinary session of the Senate, Colonel McNair's salary would continue until next December without any further interference of the Senate. As an act of justice and courtesy to Mr. McNair, who is removed without any cause affecting his moral character, to say the least of it, and whose intercourse with the Senate, so far as I know, has been pleasant, courteous, and gentlemanly, I have thought it due to him to offer this resolution; and that the Senate may not vote on it by surprise, let it lie over until to-morrow. I give notice that I shall call it up to-morrow morning.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I know that the Senator from New Hampshire never does an act without cause. I should like to ask him the reason why it was necessary to remove Colonel McNair at all. We have seen a good officer removed, no objection made to him, no reason assigned for that removal. Perhaps the Senator knows of some good cause; if so, we ought to be informed of it.

Mr. HALE. If the Senator from Delaware will tell me why the State of Delaware superseded Mr. Comegys, and sent him here, perhaps I may inform him.

Thus squarely, as I think, putting the proposition upon party causes and the necessity for party change. Now I come to the 6th of August, 1861. Let us see what occurred there. On page 450 of the Congressional Globe of that year I find a resolution came back to the Senate. It had gone to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. That resolution as offered was:

That there be paid out of the contingent fund, to Asbury Dickins, the late Secretary of the Senate, a sum equal to one year's salary as Secretary and disbursing officer, to mark the sense of the Senate of the long and faithful services of the said Asbury Dickins as Secretary.

What follows?

Mr. CHANDLER. Is it in order to move a further amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is still in order.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move to add, "and the late Sergeant-at-Arms, D. R. McNair." If we are going to be so liberal, I want to do justice to all around.

Upon that question there came a vote. Mr. Bingham opposed it and it was defeated by yeas 9, nays 27. It came up again on the motion of Senator Johnson, of Tennessee, subsequently and it was objected to, and it went over by reason of the adjournment of the extra session, and was not adopted.

Thus we have Mr. D. R. McNair, the Sergeant-at-Arms, removed, and Mr. George T. Brown elected under the leadership of the chairman of the republican caucus. No man had aught to say against his loyalty. The reverse of that is true; the record shows that the reverse of it is true.

Then when we come to 1869, when there had come a new President to the White House, Mr. Grant, on the 4th of March, this body had filled up with new Senators and there was another caucus held. Of that caucus the present chairman of the caucus of the republican party was chairman, and, following its orders, he came into this body on the 22d of March and made this motion:

Mr. ANTHONY. I rise to a privileged question. I move that the Senate proceed to the election of Sergeant-at-Arms.

The motion was agreed to.

There was then an election, and John R. French, of North Carolina, was elected. There was no ballot.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move that the Senate now proceed to the election of executive clerk.

The motion was agreed to.

And the executive clerk was then elected. He was Mr. John M. Morris, of South Carolina, Mr. John R. French, of North Carolina, having been elected Sergeant-at-Arms. Then there comes another motion:

Mr. CONKLING. I move that the Senate proceed to the election of a Congressional Printer, and for a particular reason I offer a resolution on the subject, which will explain itself:

"Resolved, That the Senate now proceed to the election of a Congressional Printer, and that such election shall take effect from and after the 15th of April proximo."

Mr. Defrees was rotated out of office and Mr. Almon M. Clapp was elected Congressional Printer. This was on the 22d of March, 1869; and it is reasonable and fair to presume that it came from a caucus of the republican party, because there was a caucus held then, and because the chairman of that caucus made the motion to make two of the changes.

Between March 31, 1869, and June 30, 1869, there are found on the pay-rolls these changes: The principal clerk on the 31st of March was H. Ware, on the 30th of June, J. H. Flagg. The executive clerk was Mr. Clarke on the 31st of March, and Mr. Morris on the 30th of June. The Sergeant-at-Arms was Mr. Brown on the 31st of March, and on the 30th of June Mr. French. The Chaplain was Mr. Gray on the 31st of March, and Mr. Newman on the 30th of June of the same year.

Now let us trace the record as to the executive clerk; let us go beyond the Sergeant-at-Arms and see how that was. On the 8th of December, 1855, one Joseph H. Nicholson, of Maryland, was appointed executive clerk of this body. He was not in complicity with the rebellion in 1861. He was the friend of Reverdy Johnson. He was made executive clerk of the Senate by a resolution, and remained such until the 19th of March, 1861, when, in pursuance of a caucus, Mr. Hale, the chairman of the republican caucus, moved to repeal the resolution that elected Mr. Nicholson, which was passed on the 8th of December, 1855, and which is found on page 1471 of the Globe of that year. He offered a resolution to that end, and it was laid over for the present. The effect of the repeal of that resolution would have been to turn Mr. Nicholson out of his office. What does he do? On the 4th of July succeeding, under this pressure, Mr. Nicholson resigned, he went out of office; and then on the 9th of July, 1861, Mr. De Witt C. Clarke, of Vermont, was elected executive clerk of the body. Mr. Clarke remained in office until the 22d of March, 1869. No man ever accused him of disloyalty, but then Mr. Clarke was removed and Mr. John M. Morris, of South Carolina, was elected.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. WALLACE. For a question.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is the Senator sure that Mr. Clarke was removed?

Mr. WALLACE. I only know that Mr. Clarke seems to have been removed, because the vote upon the record shows that Mr. Clarke was not in office, for Mr. Morris was elected. There is no resignation to the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will state to the Senator that Mr. Clarke was removed by a power greater even than the democratic caucus, and that was by the hand of death.

Mr. WALLACE. I think the Senator from Vermont is mistaken. Mr. John M. Morris, the subsequent executive clerk, died and Mr. Young took his place; but DeWitt C. Clarke was removed, as my information goes, because he said here that he did not believe a two-thirds vote could be obtained to impeach Andrew Johnson.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. Clarke died just about that time; I do not know whether he was removed; but he certainly died.

Mr. WALLACE. Mr. Clarke went out of office and Mr. Morris, of South Carolina, as the Globe shows, was elected in his stead. Mr. Morris died and Mr. James R. Young, who has recently gone out of office, was elected in his stead.

Now, take the assistant doorkeeper. I find, in 1845, Isaac Holland, assistant doorkeeper. He remained in office until 1858 when Charles S. Jones was elected by a democratic Senate. He remained here until 1861, when, on the 6th of July, in the morning, a caucus was held and Mr. Isaac Bassett, the present assistant doorkeeper, was nominated, and elected by the Senate on the same day, on motion of Mr. Hale, chairman of republican caucus. From the place of messenger at the main door Captain Bassett was promoted to the place of assistant doorkeeper, in pursuance of a caucus held, and Mr. Jones, who never went into secession, who is living here to-day, a man of good character, was removed. On that day Mr. Hale, the chairman of the republican caucus, came into the Senate and moved the election of Mr. Bassett, and there was another party vote, a strict party vote, of thirty republicans to ten democrats. As a proof that Mr. Jones was not disloyal, if any were needed, the fact is that he was confirmed by the Senate to a place in the Army, within three months after his removal from the place of assistant doorkeeper of the Senate. He obtained that place, as I understand, and I have no doubt is the fact, through the solicitation of Ex-President Johnson, who was then a Senator in this body.

From July, 1861, to December, 1861, all the employés of the Secretary of the Senate in that office, as I am informed, were removed but five, and of the employés of the Sergeant-at-Arms's office all but two, as I am told, (Titcomb and Gorman,) were removed; and none of these went South or joined in complicity with the rebellion but two—Price and Latruite. The most of these dismissed men found employment in the Departments. They did not go South; they were not put into employment in the southern confederacy; but they were, most of them, put into employment here, or obtained other avenues of employment.

This is not all, sir. Between July, 1861, and December, 1861, when this clean sweep was made in which all the employés of the Secretary of the Senate but five and every employé of the Sergeant-at-Arms's office but two were swept out, every page of the Senate but two was swept out of the body, and when the Senate met in December, 1861, it had but two of the old pages. Nay, sir, the police and the restaurant-keeper were turned out of their places, as I am credibly informed by gentlemen upon whose statements I think I can rely.

There was then, sir, a condition of things under which if the party in power saw fit to make these changes it did not need to have this standing order changed, for of course if the caucus said, "We want to have these changes made," the Vice-President would accede to them. I assume that the Vice-President being in accord with the party in power, the caucus in accord with the party who desired to have a change made, would accede of course to the removals that the Senators coming in desired to make.

New conditions make new necessities, and there is not such a condition of things here now as there was then. I point to 1861 and 1869 for the proof of the necessity for this action as given to us by the republican organization. They have done precisely what is proposed to be done by us, and the necessity for the change in this rule is to my mind plain and clear. It should be done even in courtesy to the wishes of the Vice-President himself, for of course he does not want to aid in carrying out that which I suppose he and every Senator on the other side will admit is what his party should do.

It is said that the Secretary of the Senate has removed a soldier, a wounded soldier. I was somewhat surprised yesterday at the statement of the Senator from New York, [Mr. CONKLING.] I had heard nothing of the kind. I believe the official named was in the Union service. He went in as a musician. He was not wounded, he was discharged because of a diseased condition of the body. That disease was hernia. That is the history, I believe, of that case. This information comes to me of course from those whom I assume know it. I know nothing of it personally. I simply give it as I get it. If this be the instance on which the case of our friends is hung, if this is the class of soldiers to be protected, a different opinion prevails with them from that which prevails with us. We have no intention, as I said yesterday, and as I now repeat, and I think the Sergeant-at-Arms and the Secretary will vindicate the assertion, to remove any wounded soldier who is in service in or about the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I am not surprised that the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania has taken pains to discuss everything except the amendment that I have offered, which he has studiously avoided saying a word about, because he is too sensible not to see that nothing can be said in opposition to it justly, and he goes back to endeavor to vindicate the action that the Senate took in respect of two of its principal officers a month ago, as if he was not satisfied with that performance at that time, and has come in with a codicil to the will of the democratic caucus to explain the motive for changing the programme. That may be perfectly satisfactory to the Senator.

He says that in 1861 the party in the majority here turned out a good many officers, and that they did not assign any definite cause for it, and that now changed conditions make a change of necessities. If the Senator means by that to say that the changed condition of things is that we are back again exactly where we stood before the action of 1861 in all respects, then I can see the force of it, and I suppose that is what he does hold and mean. That is the tendency of his argument.

Mr. WALLACE. The Senator will permit me.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, sir.

Mr. WALLACE. I mean simply by the changed condition, that we have now a democratic Senate and a republican Vice-President.

Mr. EDMUNDS. In 1860 we had a democratic Senate; I believe it did not cease to be democratic until 1861, and it ceased then, as the Senator knows, under circumstances that I am sorry to have him allude to, to rake up the unhappy memories of that time—very sorry indeed. I think if he had been in the Senate at that time he would have endeavored to be very sure that those officers of the Senate who were entitled to have knowledge of its confidential proceedings should be above the possibility of any suspicion of complicity with or sympathy with the other side—I will not use the harsh and unpopular expression that he did, "rebellion," but I will say "the other side." I think the Senator would, not on party grounds, but on the grounds of his country, as it appears to me; and sometimes, Mr. President, there is a difference between party and country, as has been observed at times, I will not say in connection with the party that the honorable Senator is the leader of in the course of its history in the last twenty years. I will not say that—I might transgress the proprieties of this body—but I will say in a general way that it has sometimes happened in the history of some countries that there was a wide difference between a party and the country.

And so the justification for this performance is found in the fact that in the period of 1861, which I need not waste your time or that of the Senate in describing, there was considerable of a sweep of the officers who were connected with the confidential operations of this body, and for obvious reasons, reasons that would commend themselves to the gentlemen even who left their seats and went away to fight on the other side—not reasons of party but reasons of security to the country—and that is made the justification, and the only justification, for the changes that are proposed now.

If the majority of this body has reason to believe that any of these employés or that the Secretary and the Sergeant-at-Arms who have gone, are inimical to the unity, the prosperity, and interest of their country, then, by all means, they ought to go, and I rather think that the Vice-President, or the President of the Senate, (if there be a difference, as likely in point of law there is,) could be brought, either or both of them, to agree to that proposition. But no such intimation is made, of course. It is stated on all hands that all of these employés are persons faithful, competent, diligent, respectable, not talking about the views of Senators whether they agree with theirs or not, but attending to their business. That is the universal testimony, I believe, upon all sides of the Chamber. If there are any exceptions, let those exceptions be acted upon.

That is the state of the case; and in respect of the changes that took place subsequently the Senator will see that they were not such changes as he now avows, changes for political considerations, because it was members of the same political party all the time that were removed or required to resign, and others of the same political party took their places. There was cause—people like to be tender about such things, very properly—there was in many of these instances, some within my own knowledge since I have been here, a good cause for the change, in respect of the better administration of the office. In many of the instances the change is to be accounted for in that way; and yet the Senator seems to be extremely anxious to prove that in 1861 the republican party was just as bad, set a bad example which is now to be followed. But as I said, Mr. President, in respect of the propriety of changing the Secretary and the Sergeant-at-Arms, that is a matter that has long gone by. It is a matter which we have not brought into this discussion at all. The question now is whether when we change a rule which prevents any removals without the assent of the President of the Senate into a rule which allows any removal to be made at the mere will of the Sergeant-at-Arms or Secretary as the case may be, we shall submit to their sole and personal power the removal of these Union soldiers, there being, I believe, two or three or four; I do not know how many, perhaps five or six.

That is the question, and that is the question which the Senator has not discussed. The Senator is mistaken, however, I will say in my opinion, with great deference to him, in respect of the power of the Sergeant-at-Arms under the present rule to remove messengers. The resolution that he read provided for the appointment by the Sergeant-at-Arms of messengers wherever there was a removal or a resignation or a death, &c.; but that did not confer on him the power to create a vacancy by a removal. The standing order of the Senate was that a removal could not be made without the assent of the President. This new resolution did not affect that. I submit that to the consideration of my honorable friend. That being the state of the case, he does not make any headway in respect to the power of the Sergeant-at-Arms by a reference to that old resolution which authorized him to fill vacancies. It appears that in 1860 the Senate thought that vacancies should be left unfilled because they thought the force was too large, I suppose. Afterward when the great business of the war made a heavy increase of duties of all kinds then the Senate ordered that those vacancies might be filled up. That is all there was to it.

But, Mr. President, I did not rise to delay the passage of this resolution, which is foreordained of course, by any remarks of mine, but only to correct, in connection with what the Senator has said, the misapprehension which he appears to labor under and which it may be that he would lead the Senate to labor under as to the history of this affair. Mr. Asbury Dickins was not turned out of office. An assistant being appointed to act for him and to use his name, &c., they could not get on well together, and at his own request the Senate elected a Secretary in his place. It was not in any sense either a political removal or any other, and he was paid a long time in advance, though that, perhaps, has nothing to do with the point. He was not removed by a change in politics in the Senate at all; he was removed at his own request because of his physical inability to perform any duty whatever connected with the administration of the office.

So, then, Mr. President, there never has been a time yet since the resolution and order of 1854 passed without distinction of party in a Senate that was then composed of a democratic majority, when there has been any violation of that rule in any of the years that the honorable Senator has spoken of except in 1861, when, as I say, it was country and not party that led to taking the utmost precautions in respect to the confidential proceedings of the Senate.

Mr. ANTHONY. I take the liberty to correct my friend from Pennsylvania in regard to Mr. Dickins, Secretary of the Senate, who, he says, was removed when he was in full life. He was hardly in full life. He was upon the bed of sickness; the bed of death; and he had requested that he might be relieved from the office. An assistant secretary, a democrat, Mr. Hickey, was appointed to act with him and act for him; but the two did not agree very well. Mr. Dickins was incapable of performing the duties of the office himself by reason of the infirmities of age, and he was unwilling to delegate them to his assistant; and the result was that, at his request, the Senate went into an election of Secretary; and a provision was made for Mr. Dickins, which lasted after his death. His salary was paid for a year, and he died within the year.

The other removals of elective officers to which the Senator has referred were made for cause. I do not desire to allude to them here, but they were made for cause. The Sergeant-at-Arms was removed for reasons not affecting his moral character at all, but for cause. The change in the Public Printer's case was largely due to an unfortunate difference between him and a distinguished Senator now dead. In the political controversies of Indiana, remarks had been made by the man holding the office of Public Printer upon the Senator which were distasteful to him; but I am happy to say that before the Senator died a complete reconciliation took place.

The executive clerk, Mr. Nicholson, was a disloyal man. My recollection is that he resigned. I think he resigned. At all events, he was in full sympathy with the rebellion, and it was manifestly improper that such a man should remain in confidential relations with the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour has expired.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 1343) to provide for certain expenses of the present session of Congress, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes.

Mr. WITHERS. Before the debate is resumed upon the Army bill I wish to state that it is the desire of the Appropriations Committee that this bill shall be disposed of before the Senate adjourns to-day, and I hope that it will be the pleasure of the Senate to sustain the committee in this purpose and secure its accomplishment.

Mr. ANTHONY. I would suggest to the Senator from Virginia that we fix a time to-morrow, by unanimous consent, when the vote shall be taken.

Mr. WITHERS. I made that effort yesterday without success, and I think now we shall arrive at a conclusion more speedily by determining that we shall have a vote upon the bill before we adjourn.

Mr. ANTHONY. Suppose we try it for to-morrow; say to-morrow at two o'clock?

Mr. WITHERS. If unanimous consent be given that the vote may be taken upon the whole bill and the amendments at two o'clock to-morrow, and the subject finally disposed of, so far as I am concerned I will not insist on a vote to-day.

Some Senators were heard to say "I object."

Mr. WITHERS. Objection is made, and therefore we must go on.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. WALLACE in the chair.) There is no amendment pending to the Army appropriation bill.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, during the last fiscal year the amount of national taxes paid into the Treasury was $234,831,461.77. Of this sum one hundred and thirty million and a fraction was collected under tariff laws as duties on imported merchandise, and one hundred and four million and a fraction as tax on American productions. Of this total of $235,000,000 in round numbers, twenty-seven States which adhered to the Union during the recent war paid $221,204,268.88. The residue came from eleven States. I will read their names: Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, Virginia. These eleven States paid $13,627,192.89. Of this sum more than six million and a half came from the tobacco of Virginia. Deducting the amount of the tobacco-tax in Virginia, the eleven States enumerated paid $7,125,462.60 of the revenues and supplies of the Republic.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Will the Senator from New York allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CONKLING. If the Senator thinks that two of us are needed to make a statement of figures I will.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. Two no doubt can make it better.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. CONKLING. After the expressed opinion of the Senator from Georgia that the statement needs his aid, I cannot decline.

Mr. HILL, of Georgia. I will not interrupt the Senator if it is disagreeable to him, I assure him. I ask if in the computation he has made of the amount paid he does not ascribe to the States that adhered to the Union, to use his language, all——

Mr. CONKLING. Having heard the Senator so far, I must ask him to desist.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York declines to yield further.

Mr. CONKLING. I have stated certain figures as they appear in the published official accounts: the Senator seems about to challenge the process or system by which the accounts are made up. I cannot give way for this, and must beg him to allow me to proceed with observations which I fear to prolong lest they become too wearisome to the Senate.

The laws exacting these few millions from eleven States, and these hundreds of millions from twenty-seven States, originated, as the Constitution requires all bills for raising revenue to originate, in the House of Representatives. They are not recent laws. They have been approved and affirmed by succeeding Congresses. The last House of Representatives and its predecessor approved them, and both these Houses were ruled by a democratic Speaker, by democratic committees, and by a democratic majority. Both Senate and House are democratic now, and we hear of no purpose to repeal or suspend existing revenue laws. They are to remain in full force. They will continue to operate and to take tribute of the people. If the sum they exact this year and next year, shall be less than last year, it will be only or chiefly because recent legislation favoring southern and tobacco-growing regions has dismissed twelve or fourteen million of annual tax on tobacco.

This vast revenue is raised and to be raised for three uses. It is supplied in time of severe depression and distress, to pay debt inflicted by rebellion; to pay pensions to widows, orphans, and cripples made by rebellion; and to maintain the Government and enforce the laws preserved at inestimable cost of life and treasure.

It can be devoted to its uses in only one mode. Once in the Treasury, it must remain there useless until appropriated by act of Congress. The Constitution so ordains. To collect it, and then defeat or prevent its object and use, would be recreant and abominable oppression.

The Constitution leaves no discretion to Congress whether needful appropriations shall be made. Discretion to ascertain and determine amounts needful, is committed to Congress, but the appropriation of whatever is needful after the amount has been ascertained, is commanded positively and absolutely. When, for example, the Constitution declares that the President and the judges at stated periods shall receive compensation fixed by law, the duty to make the appropriations is plain and peremptory; to refuse to make them, is disobedience of the Constitution, and treasonable. So, when it is declared that Congress shall have power to provide money to pay debts, and for the common defense and the general welfare, the plain meaning is that Congress shall do these things, and a refusal to do them is revolutionary, and subversive of the Constitution. A refusal less flagrant would be impeachable in the case of every officer and department of the Government within the reach of impeachment. Were the President to refuse to do any act enjoined on him by the Constitution, he would be impeachable, and ought to be convicted and removed from office as a convict. Should the judges, one or some or all of them, refuse to perform any duty which the Constitution commits to the judicial branch, the refusal would be plainly impeachable.

Congress is not amenable to impeachment. Congressional majorities are triable at the bar of public opinion, and in no other human forum. Could Congress be dissolved instantly here as in England, could Senators and Representatives be driven instantly from their seats by popular disapproval, were they amenable presently somewhere, there would be more of bravery, if not less of guilt, in a disregard of sworn obligation. Legislators are bound chiefly by their honor and their oaths; and the very impunity and exemption they enjoy exalts and measures their obligations, and the crime and odium of violating them. Because of the fixed tenure by which the members of each House hold their places and their trusts, irreparable harm may come of their acts and omissions, before they can be visited with even political defeat, and before the wrong they do can be undone. A congressional majority is absolutely safe during its term, and those who suffered such impunity to exist in the frame of our Government, must have relied on, the enormity and turpitude of the act to deter the representatives of the people and the representatives of States from betraying a trust so exalted and so sacred as their offices imply.

Mr. President, it does not escape my attention, as it must occur to those around me, that in ordinary times obvious aphorisms, I might say truisms like these would be needless, if not out of place in the Senate. They are pertinent now because of an occasion without example in American history. I know of no similar instance in British history. Could one be found, it would only mark the difference between an hereditary monarchy without a written constitution, and a free republic with a written charter plainly defining from the beginning the powers, the rights, and the duties of every department of the government. The nearest approaches in English experience to the transactions which now menace this country, only gild with broad light the wisdom of those who established a system to exempt America forever from the struggles between kingcraft and liberty, between aristocratic pretension and human rights, which in succeeding centuries had checkered and begrimed the annals of Great Britain. It was not to transplant, but to leave behind and shut out the usurpations and prerogatives of kings, nobles, and gentry, and the rude and violent resorts which, with varying and only partial success, had been matched against them, that wise and far-seeing men of many nationalities came to these shores and founded "a government of the people, for the people, and by the people." Such boisterous conflicts as the Old World had witnessed between subjects and rulers—between privilege and right, were the warnings which our fathers heeded, the dangers which they shunned, the evils which they averted, the disasters which they made impossible so long as their posterity should cherish their inheritance.

Until now no madness of party, no audacity or desperation of sinister, sectional, or partisan design, has ever ventured on such an attempt as has recently come to pass in the two Houses of Congress. The proceeding I mean to characterize, if misunderstood anywhere, is misunderstood here. One listening to addresses delivered to the Senate during this debate, as it is called, must think that the majority is arraigned, certainly that the majority wishes to seem and is determined to seem arraigned, merely for insisting that provisions appropriating money to keep the Government alive, and provisions not in themselves improper relating to other matters, may be united in the same bill. With somewhat of monotonous and ostentatious iteration we have been asked whether incorporating general legislation in appropriation bills is revolution, or revolutionary? No one in my hearing has ever so contended.

Each House is empowered by the Constitution to make rules governing the modes of its own procedure. The rules permitting, I know of nothing except convenience, common sense, and the danger of log-rolling combinations, which forbids putting all the appropriations into one bill, and in the same bill, all the revenue laws, a provision admitting a State into the Union, another paying a pension to a widow, and another changing the name of a steamboat. The votes and the executive approval which would make one of these provisions a law, would make them all a law. The proceeding would be outlandish, but it would not violate the Constitution.

A Senator might vote against such a huddle of incongruities, although separately he would approve each one of them. If however they passed both Houses in a bunch, and the Executive found no objection to any feature of the bill on its merits, and the only criticism should be that it would have been better legislative practice to divide it into separate enactments, it is not easy to see on what ground a veto could stand.

The assault which has been made on the executive branch of the Government, and on the Constitution itself, would not be less flagrant if separate bills had been resorted to as the weapons of attack. Suppose in a separate bill, the majority had, in advance of appropriations, repealed the national-bank act and the resumption act, and had declared that unless the Executive surrendered his convictions and yielded up his approval of the repealing act, no appropriations should be made; would the separation of the bills have palliated or condoned the revolutionary purpose? In the absence of an avowal that appropriations were to be finally withheld, or that appropriations were to be made to hinge upon the approval or veto of something else, a resort to separate bills might have cloaked and secreted for a time the real meaning of the transaction. In that respect it would have been wise and artful to resort to separate bills on this occasion; and I speak I think, in the hearing of at least one democratic Senator who did not overlook in advance the suggestion now made. But when it is declared, or intended, that unless another species of legislation is agreed to, the money of the people, paid for that purpose, shall not be used to maintain their Government and to enforce the laws—when it is designed that the Government shall be thrown into confusion and shall stop unless private charity or public succor comes to its relief, the threat is revolutionary, and its execution is treasonable.

In the case before us, the design to make appropriations hinge and depend upon the destruction of certain laws, is plain on the face of the bills before us,—the bill now pending, and another one on our tables. The same design was plain on the face of the bills sent us at the last session. The very fact that the sections uncovering the ballot-box to violence and fraud, are not, and never have been separately presented, but are thrust into appropriation bills, discloses and proves a belief, if not a knowledge, that in a separate bill the Executive would not approve them. Moreover both Houses have rung with the assertion that the Executive would not approve in a separate measure the overthrow of existing safeguards of the ballot-box, and that should he refuse to give his approval to appropriations and an overthrow of those safeguards linked together, no appropriations should be made.

The plot and the purpose then, is by duress to compel the Executive to give up his convictions, his duty, and his oath, as the price to be paid a political party for allowing the Government to live! Whether the bills be united or divided is mere method and form. The substance in either form is the same, and the plot if persisted in will bury its aiders and abettors in opprobrium, and will leave a buoy on the sea of time warning political mariners to keep aloof from a treacherous channel in which a political party foundered and went down.

The size of the Army and its pay, have both been exactly fixed by law—by law enacted by a democratic House, and approved by a second democratic House. It has been decided and voted that the coast defenses and the Indian and frontier service, require a certain number of soldiers; and the appropriations needed for provision and pay have been ascertained to a farthing. Nothing remains to be done, but to give formal sanction and warrant for the use of the money from time to time. This was all true at the last session. But a democratic House, or more justly speaking the democratic majority in the House refused to give its sanction, refused to allow the people's money to reach the use for which the people paid it, unless certain long-standing laws were repealed. When the Senate voted against the repeal, we were bluntly told that unless that vote was reversed, unless the Senate and the Executive would accept the bills, repealing clauses and all, the session should die, no appropriations should be made, and the wheels of the Government should stop. The threat was executed; the session did die, and every branch of the Government was left without the power to execute its duties after the 30th of next June.

We were further told that when the extra session, thus to be brought about, should convene, the democrats would rule both Houses, that the majority would again insist on its terms, and that then unless the Executive submitted to become an accomplice in the design to fling down the barriers that block the way to the ballot-box against fraud and force, appropriations would again be refused, and again the session should die leaving the Government paralyzed. The extra session has convened; the democrats have indeed the power in both Houses, and thus far the war and the caucus have come up to the manifesto. So far the exploit has been easy. The time of trial is to come; the issue has been made, and of its ignominious failure, there can be no doubt if the Executive shall plant itself on constitutional right and duty, and stand firm. The actors in this scheme have managed themselves and their party into a predicament, and unless the President lets them out they will and they must back out. [Laughter, and manifestations of applause in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. WALLACE in the chair.) Order.

Mr. CONKLING. Should the Executive interpose the constitutional shield against the political enormities of the proposed bills, and then should the majority carry out the threat to desert their posts by adjournment without making the needed appropriations, I hope and trust they will be called back instantly and called back as often as need be until they relinquish a monstrous pretension and abandon a treasonable position.

The Army bill now pending, is not, in its political features, the bill tendered us at the last session a few days ago; it is not the same bill then insisted on as the ultimatum of the majority. The bill as it comes to us now, condemns its predecessor as crude and objectionable. It was found to need alteration. It did need alteration badly, and those who lately insisted on it as it was, insist on it now as it then was not. A grave proviso has been added to save the right of the President to aid a State gasping in the throes of rebellion or invasion and calling for help. As the provision stood when thrust upon us first and last at the recent session, it would have punished as a felon the President of the United States, the General of the Army, and others, for attempting to obey the Constitution of the United States and two ancient acts of Congress, one of them signed by George Washington. Shorn of this absurdity, the bill as it now stands, should it become a law, will be the first enactment of its kind that ever found its way into the statutes of the United States. A century, with all its activities and party strifes, with all its passionate discords, with all its expedients for party advantage, with all its wisdom and its folly, with all its patriotism and its treason, has never till now produced a congressional majority which deemed such a statute fit to be enacted.

Let me state the meaning of the amendments proposed under guise of enlarging liberty on election day—that day of days when order, peace, and security for all, as well as liberty, should reign. The amendments declare in plain legal effect that, no matter what the exigency may be, no matter what violence or carnage may run riot and trample down right and life, no matter what mob brutality may become master, if the day be election day, any officer or person, civil, military, or naval, from the President down, who attempts to interfere to prevent or quell violence by the aid of national soldiers, or armed men not soldiers, shall be punished, and may be fined $5,000 and imprisoned for five years. This is the law we are required to set up. Yes, not only to leave murderous ruffianism untouched, but to invite it into action by assurances of safety in advance.

In the city of New York, all the thugs and shoulder-hitters and repeaters, all the carriers of slung-shot, dirks, and bludgeons, all the fraternity of the bucket-shops, the rat-pits, the hells and the slums, all the graduates of the nurseries of modern so-called democracy, [laughter;] all those who employ and incite them, from King's Bridge to the Battery, are to be told in advance that on the day when the million people around them choose their members of the National Legislature, no matter what God-daring or man-hurting enormities they may commit, no matter what they do, nothing they can do will meet with the slightest resistance from any national soldier or armed man clothed with national authority.

Another bill, already on our tables, strikes down even police officers armed, or unarmed, of the United States.

In South Carolina, in Louisiana, in Mississippi, and in the other States where colored citizens are counted to swell the representation in Congress and then robbed of their ballots and dismissed from the political sum—in all such States, every rifle club, and white league, and murderous band, and every tissue ballot box stuffer, night-rider, and law-breaker is to be told that they may turn national elections into a bloody farce, that they may choke the whole proceeding with force and fraud and blood, and that the nation shall not confront them with one armed man. State troops, whether under the name of rifle clubs or white leagues, or any other, armed with the muskets of the United States, may constitute the mob, may incite the mob, but the national arm is to be tied and palsied.

I repeat such an act of Congress has never yet existed. If there ever was a time when such an act could safely and fitly stand upon the statute-book, that time is not now, and is not likely to arrive in the near future. Until rebellion raised its iron hand, all parties and all sections had been content to leave where the Constitution left it the power and duty of the President to take care that the laws be faithfully executed. The Constitution has in this regard three plain commands:

The President "shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed."

Again, "The President shall be Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, and of the militia of the several States when called into the actual service of the United States."

"The actual service of the United States" some man may say means war merely, service in time of war. Let me read again, "Congress shall have power to provide for calling forth the militia." For what? First of all, "to execute the laws of the Union."

Yes, Congress shall have power "to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union." Speaking to lawyers, I venture to emphasize the word "execute." It is a term of art; it has a long-defined meaning. The act of 1795, re-enacted since, emphasized these constitutional provisions.

Here it is, section 5298 of the Revised Statutes.

Whenever, by reason of unlawful obstruction, combinations, or assemblages of persons, or rebellion against the authority of the Government of the United States, it shall become impracticable, in the judgment of the President, to enforce, by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings, the laws of the United States within any State or Territory, it shall be lawful for the President to call forth the militia of any or all the States, and to employ such parts of the land and naval forces of the United States as he may deem necessary to enforce the faithful execution of the laws of the United States, or to suppress such rebellion, in whatever State or Territory thereof the laws of the United States may be forcibly opposed, or the execution thereof forcibly obstructed.

That section, enacted in substance during the administration of Washington, drawn and voted for by the men who framed the Constitution, only supplemented the provisions I have read. It has stood for eighty-four years unchallenged.

These constitutional provisions, enforced by the act to which the Senate has listened, were, and to-day are, the only authority under which the soldiers of the nation can go on election day or any other day to the polls or elsewhere within the jurisdiction of a State to quell violence and enforce law. If under these provisions armed men cannot be employed to subdue violence at the polls on the day of a national election, they cannot be employed at all; for there is, as I shall argue and as I think I shall demonstrate, no other authority for it; certainly none in the act which we are invited to strike down. If there was during eighty years of acquiescence too much latitude given to the President or the Army by the Constitution and by the act of 1795, that latitude was curtailed on the 18th of June, 1878. On that recent date, this provision became a law:

SEC. 15. From and after the passage of this act it shall not be lawful to employ any part of the Army of the United States, as a posse comitatus, or otherwise, for the purpose of executing the laws, except in such cases and under such circumstances as such employment of said force may be expressly authorized by the Constitution or by act of Congress; and no money appropriated by this act shall be used to pay any of the expenses incurred in the employment of any troops in violation of this section, and any person willfully violating the provisions of this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by fine not exceeding $10,000, or imprisonment not exceeding two years, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

Mark the language, a penal statute visiting with penalty the President and everybody else who attempts to employ troops in any case unless the Constitution or an act of Congress "expressly," not alone by implication, not alone by the spirit, which makes alive, but by the very letter which sometimes kills, authorizes such employment. So thoroughly is the Constitution hedged about already. I have said and I repeat that the act of 1865, against which this repeal is leveled, contains no authority, none whatever, under which any one soldier or any one armed man may go for the purpose of keeping the peace, or for any other purpose, to the polls on a national election day. Let me read the section aimed at by the amendment, and the section which immediately follows it, both of which were enacted as part of the statute of 1865:

SEC. 2002. No military or naval officer, or other person engaged in the civil, military, or naval service of the United States, shall order, bring, keep, or have under his authority or control, any troops or armed men at the place where any general or special election is held in any State, unless it be necessary to repel the armed enemies of the United States, or to keep the peace at the polls.

Mark the following section:

SEC. 2003. No officer of the Army or Navy of the United States shall prescribe or fix, or attempt to prescribe or fix, by proclamation, order, or otherwise, the qualifications of voters in any State, or in any manner interfere with the freedom of any election in any State, or with the exercise of the free right of suffrage in any State. (See sections 5530–5532.)

Does any lawyer listen to those two sections and know that they stood together in the act of 1865, and yet doubt that the act was a mere penal and restraining act? It conferred no power. It was designed for no such thing. It diminished, curtailed, restrained the olden power which from time immemorial had resided in the persons the section describes.

Mr. President, let me go back a moment, for I think, after reading some remarks which fell from the distinguished Senator from Illinois now before me, [Mr. DAVIS,] it is somewhat important that the Senate should know that I am right or know that I am wrong in this particular. I have said that the act of 1865 gives no authority to troops or armed men to visit the polls at which an election is being held. I have said that the power of the President resides in the act of 1795 and in the Constitution, and I add that until 1864 these constitutional provisions had always been deemed not only a suitable grant of power, but a sufficiently guarded grant.

National jurisdiction,—by that I mean the right of national authority to interpose—depends sometimes upon the locus as lawyers say, thereby meaning the place, and sometimes on the occasion without reference to place.

In a fort, an arsenal, a dock-yard, and in every other place under the sole jurisdiction of the United States, the national authority may always go to preserve the peace and to reign and dwell there. In the States, and everywhere in every State, on every rood of our soil, the national authority may always go, and lawfully go, when any act is to be done or law enforced in virtue of the Constitution of the United States.

The law protecting and regulating national elections is a law in virtue of the Constitution of the United States. The execution of that law is an act under and in virtue of that Constitution. It follows that it is one of the laws which the President is empowered and commanded to take care to have faithfully executed. It is one of "the laws of the Union" which he may command the militia as well as the national forces to execute. It is one of the laws in respect of which, when need be, he may exert all the power, civil and military, which he may exert, to execute any law whatever.

Are we to be told that the act protecting elections is unconstitutional, and therefore not valid and not "a law of the Union?" It is too late to say that. The democratic House, and what is more absolute, the democratic caucus, have abandoned the constitutional argument. They have decided that the election law is a valid constitutional law, and the judgment stands recorded in the legislative, executive and judicial bill lying on our tables as pending in the House. They recognize the election act; they deal with it; they assume that it exists. They cripple it, it is true; they cunningly emasculate it, they provide for its safe and easy violation and evasion. They so change it as to make a smooth and tempting walk for every ballot-box-stuffer and ruffian who would marauding upon the ballot-box, but they recognize it all the time, and deal with it as a valid constitutional enactment.

I said, and I repeat, that the authority to enforce this law resides in the Constitution and in the act of 1795. I said, and I repeat, that until 1864 no curb, no limitation, had ever been placed by Congress upon the right and duty to execute law and preserve peace on election day or any other day.

In 1861–'62 General McClellan, General Dix, General Schenck, and others, military commanders, issued orders in which they not only excluded disloyal voters from the polls, but undertook in some sort to prescribe the qualification of electors. General McClellan was a democrat and must be supposed to have been inspired in all the meanings and limitations of the Constitution. I never knew a democrat during the war, even if he could not read the Constitution by its title, who was not profoundly instructed and vehemently certain of all prohibitions of that famous instrument. General McClellan issued an order not only regulating elections, but suspending the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus, in order that at elections military authority might have full sway. Here it is:

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF THE POTOMAC,
Washington, October 29, 1861.

GENERAL: There is an apprehension among Union citizens in many parts of Maryland of an attempt at interference with their rights of suffrage by disunion citizens on the occasion of the election to take place on the 6th of November next.

In order to prevent this, the major-general commanding—directs that you send detachments of a sufficient number of men to the different points in your vicinity where the elections are to be held, to protect the Union voters, and to see that no disunionists are allowed to intimidate them, or in any way to interfere with their rights.

That was General McClellan—

He also desires you to arrest and hold in confinement till after the election all disunionists who are known to have returned from Virginia recently and who show themselves at the polls, and to guard effectually against any invasion of the peace and order of the election.

For the purpose of carrying out these instructions you are authorized to suspend the habeas corpus. General Stone has received similar instructions to these. You will please confer with him as to the particular points that each shall take the control of.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

R. B. MARCY
Chief of Staff.

Major-General N. P. BANKS,
Commanding Division, Muddy Branch, Maryland.

The democratic party did not learn for some time afterward how monstrous it is to confront ruffians with armed force. Indeed, the tender constitutional susceptibilities of that great organization were not then keenly alive to the wrong of trampling under foot that great prerogative writ, and boast of Anglo-Saxon freedom and jurisprudence, the habeas corpus.

Three years later the democrats met in national convention. The convention resolved that the war for the Union was a failure, a failure just at the time when it was about to triumph utterly, as it would have done long before but for incitement and encouragement given by northern democrats to the rebellion. Having recorded this sage, patriotic, and statesman-like judgment, the convention proceeded to nominate for President of the United States and Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy the very man who had sent soldiers to act as overseers of elections, who had trampled down by military force the privilege of the habeas corpus, and this, do not forget, in Maryland,—Maryland, a State in the Union, not even a seceded State.

Delaware too, was protected at her elections by military force, under military orders, and the governor of that State thanked the national authorities for that protection, approved it and aided it.

But these orders went very far. They prescribed with military rigor the qualification of voters, and rough proceedings no doubt ensued. The sword is not a mathematical instrument, it is not as exact as the guillotine, not as exact as the headsman's axe, nor even as the dagger, the bullet, or the halter of the assassin.

These orders prompted the act of 1865, not to confer power, I cannot repeat too often, but to restrain and curtail it.

The bill was introduced by Mr. Powell of Kentucky, that Senator who when the enrollment act came from the House is said to have remarked, "Go on with your draft; I feel no interest in it; Kentucky's quota is full on both sides." The bill was referred to the Military Committee of the Senate. On the 12th of February, 1864, the Military Committee reported against it, and for the time being that was the end of it.

A year later, having meantime been taken up and amended, amended as it now stands, it was passed. Every democratic Senator who voted voted for it as it stands now. Every democrat in the House who voted voted for the act as it stands now. Nay more; after it had been amended as it now is, after the words "except when necessary to keep the peace at the polls," had been established in it, Mr. Powell, a democrat from Kentucky, and other democratic members of the Senate again and again, as the Senator from Iowa knows, for he has just traversed the debate, urged the Senate, importuned the Senate to take up this now obnoxious act, amended as it now stands, and put it on its passage. Was it not so?

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, sir.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, the act of 1865 was not, as the honorable Senator from Illinois stated, a war measure, to operate only in time of war. No, sir; it was passed in 1865, passed when Grant was tightening the coils around Richmond, passed when Sherman, everywhere victorious in the South, had led his conquering legions from the mountains to the sea. It was passed when the rebellion was in the very article of death. In less than sixty days the confederacy as a military fact had become a vanished dream. No, sir; it was passed at the end of a great war, and passed to put a bridle on permission, and power which had gone unchecked for three-quarters of a century during which statesmen had lived—for there were brave men before Agamemnon. It was meant to be, it was said to be, and it is, a mere check. It punishes ordering troops to approach the polls, except that when the order is for a lawful purpose it is not included.

Does that, I ask the honorable Senator from Illinois, confer authority upon anybody? Take an analogous case. Here is a statute,—the books of both hemispheres bristle with them,—denouncing homicide. What do they declare? The killing of a human being with prepense aforethought, shall be murder; but they except, or the court interpolates into them as an exception, the act of a sheriff in executing a criminal. That act shall not be punished. Did any lawyer ever hear that under a statute of that sort a sheriff might proceed to hang a man? Did anybody ever hear that if a statute punished an act and said "except it be lawfully done," that statute furnished the authority for doing it, or had any possible effect save only to say that, when lawfully done, when authority otherwise existed to do it, it should not be held punishable? A sheriff must have a death-warrant of a competent tribunal, and an express enabling statute when he proceeds to deprive a human being of life; without that he would be a murderer just as much under a statute excepting lawful executions from punishment as homicides, as without such a statute. So when a statute declares that troops shall be punished if they act except in a given condition of things, they must still be authorized, they must have authority on which to act as much as the sheriff must have authority on which to execute.

Again, this act forbids civil officers to have soldiers or armed men not soldiers at the polls, except it be necessary to quell violence. The amendment proposes to punish civil officers for trying to subdue rioters or mobs by soldiers or by calling upon men not soldiers if they are armed in any way; and this, we are told, is to subordinate the military to the civil authority!

Again, the act as it stands forbids, except in the case for which there may be authority, the presence of troops at the "place" at which an election is to be held. What does "place" mean? I ask emphatically what does "place" mean? The honorable Senator from Delaware cited the other day at great length an instance in which troops had been present in the city of New York within the meaning of this act, when they were conspicuously absent from every polling place; not allowed to go, even one at a time, to any polling place for any purpose whatever. Under this interpretation "place" must be construed to mean a whole city or a township, and under the proposed amendment so construed, on a day when election is held every soldier must be banished from the whole Island of Manhattan, and never allowed to return during the day even though the entire city should be wrapped in flames or sacked by mobs.

Again, the act of 1865 forbids the presence of soldiers save only when necessary to preserve the peace. My honorable friend from Connecticut smiles——

Mr. EATON. I do. Necessity is the plea of tyrants.

Mr. CONKLING. That is the lawyer's smile. My honorable friend knows as well as I know—we do not differ—that a statute providing that a thing may be done when necessary, commits to the discretion of somebody authority to judge of that necessity. No doubt of it. No doubt the discretion may be abused. All human discretion may be abused; almost if not all human discretion has been abused since the morning of time. The governor of every State may abuse similar discretion every day in the year; so may every sheriff, mayor, and constable. The President may mistake or abuse the discretion which calls for his judgment; he may do it under other statutes and provisions every other day in the three hundred and sixty-five. What is there, in God's name what is there in a Republic operating by universal suffrage and governed by majorities, which should pick out election day and hand that day over a prey to unchallenged ruffianism, brutality, and disorder?

Connected with the amendment we are now considering and a part of it, is the act for protecting and regulating national elections. That act applies to cities of twenty thousand or more inhabitants. It provides that two persons may be appointed by the court, not to act as overseers, but as supervisors of registration, voting and counting at national elections. One is to be a democrat, one is to be a republican. That is to prevent either side having advantage over the other. In rural regions with sparse populations, no provision is made. There, as a rule, all voters are known to each other; there, the danger of mobs and tumults is comparatively slight. In the large cities the case is different. There, these two supervisors are to see fair play: that is the whole of it. They have no powers, nor have the deputy marshals any power, not from time immemorial and from necessity reposed in all the States, as far as I know, in the inspectors of election. I read the provision as it stands in my own State, and I ask the Senate to mark what sort of power it confers on every inspector of election:

If any person shall willfully disobey any lawful commands of the board of inspectors of any election, or shall willfully and without lawful authority, obstruct, hinder, or delay any elector on his way to any poll where an election shall be held, or while he is exercising or attempting to exercise the right of voting, or shall aid or assist in such obstruction or delay, he shall, on conviction, be adjudged guilty of a misdemeanor, and be fined in a sum not exceeding $250, and may be imprisoned, in the discretion of the court, for not more than six months.

All these inspectors under this act are such "potentates and powers" that any man who dares to disobey their commands is to be punished; and yet the sensibilities of the gifted and ardent Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] palpitated with indignant emotion when he thought of youth and age meeting at the polls and voting, with two persons, one democrat and one republican looking right at them when they did it; looking on to see that the receiver of ballots did not destroy or change them but put them in the box, and afterward to see that the ballots were honestly counted after youth and age had gone home to supper. I listened to a recital of that ordeal, and I made up my mind that on such an occasion youth and age after the day's fitful struggle might sleep well.

The election law came in to correct abuses which reached their climax in 1868 in the city of New York. In that year in the State of New York the republican candidate for governor was elected; the democratic candidate was counted in. Members of the Legislature were fraudulently seated. The election was a barbarous burlesque. Many thousand forged naturalization papers were issued; some of them were white and some were coffee-colored. The same witnesses purported to attest hundreds and thousands of naturalization affidavits, and the stupendous fraud of the whole thing was and is an open secret. Some of these naturalization papers were sent to other States. So plenty were they, that some of them were sent to Germany, and Germans who had never left their country claimed exemption from the German draft for soldiers in the Franco-Prussian war, because they were naturalized American citizens! [Laughter.]

The holders of these papers voted by thousands, and I have heard it said in this debate that Judge Blatchford has decided that these papers are legal. Never. I see the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. HEREFORD] nod. He does not nod very forcibly, but he nods enough to induce me to stop and read from the judgment of Judge Blatchford. Judge Blatchford passed upon a case made—lawyers will understand what that is—presenting a pure question of law. What was the question? Whether certain papers on deposit or on file in court in and of themselves, assuming their verity, assuming that they were genuine, constituted a record in the eye of the law. There was no question tried or decided whether they were forged or not; no question whether they were fraudulent or not; no question whether they had been signed, as some of them had been, with the name of officers appearing on their face who never were elected until long after the paper was issued; but on the naked question presented to him, Judge Blatchford spoke. He refers to another case in which the same question had been presented, and says:

> The sole ground of such application was that the validity of the admission of the party to citizenship was disputed, on the allegation that there was no legal record of the judgment admitting him to citizenship,—

Why? I ask the Senate to mark—> for the reason that the clerk of the court did not write out an entry in the minute-book of the court reciting the proceedings and showing the adjudication made. This is the same point now urged here.

There is the point of the decision and the whole of it as I understand.

I say thousands of men voted upon fraudulent naturalization papers. But all this was tame and paltry compared with other enormities. The city of New York was redistricted from time to time—sometimes so districted as to bisect blocks, and denizens of the same building could vote in different election precincts. In some cases the democratic majority was larger than the whole number of men, women, children, horses, cats, and dogs in the district, [laughter,] and I speak not in rhetorical figures but in Arabic figures.

Repeating, ballot-box stuffing, ruffianism, and false counting decided everything. Tweed made the election officers, and the election officers were corrupt. In 1868, thirty thousand votes were falsely added to the democratic majority in the cities of New York and Brooklyn alone. Taxes and elections were the mere spoil and booty of a currupt junta in Tammany Hall. Assessments, exactions, and exemptions were made the bribes and the penalties of political submission. Usurpation and fraud inaugurated a carnival of corrupt disorder; and obscene birds without number swooped down to the harvest and gorged themselves on every side in plunder and spoliation. Wrongs and usurpations springing from the pollution and desecration of the ballot-box stalked high-headed in the public way. The courts and the machinery of justice were impotent in the presence of culprits too great to be punished.

The act of 1870 came in to throttle such abuses. It was not born without throes and pangs. It passed the Senate after a day and a night which rang with democratic maledictions and foul aspersions.

In the autumn of that year an election was held for the choice of Representatives in Congress. I see more than one friend near me who for himself and for others has reason even unto this day to remember that election and the apprehension which preceded it. It was the first time the law of 1870 had been put in force. Resistance was openly counseled. Democratic newspapers in New York advised that the officers of the law be pitched into the river. Disorder was afoot. Men, not wanting in bravery, and not republicans, dreaded the day. Bloodshed, arson, riot were feared. Ghastly spectacles were still fresh in memory. The draft riots had spread terror which had never died, and strong men shuddered when they remembered the bloody assizes of the democratic party. They had seen men and women, blind with party hate, dizzy and drunk with party madness, stab and burn and revel in murder and in mutilating the dead. They had seen an asylum for colored orphans made a funeral pile, and its smoke sent up from their Christian and imperial city to tell in heaven of the inhuman bigotry, the horrible barbarity of man. Remembering such sickening scenes, and dreading their repetition, they asked the President to protect them—to protect them with the beak and claw of national power. Instantly the unkenneled packs of party barked in vengeful chorus. Imprecations, maledictions, and threats were hurled at Grant; but with that splendid courage which never blanched in battle, which never quaked before clamor—with that matchless self-poise which did not desert him even when a continent beyond the sea rose and uncovered before him, [applause in the galleries,] he responded in the orders which it has pleased the honorable Senator from Delaware to read. The election thus protected was the fairest, the freest, the most secure, a generation had seen. When, two years afterward, New York came to crown Grant with her vote, his action in protecting her chief city on the Ides of November, 1870, was not forgotten. When next New York has occasion to record her judgment of the services of Grant, his action in 1870 touching peace in the city of New York will not be hidden away by those who espouse him wisely. [Applause in the galleries.]

Now, the election law is to be emasculated; no national soldier must confront rioters or mobs; no armed man by national authority, though not a soldier, must stay the tide of brutality or force; no deputy marshal must be within call; no supervisor must have power to arrest any man who in his sight commits the most flagrant breach of the peace. But the democrats tell us "we have not abolished the supervisors; we have left them." Yes, the legislative bill leaves the supervisors, two stool-pigeons with their wings clipped, [laughter,] two licensed witnesses to stand about idle, and look—yes, "a cat may look at a king"—but they must not touch bullies or lawbreakers, not if they do murders right before their eyes.

If a civil officer should, under the pending amendment, attempt to quell a riot by calling on the bystanders, if they have arms, he is punishable for that. If a marshal, the marshal of the district in which the election occurs, the marshal nominated to the Senate and confirmed by the Senate—I do not mean a deputy marshal—should see an affray or a riot at the polls on election day and call upon the bystanders to quell it, if this bill becomes a law, and one of those bystanders has a revolver in his pocket, or another one takes a stick or a cudgel in his hand, the marshal may be fined $5,000 and punished by five years' imprisonment.

Such are the devices to belittle national authority and national law, to turn the idea of the sovereignty of the nation into a laughing-stock and a by-word.

Under what pretexts, is this uprooting and overturning to be? Any officer who transgresses the law, be he civil or military, may be punished in the courts of the State or in the courts of the nation under existing law. Is the election act unconstitutional? The courts for ten years have been open to that question. The law has been pounded with all the hammers of the lawyers, but it has stood the test; no court has pronounced it unconstitutional, although many men have been prosecuted and convicted under it. Judge Woodruff and Judge Blatchford have vindicated its constitutionality. But, as I said before, the constitutional argument has been abandoned. The supreme political court, practically now above Congresses or even constitutions, the democratic caucus, has decided that the law is constitutional. The record of the judgment is in the legislative bill.

We are told it costs money to enforce the law. Yes, it costs money to enforce all laws; it costs money to prosecute smugglers, counterfeiters, murderers, mail robbers and others. We have been informed that it has cost $200,000 to execute the election act. It cost more than $5,000,000,000 in money alone, to preserve our institutions and our laws, in one war, and the nation which bled and the nation which paid is not likely to give up its institutions and the birthright of its citizens for $200,000. [Applause in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. COCKRELL in the chair.) The Senator will suspend a moment. The Chair will announce to the galleries that there shall be no more applause; if so, the galleries will be cleared immediately.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, that interruption reminds me, the present occupant of the chair having been deeply interested in the bill, that the appropriations made and squandered for local and unlawful improvements in the last river and harbor bill, alone, would pay for executing the election law as long as grass grows or water runs. The interest on the money wrongfully squandered in that one bill, would execute it twice over perpetually. The cost of this needless extra session, brought about as a partisan contrivance, would execute the election law for a great while. A better way to save the cost, than to repeal the law, is to obey it. Let White Leagues and rifle clubs disband; let your night-riders dismount; let your tissue ballot box stuffers desist; let repeaters, false-counters, and ruffians no longer be employed to carry elections, and then the cost of executing the law will disappear from the public ledger.

Again, we are told that forty-five million people are in danger from an army nominally of twenty-five thousand men scattered over a continent, most of them beyond the frontiers of civilized abode. Military power has become an affrighting specter. Soldiers at the polls, are displeasing to a political party. What party? That party whose Administration ordered soldiers, who obeyed, to shoot down and kill unoffending citizens here in the streets of Washington on election day; that party which has arrested and dispersed Legislatures at the point of the bayonet; that party which has employed troops to carry elections to decide that a State should be slave and should not be free; that party which has corraled courts of justice with national bayonets, and hunted panting fugitive slaves, in peaceful communities, with artillery and dragoons; that party which would have to-day no majority in either House of Congress except for elections dominated and decided by violence and fraud; that party under whose sway, in several States, not only the right to vote, but the right to be, is now trampled under foot.

Such is the source of an insulting summons to the Executive to become particeps criminis in prostrating wholesome laws, and this is the condition on which the money of the people, paid by the people, shall be permitted to be used for the purposes for which the people paid it.

Has the present national Administration been officiously robust in checking the encroachments and turbulence of democrats, either by the use of troops or otherwise? I ask this question because the next election is to occur during the term of the present Administration. What is the need of revolutionary measures now? What is all this uproar and commotion, this daring venture of partisan experiment, for? Why not make your issue against these laws, and carry your issue to the people? If you can elect a President and a Congress of your thinking, you will have it all your own way.

Why now should there be an attempt to block the wheels of government on the eve of an election at which this whole question is triable before the principals and masters of us all? The answer is inevitable. But one truthful explanation can be made of this daring enterprise. It is a political, a partisan manœuvre. It is a strike for party advantage. With a fair election and an honest count, the democratic party cannot carry the country. These laws, if executed, insure some approach to a fair election. Therefore they stand in the way, and therefore they are to be broken down.

I reflect upon no man's motives, but I believe that the sentiment which finds expression in the transaction now proceeding in the two Houses of Congress, has its origin in the idea I have stated. I believe that the managers and charioteers of the democratic party think that with a fair election and a fair count they cannot carry the State of New York. They know that with free course, such as existed in 1868, to the ballot-box and count, no matter what majority may be given in that State where the green grass grows, the great cities will overbalance and swamp it. They know that with the ability to give eighty, ninety, one hundred thousand majority in the county of New York and the county of Kings, half of it fraudulently added, it is idle for the three million people living above the Highlands of the Hudson, to vote.

This is a struggle for power. It is a fight for empire. It is a contrivance to clutch the National Government. That we believe; that I believe.

The nation has tasted, and drank to the dregs, the sway of the democratic party, organized and dominated by the same influences which dominate it again and still. You want to restore that dominion. We mean to resist you at every step and by every lawful means that opportunity places in our hands. We believe that it is good for the country, good for every man North and South who loves the country now, that the Government should remain in the hands of those who were never against it. We believe that it is not wise or safe to give over our nationality to the dominion of the forces which formerly and now again rule the democratic party. We do not mean to connive at further conquests, and we tell you that if you gain further political power, you must gain it by fair means, and not by foul. We believe that these laws are wholesome. We believe that they are necessary barriers against wrongs, necessary defenses for rights; and so believing, we will keep and defend them even to the uttermost of lawful honest effort.

The other day, it was Tuesday I think, it pleased the honorable Senator from Illinois [Mr. DAVIS] to deliver to the Senate an address, I had rather said an opinion, able and carefully prepared. That honorable Senator knows well the regard not only, but the sincere respect in which I hold him, and he will not misunderstand the freedom with which I shall refer to some of his utterances. Whatever else his sayings fail to prove, they did I think, prove their author, after Mrs. Winslow, the most copious and inexhaustible fountain of soothing sirup. The honorable Senator seemed like one slumbering in a storm and dreaming of a calm. He said there was no uproar anywhere—one would infer you could hear a pin drop,—from center to circumference. Rights, he said, are secure. I have his language here. If I do not seem to give the substance aright I will stop and read it. Rights secure North and South; peace and tranquillity everywhere. The law obeyed and no need of special provisions or anxiety. It was in this strain that the Senator discoursed.

Are rights secure, when fresh-done barbarities show that local government in one portion of our land is no better than despotism tempered by assassination! Rights secure, when such things can be, as stand proved and recorded by committees of the Senate! Rights secure, when the old and the young fly in terror from their homes, and from the graves of their murdered dead! Rights secure, when thousands brave cold, hunger, death, seeking among strangers in a far country a humanity which will remember that—

> "Before man made them citizens, > Great nature made them men!"

Read the memorial signed by Judge Dillon, by the democratic mayor of Saint Louis, by Mr. Henderson once a member of the Senate, and by other men known to the nation, detailing what has been done in recent weeks on the Southern Mississippi. Read the affidavits accompanying this memorial. Has any one a copy of the memorial here? I have seen the memorial. I have seen the signatures. I hope the honorable Senator from Illinois will read it, and read the affidavits which accompany it. When he does, he will read one of the most sickening recitals of modern times. He will look upon one of the bloodiest and blackest pictures in the book of recent years. Yet the Senator says, all is quiet. "There is not such faith, no not in Israel." Verily "order reigns in Warsaw."

Solitudinem faciunt, pacem appellant.

Mr. President, the republican party everywhere wants peace and prosperity—peace and prosperity in the South, as much and as sincerely as elsewhere. Disguising the truth, will not bring peace and prosperity. Soft phrases will not bring peace. "Fair words butter no parsnips." We hear a great deal of loose flabby talk about "fanning dying embers," "rekindling smoldering fires," and so on. Whenever the plain truth is spoken, these unctuous monitions, with a Peter Parley benevolence, fall copiously upon us. This lullaby and hush has been in my belief a mistake from the beginning. It has misled the South and misled the North. In Andrew Johnson's time a convention was worked up at Philadelphia, and men were brought from the North and South, for ecstasy and gush. A man from Massachusetts and a man from South Carolina locked arms and walked into the convention arm in arm, and sensation and credulity palpitated, and clapped their hands, and thought an universal solvent had been found. Serenades were held at which "Dixie" was played. Later on, anniversaries of battles fought in the war of Independence, were made occasions by men from the North and men from the South for emotional, dramatic, hugging ceremonies. General Sherman I remember, attended one of them, and I remember also, that with the bluntness of a soldier, and the wisdom and hard sense of a statesman, he plainly cautioned all concerned not to be carried away, and not to be fooled. But many have been fooled, and being fooled, have helped to swell the democratic majorities which now display themselves before the public eye.

Of all such effusive demonstrations I have this to say: honest, serious convictions are not ecstatic or emotional. Grave affairs and lasting purposes do not express or vent themselves in honeyed phrase or sickly sentimentality, rhapsody, or profuse professions.

This is as true of political as of religious duties. The Divine Master tells us, "Not every one that saith unto me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven; but he that doeth the will of my Father which is in Heaven."

Facts are stubborn things, but the better way to deal with them is to look them squarely in the face.

The republican party and the northern people preach no crusade against the South. I will say nothing of the past beyond a single fact. When the war was over, no man who fought against his flag was punished even by imprisonment. No estate was confiscated. Every man was left free to enjoy life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. After the Southern States were restored to their relations in the Union, no man was ever disfranchised by national authority—not one. If this statement is denied I invite any Senator to correct me. I repeat it. After the southern State governments were rebuilded, and the States were restored to their relations in the Union, by national authority not one man for one moment was ever denied the right to vote, or hindered in the right. From the time that Mississippi was restored, there never has been an hour when Jefferson Davis might not vote as freely as the honorable Senator in his State of Illinois. The North, burdened with taxes, draped in mourning, dotted over with new-made graves tenanted by her bravest and her best, sought to inflict no penalty upon those who had stricken her with the greatest, and, as she believed, the guiltiest rebellion that ever crimsoned the annals of the human race.

As an example of generosity and magnanimity, the conduct of the nation in victory was the grandest the world has ever seen. The same spirit prevails now. Yet our ears are larumed with the charge that the republicans of the North seek to revive and intensify the wounds and pangs and passions of the war, and that the southern democrats seek to bury them in oblivion of kind forgetfulness.

We can test the truth of these assertions right before our eyes. Let us test them. Twenty-seven States adhered to the Union in the dark hour. Those States send to Congress two hundred and sixty-nine Senators and Representatives. Of these two hundred and sixty-nine Senators and Representatives, fifty-four, and only fifty-four, were soldiers in the armies of the Union. The eleven States which were disloyal send ninety-three Senators and Representatives to Congress. Of these, eighty-five were soldiers in the armies of the rebellion, and at least three more held high civil station in the rebellion, making in all eighty-eight out of ninety-three.

Let me state the same fact, dividing the Houses. There are but four Senators here who fought in the Union Army. They all sit here now; and there are but four. Twenty Senators sit here who fought in the army of rebellion, and three more Senators sit here who held high civil command in the confederacy.

In the House, there are fifty Union soldiers from twenty-seven States, and sixty-five confederate soldiers from eleven States.

Who, I ask you, Senators, tried by this record, is keeping up party divisions on the issues and hatreds of the war?

The South is solid. Throughout all its borders it has no seat here save two in which a republican sits. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. BRUCE] and the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. KELLOGG] are still spared; and whisper says that an enterprise is afoot to deprive one of these Senators of his seat. The South is emphatically solid. Can you wonder if the North soon becomes solid too? Do you not see that the doings witnessed now in Congress fill the North with alarm, and distrust of the patriotism and good faith of men from the South? Forty-two democrats have seats on this floor; forty-three if you add the honorable Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DAVIS.] He does not belong to the democratic party, although I must say, after reading his speech the other day, that a democrat who asks anything more of him is an insatiate monster. [Laughter.] If we count the Senator from Illinois, there are forty-three democrats in this Chamber. Twenty-three is a clear majority of all, and twenty-three happens to be exactly the number of Senators from the South who were leaders in the late rebellion.

Do you anticipate my object in stating these numbers? For fear you do not, let me explain. Forty-two Senators rule the Senate; twenty-three Senators rule the caucus. A majority rules the Senate; a caucus rules the majority; and the twenty-three southern Senators rule the caucus. The same thing, in the same way, governed by the same elements, is true in the House.

This present assault upon the purity and fairness of elections, upon the Constitution, upon the executive department, and upon the rights of the people; not the rights of a king, not on such rights as we heard the distinguished presiding officer, who I am glad now to discover in his seat, dilate upon of a morning some weeks ago; not the divine right of kings but the inborn rights of the people—the present assault upon them, could never have been inaugurated without the action of the twenty-three southern Senators here, and the southern Representatives there, [pointing to the House.]

The people of the North know this and see it. They see the lead and control of the democratic party again where it was before the war, in the hands of the South. "By their fruits ye shall know them." The honorable Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], educated no doubt by experience in political appearances, and spectacular effects, said the other day that he preferred the democrats from the North should go first in this debate. I admired his sagacity. It was the skill of an experienced tactician to deploy the northern levies as the sappers and miners; it was very becoming certainly. It was not from cruelty, or to make them food for powder, that he set them in the forefront of the battle; he thought it would appear better for the northern auxiliaries to go first and tunnel the citadel. Good, excellent, as far as it went; but it did not go very far in misleading anybody; putting the tail foremost and the head in the sand, only displayed the species and habits of the bird. [Laughter.]

We heard the other day, that the "logic of events," had filled the Southern seats here with men banded together by a common history and a common purpose. The Senator who made that sage observation perhaps builded better than he knew. The same logic of events, let me tell democratic Senators, and the communities behind them, is destined to bring from the North more united delegations.

I read in a newspaper that it was proposed the other day in another place, to restore to the Army of the United States men who, educated at the nation's cost and presented with the nation's sword, drew that sword against the nation's life. In the pending bill is a provision for the retirement of officers now in the Army, with advanced rank and exaggerated pay. This may be harmless, it may be kind. One swallow proves not spring, but along with other things, suspicion will see in it, an attempt to coax officers now in the Army to dismount, to empty their saddles, in order that others may get on.

So hue and cry is raised because courts on motion, for cause shown in open court, have a right to purge juries in certain cases. No man in all the South, under thirty-five years of age, can be affected by this provision, because every such man was too young when the armies of the rebellion were recruited, to be subject to the provision complained of. As to the rest, the discretion is a wholesome one. But even if it were not, let me say in all kindness to Southern Senators, it was not wise to make it a part of this proceeding, and raise this uproar in regard to it.

Even the purpose, in part already executed, to remove the old and faithful officers of the Senate, even Union soldiers, that their places may be snatched by others—to overturn an order of the Senate which has existed for a quarter of a century, in order to grasp all the petty places here, seems to me unwise. It is not wise, if you want to disarm suspicion that you mean aggrandizing, gormandizing, unreasonable things.

Viewing all these doings in the light of party advantage—advantage to the party to which I belong, I could not deplore them; far from it; but wishing the repose of the country, and the real, lasting, ultimate welfare of the South, and wishing it from the bottom of my heart, I believe they are flagrantly unwise, hurtfully injudicious.

What the South needs is to heal, build, mend, plant, sow. In short, to go to work. Invite labor; cherish it; do not drive it out. Quit proscription, both for opinion's sake, and for color's sake. Reform it altogether. I know there are difficulties in the way. I know there is natural repugnance in the way; but drop passion, drop sentiment which signifies naught, and let the material prosperity and civilization of your land advance. Do not give so much energy, so much restless, sleepless activity, to an attempt so soon to get possession once more, and dominate and rule the country. There is room enough at the national board, and it is not needed, it is not decorous, plainly speaking, that the South should be the Mac Gregor at the table, and that the head of the table should be wherever he sits. For a good many reasons, it is not worth while to insist upon it.

Mr. President, one of Rome's famous legends stands in these words: "Let what each man thinks of the Republic be written on his brow." I have spoken in the spirit of this injunction. Meaning offense to no man, and holding ill-will to no man, because he comes from the South, or because he differs with me in political opinion, I have spoken frankly, but with malice toward none.

This session, and the bill pending, are acts in a partisan and political enterprise. This debate, begun after a caucus had defined and clenched the position of every man in the majority, has not been waged to convince anybody here. It has resounded to fire the democratic heart, to sound a blast to the cohorts of party, to beat the long-roll, and set the squadrons in the field. That is its object, as plainly to be seen, as the ultimate object of the attempted overthrow of laws.

Political speeches having been thus ordained, I have discussed political themes, and with ill-will to no portion of the country but good-will toward every portion of it, I have with candor spoken somewhat of my thoughts of the duties and dangers of the hour. [Applause on the floor and in the galleries.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further amendment offered the bill will be reported to the Senate.

Mr. BLAINE. I move to strike out the sixth section of the bill.

Mr. WITHERS. I was going to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that one or two other sections of the bill have not been acted on in Committee of the Whole and are under consideration.

Mr. BLAINE. We cannot go out of committee yet.

Mr. PADDOCK. I desire to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that I have offered an amendment to the sixth section.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will remember that his amendment was laid on the table and printed, and was not formally offered.

Mr. BLAINE. I have moved to strike out the sixth section of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is in order. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maine to strike out the sixth section of the bill. Is the Senate ready for the question?

Mr. MORRILL. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. VOORHEES. Let the section be reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The sixth section will be reported.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. That section 2002 of the Revised Statutes be amended so as to read as follows:

"No military or naval officer, or other person engaged in the civil, military, or naval service of the United States, shall order, bring, keep, or have under his authority or control any troops or armed men at the place where any general or special election is held in any State, unless it be necessary to repel the armed enemies of the United States: Provided, That nothing contained in this section, as now amended, shall be held or deemed to abridge or affect the duty or power of the President of the United States, under section 5297 of the Revised Statutes, enacted under and to enable the United States to comply with section 4 of article 4 of the Constitution of the United States, on application of the Legislature or executive, as provided for in said section."

And that section 5528 of the Revised Statutes be amended so as to read as follows:

"Every officer of the Army or Navy, or other person in the civil, military, or naval service of the United States, who orders, brings, keeps, or has under his authority or control any troops or armed men at any place where a general or special election is held in any State, unless such force be necessary to repel armed enemies of the United States, shall be fined not more than $5,000, and suffer imprisonment at hard labor not less than three months nor more than five years."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On striking out the section just read the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ALLISON, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. WHYTE.] I should vote in favor of striking out the section, and I presume he would vote against striking it out, if he were here.

Mr. BECK, (when his name was called.) I am paired upon this and all political questions with the Senator from Nevada, [Mr. JONES.] If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. HEREFORD, (when the name of Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia, was called.) I desire to say that my colleague [Mr. DAVIS] is paired with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. WINDOM] and is detained from the Senate on account of a death in his family. If my colleague were here, he would vote "nay." I presume the Senator from Minnesota would vote "yea."

Mr. EATON, (when his name was called.) I was paired with the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR,] but an arrangement has been made so that he stands paired with the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. MCPHERSON.] Therefore I vote "nay."

Mr. DAWES, (when the name of Mr. HOAR was called.) My colleague [Mr. HOAR] is necessarily absent from the city. He is paired on this question with the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. MCPHERSON.] My colleague would vote "yea," and the Senator from New Jersey would vote "nay."

Mr. MCDONALD, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. CARPENTER.] If he were present, I should vote "nay."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore, (when Mr. THURMAN'S name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.] If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. WALLACE, (when his name was called.) On this and all other political questions I am paired with my colleague, [Mr. CAMERON,] who is absent unavoidably. If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. WINDOM, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from West Virginia, [Mr. DAVIS.] If he were here, I should vote "yea."

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 25, nays 35; as follows:

YEAS—25.

Anthony,	Chandler,	Kellogg,	Plumb,
Bell,	Conkling,	Kirkwood,	Rollins,
Blaine,	Dawes,	Logan,	Saunders,
Booth,	Ferry,	McMillan,	Teller.
Bruce,	Hamlin,	Morrill,
Burnside,	Hill of Colorado,	Paddock,
Cameron of Wis.,	Ingalls,	Platt,

NAYS—35.

Bailey,	Garland,	Jonas,	Saulsbury,
Bayard,	Gordon,	Jones of Florida,	Slater,
Butler,	Groome,	Kernan,	Vance,
Call,	Grover,	Lamar,	Vest,
Cockrell,	Hampton,	Maxey,	Voorhees,
Coke,	Harris,	Morgan,	Walker,
Davis of Illinois,	Hereford,	Pendleton,	Williams,
Eaton,	Hill of Georgia,	Randolph,	Withers.
Farley,	Houston,	Ransom,

ABSENT—16.

Allison,	Davis of W. Va.,	Jones of Nevada,	Thurman,
Beck,	Edmunds,	McDonald,	Wallace,
Cameron of Pa.,	Hoar,	McPherson,	Whyte,
Carpenter,	Johnston,	Sharon,	Windom.

So the motion to strike out the sixth section was not agreed to.

Mr. BLAINE. I now move the amendment of which I gave notice, at the end of section 6 to insert the following words:

And any military, naval, or civil officer, or any other person, who shall, except for the purpose herein named, appear armed with a deadly weapon of any description, either concealed or displayed, within a mile of any polling place where a general or special election for Representative to Congress is being held, shall, on conviction, be punished with a fine not less than $500 nor more than $5,000, or with imprisonment for a period not less than six months nor more than five years, or with both fine and imprisonment, at the discretion of the court.

I ask that the vote be taken by yeas and nays. I desire without a single moment's detention to simply remark that I have adjusted the amendment to the penalties prescribed in the bill upon United States soldiers being present. I desire further to remark that with this amendment rejected, the section is a declaration that any one may go to the polls armed, and that with fifty armed men, twenty-five of them assailing and destroying the rights of voters, the other twenty-five cannot be used as a posse even to keep the peace against the assailants.

I have no desire to debate the amendment any further than to make that statement.

Mr. EATON. Mr. President, I have no desire to debate the amendment either. I simply wish to say that the intelligent people of the country will not so understand it. The States of this Union are capable of protecting the voters.

Mr. BLAINE. Yes, precisely; but the truth is, melancholy as it is to state it, that the States do not protect the voters, and the honorable Senator from Connecticut well knows they do not. The people understand that. Reports are on our desks filled to overflowing with instances of poll after poll being intimidated by persons with arms in their hands, and you say by rejecting this amendment that not even the civil police of the United States shall be present, but that whoever chooses to appear with arms in their hands, with dirks, bowie-knives, shot-guns, shall not be restrained in any way by any United States authority at a United States election. I ask the honorable Senator, representing a peaceful and law-abiding State, if he will vote that way and misrepresent his constituents?

Mr. EATON. It is not for the Senator from Maine to tell me what I know or what I do not know. What he knows he may tell. I deny that any argument of this sort can be made with any propriety. I beg to say to the Senator from Maine that I know the people I represent on this floor, and I vote, gladly vote, against this amendment. The people of Connecticut will take care of their ballot-boxes; the people of Maine will take care of their ballot-boxes; and we do not desire the interposition of Federal authority. I am instructed by my people to vote against all authority of this character.

Mr. BLAINE. In what form of instruction did that come?

Mr. EATON. It came in a form that I well understand, and I am not amenable to the Senator from Maine.

Mr. BLAINE. The form of instruction the Senator got was an overwhelming republican victory that sent a republican colleague here. That is the last expression of Connecticut. Is that the instruction the honorable Senator got?

Mr. EATON. No, sir; that is not the instruction. It is the little whispering I hear on the wind that the next election in Connecticut will be an overwhelming democratic victory.

Mr. BLAINE. Oh, yes; it is not the facts of the case that the Senator has; it is the dreams that he indulges in!

Mr. EATON. One word more, Mr. President. While my honorable friend from Maine is taking occasion to tell me with regard to Connecticut, let him look at his own burial-places at home. [Laughter in the galleries.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Order! The Chair will be compelled to enforce the rule with respect to the galleries unless order is preserved.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, I do not rise to participate at all in what might be called debate, and still less as an arbiter between the Senator from Maine and the Senator from Connecticut as to which will be buried first. I think, however, if the Senator from Maine will look at the character of the Maine elections last year and the character of the governor who now presides over the destinies of his State, he will be less inclined to speak of his neighbors abroad if he will pay proper attention to the changes and revolutions going on at home.

But that is not what I rose to speak about. I have no taste for that style of debate. This amendment, however, proposed by the Senator from Maine is adroitly put, as indeed all his measures are, and with a political end in view; and my purpose is to state why I shall vote against it.

The first impression on the mind is as a matter of course against anybody wearing concealed weapons either on election day or any other day, at the polls or at any other place. So the people of Indiana have thought, and we have a law on our statute-book against carrying concealed weapons, a law which we consider sufficient for all purposes, a State enactment which we consider enough for election day or for any other public occasion.

I do not intend that the public shall lose sight of the point presented by this amendment. It is an attempt to legislate by Federal authority upon a purely State matter, and upon a matter in regard to which every State in this Union has already its laws. The Senator from Maine knows that his own State has laws on this subject. The Senator from Maine knows that if this amendment should pass Congress, it would simply be cumulative to, in addition to, or superseding, the laws of his own State in regard to carrying weapons at the election polls or any place else. So in regard to every other State represented on this floor.

Mr. President, we must suppose that the people of this Union in their capacity of States have some regard for public morality; that they have some regard for the public peace. Has it come to this, that we are to distrust the States of this Union? Are we to distrust the people, acting through their State Legislatures? Can they do nothing? The distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] to-day depicted the scenes of outrage in the city of New York. A sufficient answer to him is, why has not that great State, with himself at the head of it and his own party in the ascendency, passed laws, which they have a full right to do, to control and regulate and repress those outrages?

Sir, this whole legislation is in distrust of the people. This whole legislation is contrary to and subversive and in violation of the first elementary principles of this Government, which were that on the virtue and intelligence of the people our Government can safely rest. A new school of doctrinaires have risen here who say that you cannot trust the people. From the great Empire State comes the voice that you are to have repressive legislation from Congress or else New York herself is in a state of riot and disorder. Why not call upon the law-making power of the States if wrong is done?

I say to the Senator from Maine that neither his State nor my State needs this legislation to protect the polls from riot and disorder. As to the question of fact which he repeatedly thrusts in here as to whether there are scenes of violence and disorder at election places in other States, I will not dispute with him. I have my view and he has his. He read here yesterday afternoon from the report of a committee the testimony of witnesses and based his pungent, strong, terse arraignment of the democratic party on this side upon that testimony. We are not insensible to the power of the Senator from Maine; but I say to him that all the conclusion to be drawn from his arraignment of yesterday and again to-day is that he was reading from witnesses who were taken into court within the last week before whom? Before Judge Bond, one of the swiftest, speediest, and I say cruelest and most unjust of the Federal judiciary of the United States. They were sworn before juries who were purged of the last remnant, not simply of the rebellion, but of the democratic party; before juries to whom the question as to whether they had served in the rebellion or not was put to democrats but not to republicans. Men who had served in the rebellion were allowed to sit on those juries without examination if they had joined the republican party. Yet, upon the testimony produced here by the Senator from Maine which he has thrust before the country, in a court presided over by Judge Bond, before juries purged and winnowed of the last element that sympathized with the rebellion or with the democratic party, I do not know of a single conviction that was obtained. The press in its telegraphic column informs us that the prosecutions have fallen to the ground. The Senator from Maine said yesterday upon a technicality. What kind of a technicality? You had your republican district attorneys to draw the indictment. Where is your efficient civil service? You have the courts, you have the district attorneys, you have the judges, you have the juries, and you say you have the evidence there; and yet the witnesses when produced in court were discredited by your own tribunal.

Mr. BLAINE. Will the honorable Senator, before he sits down, be good enough to allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. VOORHEES. Yes.

Mr. BLAINE. I do not know what intelligence the Senator has in regard to the result of the trials in South Carolina. All that I saw in the public press in regard to them was that there was some sort of hugger-mugger there in which the republicans who were prosecuted by the State should be allowed to go free if the democrats prosecuted in the Federal courts should be allowed to go free. The papers of to-day show that Smalls, who has been held up as a thief, is pardoned; that Cardozo, who has been held up as a defaulter, is to go free; that Chamberlain, who was indicted, is not to be tried; that a great series of trials that were to come off in behalf of the State of South Carolina have suddenly been abandoned, and by some sort of an arrangement, I do not know what, by some sort of judicial hugger-mugger, all the prosecutions in the United States courts are abandoned. Is that what the honorable Senator from Indiana means by having these cases fail?

Mr. VOORHEES. I will answer the Senator. I congratulate myself, I congratulate the Senate and the country on one step of progress that I have made with the Senator from Maine. For the first time I have caused him to admit that his own people were scoundrels and in a hugger-mugger to cheat justice down in South Carolina. That is a specific charge. Who is embraced in his charge? Is Judge Bond?

Mr. BLAINE. If the Senator wants my answer, I did not assert the guilt of Smalls; I did not assert the guilt of Cardozo. I believe that Carpenter was the victim of judicial tyranny and corruption as much as any man who ever was punished in this world. I believe L. Cass Carpenter was convicted without testimony; and I say here that the charge of the judge in the Carpenter case would have disgraced a pupil of Jeffreys on the bloody assizes in England. I do not know who the judge was, and therefore I make no personal remark whatever in that.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President——

Mr. VOORHEES. Then, Mr. President——

Mr. BLAINE. Wait a moment. I say I believe all these men were prosecuted, just as Chamberlain was, for political reasons. What sort of influences have been used in South Carolina to make up this trade—a trade that began in the Ellenton cases, when the President of the United States telegraphed to the district attorney of South Carolina that out of fifty-seven men indicted for interfering and conspiring against the peace at the elections in many and divers quarters he need prepare for the trial of but one——

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President——

Mr. BLAINE. Wait a moment. And I am glad that both the Senators from South Carolina are on the floor, so that they can correct me if I am wrong.

It was then understood that that trade was sufficient to get the republicans out, but they held on to the republican victims. In other words, South Carolina held the hostages after the others had been given up; and now it seems another twist has been made through some sort of Federal intervention, and that it took another holocaust of these victims to bring out those who were persecuted under the judicial tyranny of South Carolina. That is what I mean.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, the Senator from Maine and I have served long together, and he knows my kind sentiments toward him, and consequently he imposes a longer speech than my own upon an interruption; but if he has answered my question now, I should like somebody to rise and tell me how it is answered. I will not ask him, for he would take the floor for the next half hour, [laughter;] but if anybody can understand how he has answered my question I should like to know it. I asked the question based on his own statement that a trade had been made, or that strange word which I do not know that I ever heard before, a hugger-mugger in court. I asked him who was embraced in that sweeping accusation. I asked him whether Bond was. I am ready to believe almost anything the Senator will say against Bond.

Mr. BLAINE. I have nothing to say against Judge Bond.

Mr. VOORHEES. I asked him whether it embraced the officers of the United States court, and he got up and said he did not think Smalls was guilty. I did not ask him his opinion about his brother Smalls. Why, says he, "I did not say Cardozo was guilty." I had not asked him any such question as that. The Senator from Maine has his own way of debating, and he must pardon me if I desire to have distinct understandings as we go along. Now the Senator from Maine has been driven in this discussion to admit that a trade in defeat of justice and in fraud of justice has been made in South Carolina and that his own friends down there, whether he characterizes them as guilty or not, to escape the whip of justice went to trading with those who he says were guilty on our side. I am in the same condition that the Senator is, as to persons on our side. I do not know whether they were guilty or not. I know this: they were tried in your court. They were tried before your Jeffreys; they were tried before packed juries; they were tried on the testimony of witnesses whose names the Senator has rung in the Senate Chamber; and they have been acquitted. Whether it is by a trade or a hugger-mugger or not I do not know; and if it is so, it is to the discredit of the republican judiciary holding that court down there.

Mr. BLAINE. I asked the honorable Senator when I first rose whether he had any information on that subject other than that in the public prints. He did not stop to answer.

Mr. VOORHEES. How could they make an arrangement by which a trade should be made?

Mr. BLAINE. Does the honorable Senator possess any information in regard to the events in South Carolina of yesterday and the day before, other than that in the public prints?

Mr. VOORHEES. No, sir; I have not. I have been trying to get some from the Senator from Maine, but have failed most signally.

Mr. BLAINE. What the Senator from Maine desires to say is this: that the men who were taken up and prosecuted under the State of South Carolina and attempted to be disgraced and branded throughout Christendom were either guilty or not guilty. If they were not guilty, it was a disgrace for South Carolina to push their prosecution; if they were guilty, I will not say what it was for South Carolina to bargain and barter in a matter affecting the welfare of some others who were indicted in other courts.

Mr. BUTLER rose.

Mr. VOORHEES. The Senator from Maine makes a definite charge directly or by imputation upon South Carolina; he says it was a bad thing for her to make a trade; let the Senator state what knowledge he has to justify the statement.

Mr. BLAINE. What knowledge! The honorable Senator is very hard to please. I have this knowledge: I have the knowledge from the public prints that Judge Bond dismissed the prosecution in the Federal court on an alleged technicality of indictment, and at the same time, by one of those happy coincidences which represent cause and effect, the State courts of South Carolina or the executive of South Carolina, or whatever was the appropriate power in the State government of South Carolina, released and discontinued the prosecutions against the republicans that they had been pushing. That is what I said, and I only stated what was last night asserted in the Evening Star. That is my authority. If the honorable Senator has any other or different authority, I wish he would enlighten the Senate.

Mr. VOORHEES. My information is that there has not been a case disposed of except those that have gone to juries and where there have been acquittals.

Mr. BLAINE. I do not so understand it at all.

Mr. VOORHEES. I do; and when it was found that they could not convict upon the wretched testimony the Senator has paraded here, the district attorney, deeming discretion the better part of valor, continued the cases that were left on the docket.

Mr. BLAINE. That may be. The dispatch was not sufficiently full to give me exact information as to what the process was; but the one thing that arrested my attention, and, I think, will arrest the attention of the country, was that there happened to be a contemporaneous abandonment of prosecuting those men who had violated election laws in the Federal courts and prosecuting the republicans, big and little, black and white, in the State courts.

Mr. VOORHEES. The Senator knows that it takes two parties to make a bargain, one on one side and the other on the other. The Senator from Maine can accuse the authorities of the State of South Carolina; in a few moments I shall yield the floor, and the Senators from South Carolina will take care of themselves. I say that it takes two parties to make a bargain. He accused the State of South Carolina, through her officers, of being one party. Then, as a matter of course, the Federal judiciary, either the judge or the district attorney, or both, must be on the other side the parties to this bargain, or, in the classic language of the Senator from Maine, this hugger-mugger in fraud of justice; and there that matter has to rest, and there is no escape from it.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I will make but one single remark in reply to the Senator from Maine. South Carolina is quite able to take care of herself without any suggestions or reflections of that Senator; and fortunately for us there is nothing to sustain the charge which he makes, except his own statements, and if they are not more correct than a great many others that he has made in this Chamber they will not go for very much.

Now, sir, I say that so far as Smalls and Cardozo were concerned, his friends, it was determined weeks ago, I think, that they should be pardoned.

Mr. BLAINE. Did the public know anything about it?

Mr. BUTLER. I do not know that the public knew anything of it.

Mr. BLAINE. Does the Senator state that the public in any way knew anything about it?

Mr. BUTLER. I do not know whether the public knew anything about it, and I do not care.

Mr. BLAINE. That is the very point of the whole thing.

Mr. BUTLER. And I undertake to say that the cases against Mr. Chamberlain and against the others have not been discontinued. Therefore the statement made by the Senator is not true.

Mr. BLAINE. I only stated what was in the public prints. That was all.

Mr. BUTLER. Precisely; but the Senator gets up and makes these statements without regard to whether they are true or not, but so far as he is concerned he stands sponsor for them. As I said, fortunately for South Carolina, there is nothing to sustain the charge which he makes against her except his own unsupported statement. There has been no discontinuance of the prosecutions against those persons. I hope the time will come when they will all be discontinued in the interest of peace. I have advised it for the last twelve months, and I shall continue to advise it; and if the Senator denounces it as a bargain, let him denounce it. I think, Mr. President, the people of South Carolina can take care of her interests and her honor just as well without the dictation of the honorable Senator as with it; and yet he has been hurling again and again his anathemas against her, which I submit, if he will pardon me for saying so, is not becoming an American Senator.

I understand that Cardozo and Smalls have been pardoned, and I am glad they have been pardoned, but the cases against the others have not been discontinued. I think they ought to be; I am very frank to say so. I think they all ought to be, and, if I am not very much misinformed, the honorable Senator had the same opinion twelve months ago.

Mr. BLAINE. They never ought to have been condemned. That is the opinion of "the honorable Senator" if you want to hear it.

Mr. BUTLER. Ah, Mr. President, they ought never to have been commenced, nor ought many of the prosecutions in the United States courts ever to have been commenced. When the Senator talks about a bargain having been made in regard to the Ellenton prisoners, and some dispatches sent from Washington by the Executive, does the honorable Senator know that the Chief-Justice of the United States was presiding at those trials? Would he make a bargain? Does the honorable Senator charge that upon him?

Mr. BLAINE. Does the honorable Senator from South Carolina know that the Chief-Justice said it was impossible to procure a conviction?

Mr. BUTLER. No, sir.

Mr. BLAINE. He did say so, sir.

Mr. BUTLER. I know nothing of the kind, Mr. President, but I do know this that there were trials of thirteen of those prisoners and a mistrial; and if any bargain was made, upon the head of the Chief-Justice must the charge of the Senator fall, because he was there presiding in that court, and I know that twelve men were tried and a mistrial was the result of it. What may have been the opinion of the Chief-Justice upon that subject I do not know, but perhaps the Senator does.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, it is very well for the Senator from South Carolina to speak of my hurling anathemas at his State. He tried yesterday to get me to state anything of that kind upon my personal knowledge. I read to him the arraignment that I made which was pertinent to this debate, and I read it from the testimony of James B. Campbell, and I took care to ask the honorable Senator before I read that testimony whether he was a reputable man. He is a democrat, I understand, a democrat who upon his own testimony was outraged with the injustice of the legislation of South Carolina. I brought nothing in the shape of anathema against South Carolina except legal evidence sworn to by one of her first citizens; and did I introduce this subject? It was the honorable Senator from Indiana who brought up this subject of the trials; I did not lug it in here. He brought it here to me that in contravention and contradiction of the testimony I had read there had been a conclusive adjudication in the Federal courts in South Carolina, and that everything I had read was disproved thereby.

I wanted then the honorable Senator from Indiana to state to me, as I would like the honorable Senator from South Carolina to do, whether he has any information other than that in the public press. If they have not, all that they can state and all that any man can state is that some sort of arrangement outside of trial, outside of judicial proceedings, governed by political arrangements was made by which a mutual release should be ordered on the part of the State of the criminals that South Carolina had prosecuted and on the part of the Government of the United States of the criminals the United States had prosecuted. That was all I stated, and the honorable Senator did not hear my language correctly, if he did not understand me as referring to the Evening Star of last evening as containing the information to which I alluded.

Mr. BUTLER. I never read the Evening Star.

Mr. BLAINE. Then the Senator is not so well informed as I am on the subject, and when the Senator tells the public that this was determined on three weeks ago, I ask him if there was any publication of the fact? If it was determined on three weeks ago, why was it not announced? Why was it held suspended? If a man was to be pardoned why was it held back? I am waiting for the honorable Senator to explain that.

But there is no occasion for striking attitudes. This is a question of fact; it is a question of debate upon evidence gathered before a committee of the Senate; and I am not to be deterred from discussing that by the gentleman trying to arraign me for abusing South Carolina. I have said not one word about South Carolina nor about any officer of South Carolina other than that which is contained in the report of a special committee of the Senate, and I do not propose to be dragged unnecessarily into any personal issues outside of that. I hold the Senator to the record, I hold him to the testimony of a man for whose veracity he stands sponsor and voucher, and I ask him not to answer me by stating anything in the shape of menace; I ask him to answer a reputable citizen of his own State at the bar of the Senate.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, it certainly is not my habit, it never has been my habit to utter a menace against anybody, much less against a Senator on this floor. I have uttered no menace against the honorable Senator from Maine. If there has been any menacing in this debate, it has come from him.

I understand the honorable Senator to refer to certain disgraceful transactions by the authorities of South Carolina, and now he rises and says that he has never arraigned that State. If that is not an arraignment, I submit to the honorable Senator that he himself does not understand the English language.

Mr. BLAINE. If the Senator will permit me at that point, I stated to the honorable Senator from Indiana that if the arrangement made between the two courts, State and Federal, was as he referred to and was as telegraphed to the papers, it was disgraceful, disgraceful alike to the Federal authorities and to the State. I do not limit my criticism to the State. I put it hypothetically. I know nothing but what has been transmitted by telegraph to the public press, and on that the case is against both parties.

Mr. BUTLER. But, Mr. President, the Senator, without any qualification until I called his attention to it, arraigned the State, and he has never until now arraigned the Federal authorities as having been guilty of disgraceful conduct. I am very glad that the Senator has qualified his remark. If he had done that in the first instance this colloquy would not have been necessary.

Mr. BLAINE. I spoke of the judicial hugger-mugger, a word the honorable Senator from Indiana did not seem ever to have heard before, which meant a covering up on both sides. I have made no remark which I have qualified; I have made none which I desire to qualify. If the honorable Senator has misunderstood me that is his misfortune; it is certainly not my fault.

Mr. BUTLER. That is true, sir. Now, in reference to one other subject to which the honorable Senator has referred, he says that he produced the testimony of Mr. James B. Campbell, for whose veracity and character I vouched. Does the honorable Senator not know, or does he know, that that gentleman was a defeated candidate, nominated by the republican convention in the county of Charleston, running independent; and smarting, I have no doubt, under the defeat which he received overwhelmingly, he lashed himself into a fury and went before that committee, and I do not believe, in his cooler moments, he would repeat what he there stated.

Mr. BLAINE. It is very novel that a defeated candidate for the senatorial office in a State cannot tell the truth under oath.

Mr. BUTLER. I did not say that he could not tell the truth, and the Senator shall not put words into my mouth; I said no such thing. I simply mentioned that fact by way of illustrating the animus which actuated Mr. Campbell. As to these charges of bargaining by the State and Federal authorities, and as to the fact that Governor Simpson did not see fit to announce beforehand that he intended to pardon Cardozo and Smalls, I know nothing. I know nothing about the reason why the governor did it; I suppose he had good and sufficient reasons. But as I said a while ago, I am glad he did it. The cases in Charleston have been continued, and there is no court sitting in Columbia to continue the cases against the republicans who were charged; therefore the statement falls to the ground.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, this has all been a diversion from the main point. I had one word to say to the honorable Senator from Indiana about the serious side of the question. He states, and I have no doubt with absolute correctness—his statement will be taken by me at any time—that there is no danger whatever in Indiana from any evil leveled at by the amendment which I have had the honor to propose, but the honorable Senator carries in that remark the heresy announced by the Senator from Kentucky yesterday, [Mr. WILLIAMS,] that Representatives in Congress are State officers, and that in Maine I have no right to take care of anything that concerns the election of a Representative in Indiana.

Mr. VOORHEES. I said nothing of the kind.

Mr. BLAINE. I said it carried this within it——

Mr. VOORHEES. I gave no opinion on that point.

Mr. BLAINE. Then does the honorable Senator agree with me? If he does not take that view does he agree with me that in a Congress in which we all sit, where all the States are represented, Indiana and Maine have the right to see that there is a fair election in South Carolina and Connecticut. Does not the honorable Senator from Connecticut agree with me that Connecticut has an interest in the election in Virginia, and that Virginia is interested in the election in Maine? I am only asking for a common and a general law. I am not asking to put upon the Southern States a solitary restriction that I do not ask to put on the Northern States. I am not asking to prescribe a qualification for Ohio that Maine is not willing to submit to, nor for the South that the North is not willing to submit to. I ask that there shall be a free election. I ask in the name of common justice, I ask in the name of common patriotism, I ask, Mr. President, in the name of common decency, that the American Congress shall not say on a bill wherein they debar the military force of the United States from being present in any event that ruffians, thugs, rowdies, and bloody-minded men may surround the polls with the weapons of destruction and of death, as has been done time, and time, and time again, as I read from the testimony yesterday.

Let us, if we are to have a fair election, decree here and now that any man is an offender who approaches the polls with a deadly weapon. Let us on that day, when peace should reign throughout all our borders, when the sick and the maimed and the blind and the halt go out to the polls to exercise a freeman's privilege in the North and the South, the East and the West—let us agree that then all shall be unarmed and that there shall be absolute peace for the weak as well as for the strong.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, the Senator from Maine asks me whether I agree with him that Indiana and Maine should join together and make regulations to control the elections in other States. That involves the point of radical difference between the Senator from Maine and myself.

Mr. BLAINE. Does the honorable Senator say that I asked him that question?

Mr. VOORHEES. I understood him to do so.

Mr. BLAINE. No. Will he agree to have me correct him?

Mr. VOORHEES. Why, certainly.

Mr. BLAINE. I think the honorable Senator draws a very long bow to his imagination when he states that I asked that Indiana and Maine should do it. I asked no such thing. I asked that the Congress of thirty-eight great commonwealths, interested alike each in the other's elections, should unitedly prescribe a common rule for all.

Mr. VOORHEES. Now, the notes will show that the Senator from Maine said no such thing. He never used the words "thirty-eight States." He did use the words "Maine and Indiana." He meant the thirty-eight States, and within thirty-six States he was right for he only mentioned two, and he mentioned them by name; and I appeal to the Reporter's notes for the verification of this statement. But that is neither here nor there. I take him for what he meant. He meant the Congress of the United States and he illustrated the Congress of the United States by the proposed union between Maine and Indiana. Mr. President, I repeat that involves the point of radical difference between the Senator from Maine and myself, and between the school to which he belongs and the school to which I belong. I belong to that school in government which believes it is best to mind your own business and let other people do the same as to theirs. I belong to that school of politics which trusts the people of the United States under their various political organizations. I belong to that school of politics which believes that the people of a State have certain duties that you cannot limit here, and that they are competent to perform them, and I believe in their virtue and their intelligence to discharge them. The Senator from Maine belongs to that meddlesome school which is never happy except in some missionary colporteur enterprise, going abroad to correct peoples' morals and politics a long ways from home. The Senator from Maine is disturbed about the people of South Carolina, much disturbed about the people of Louisiana. I am not. There is the difference between us. I believe that the people who have sent the two Senators from South Carolina to this body are as competent, in their intelligence, their virtue, and their patriotism, to regulate their own affairs according to the highest standard of civilized morality as the people of Maine or the people of Indiana. I have faith in the American people. All the people of this country are my countrymen. The trouble with the Senator from Maine and those who train with him on the other side of the Chamber is that they have a deep distrust, that they have had a long hatred, they have had a long acrimonious spell of political hatred toward the people of the South. It is not possible for them to trust that people; and however well-behaved and disposed the people of the South may be, however upright in their motives, however determined to disarm hostile criticism, they may sit up nights, spend sleepless nights as well as vigilant days to show the propriety of their conduct, it will not disarm criticism on that side of the Chamber, it will not disarm distrust, because the political party represented by the Senator from Maine feeds, thrives, prospers, grows fat, and spreads its branches broad and wide on every trouble and every speck of lawlessness that occurs under the southern sky. You deceive nobody. I have for years in the other end of this Capitol seen the republican party build itself up upon disturbances alleged, sometimes real but most often unreal, throughout the South; and it would be contrary to human nature if the leaders of the republican party had not sent, as they often have, their emissaries, those carpet-baggers, to stir up strife between the two races down there because of the political capital that it would bring to the republican party in the North.

Consequently the Senator from Maine distrusts the people of South Carolina, and wants thirty-eight States—he named two, but he has got now to thirty-eight—to rush down and take charge of their affairs. He distrusts the people represented so well upon this floor by the Senator from Louisiana in my rear, [Mr. JONAS,] and he wants to spread his broad mantle of care, parental guardianship and protection over them.

Mr. President, that was not the Government our fathers made. I say here on this floor that that was not the Government that the fathers made when they framed this Constitution. They made a Government and allotted its powers to different localities, trusted the people to carry out and discharge their duties under those powers in good faith, and the trouble with that side of the Chamber is that that lesson of our Government has escaped them, and they have had their hands on the necks of the southern people and they are reluctant ever to withdraw them.

I think I have answered the Senator from Maine whether he and I and the rest of the States shall gather around and proclaim a protectorate over the people of any other State. When the people of a State, of such a thing should happen, become outlawed from civilized government, that raises a different question. But while their State is represented on this floor, while all the machinery of the State government is in operation smoothly and harmoniously, no greater outrage, according to my notions of government, can be proposed than for us to invade their local affairs and tear from them the control of their own matters

Mr. BLAINE. Then I understand the honorable Senator from Indiana is opposed to having two supervisors sent down?

Mr. VOORHEES. Yes, sir, I am. I am opposed to everything in the shape or name of supervisor. If I had my way I would not leave them standing as mere scare-crows; they should vanish from the polls.

Mr. BLAINE. Do I understand that the Senator will vote against that or against permitting that to be done.

Mr. VOORHEES. I will if I have a chance.

Mr. BLAINE. What prevents the Senator having a chance? Is he not permitted to do as he wishes? Will the honorable Senator tell the Senate why he does not vote that way?

Mr. VOORHEES. If the Senator doubts it and wants to put it to the test in any possible way, he will be accommodated most speedily.

Mr. BLAINE. What does the Senator mean?

Mr. VOORHEES. Whether I am permitted to do as I wish or not.

Mr. BLAINE. What does the Senator mean?

Mr. VOORHEES. Simply that I am free in my actions toward the Senator from Maine, and I am free in my action as a member of my own party, and free in another thing: in informing the Senator that I am not to be catechized in regard to my relations to my own party by him.

Mr. BLAINE. I inferred of course from the large line of liberty the Senator assumed that he would not possibly vote for permitting the two supervisors to remain.

Mr. VOORHEES. Oh, let me explain to the Senator frankly and squarely——

Mr. BLAINE. I thought the Senator had concluded with such a tremendous flourish that nothing more was needed.

Mr. VOORHEES. There is no use of by-play between the Senator and me. The Senator knows as well as I do that if I could have shaped this proposed legislation entirely myself and carried it through, I would not have left a shadow of a supervisor standing, but as I cannot I take the next best thing, and that is, destroy all their powers.

Mr. BLAINE. You take the next best thing, and leave the shadow standing.

Mr. VOORHEES. I take all their powers away. The Senator from Maine is not unmindful of the fact, that even great as he is—I am a very humble person—he cannot have his way altogether in his own party always to the fullest extent. He has come very near it, but has still fallen short sometimes.

Mr. BLAINE. I infer of course that the honorable Senator will go against having the shadows remaining. I infer also that the honorable Senator, if he had the power, would prevent any soldiers or any armed men being present at any poll in the Southern States. I infer that the Senator, if he could stretch the benign laws of Indiana over distant Commonwealths, would do it in order that there might be as fair an election elsewhere as he enjoys at home. But, Mr. President, it will not do for the honorable Senator to evade his responsibility; it will not do for a Senator belonging to that side of the Chamber that have resolved to support and are pledged to support a bill involving all there is of Federal intervention to get off in this way. Let me repeat that I say they are pledged to support a bill involving the entire principle of Federal intervention in elections for Representatives to Congress, even including my friend from Kentucky, who thinks they are only State officers. It will not do for the Senator from Indiana voting to send two supervisors to each poll, to back out of prohibiting armed men from being there on the ground that he will not intervene. He has given away that point of refuge. He will vote in this Senate, I venture humbly to predict, to intervene; he will vote in the course of time in this Senate for a bill that will permit two supervisors to be at the polls; he will by his vote declare it to be in the power of the General Government to intervene in elections in States; every democratic Senator on that side of the Chamber will vote that way; if I were permitted to say it every democratic Representative in the other end of the Capitol will vote that way; and they cannot evade and they cannot dodge the responsibility of permitting armed mobs to surround the polls on the ground that they cannot intervene in State elections. They have intervened; they propose to intervene. Every democratic Representative and every democratic Senator proposes to intervene.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE,] upon which the yeas and nays have been demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. PENDLETON. Let the amendment be reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment of Mr. BLAINE.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BECK, (when his name was called.) I desire to repeat that I am paired with the Senator from Nevada, [Mr. JONES.] I should vote "nay" if at liberty to do so.

Mr. HEREFORD, (when the name of Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia, was called.) I desire to say that my colleague [Mr. DAVIS] is paired with the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. WINDOM.] If here, my colleague would vote "nay" and the Senator from Minnesota "yea."

Mr. MORRILL, (when Mr. EDMUNDS's name was called.) My colleague [Mr. EDMUNDS] is paired with the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN.] If here, my colleague would vote for the amendment, and I suppose the Senator from Ohio would vote against it.

Mr. GROOME, (when his name was called.) The Senator from Maine [Mr. HAMLIN] is out of the Chamber for a few moments. During that temporary absence I am paired with him. If he were here, he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay."

Mr. DAWES, (when Mr. HOAR's name was called.) I have already announced that my colleague [Mr. HOAR] is necessarily absent from the city. He is paired on this question with the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. MCPHERSON.] My colleague, if present, would vote "yea" and the Senator from New Jersey "nay."

Mr. MCDONALD, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. CARPENTER.] If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. WINDOM, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from West Virginia, [Mr. DAVIS.] Were he here, I should vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. GROOME. The Senator from Maine [Mr. HAMLIN] having returned to the Chamber, I vote "nay."

Mr. ALLISON. On all questions relating to this bill I am paired with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. WHYTE,] who is absent.

The result was announced—yeas 25, nays 35; as follows:

Cockrell,	Edmunds,	McPherson,	Windom.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WINDOM. I offer the following, to come in at the end of section 6:

That any person who shall, with intent to hinder, obstruct, or prevent the free exercise of the right of suffrage, appear armed with a deadly weapon of any description, either concealed or displayed, within a mile of any polling place where a general or special election for Representative to Congress is being held, shall, on conviction, be punished with a fine of not less than five hundred nor more than five thousand dollars, or with imprisonment for a period not less than six months nor more than five years, or with both fine and imprisonment, at the discretion of the court.

Mr. President, the majority of the Senate has already voted that it is or should be a criminal offense punished by a fine of $500 or five years' imprisonment in the penitentiary, or both, for any person, either civil or military, to protect the ballot-box against violence. Even where the use of force is necessary to keep the peace at the polls, it shall be a criminal offense thus severely punished. The majority of the Senate has also just voted that to surround the polls by men armed with deadly weapons shall not be an offense against national laws provided these armed men do not come to keep the peace. Now I want to know whether the same majority is ready to vote that where armed ruffians and murderers shall surround the polls "with intent to hinder, obstruct, or prevent the free exercise of the right of suffrage," it shall not be an offense against our laws. I submit the amendment to test the judgments and feeling of the Senate on that point.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I just want to say to the Senator from Minnesota that the majority in the Senate do not intend that the Senator from Minnesota or that side of the Chamber shall shape this bill. We intend to vote this bill as it was reported here, and he may offer all the amendments he pleases. We know the animus by which he is animated in doing it. We intend to shape the legislation in this bill, and the Senator can save himself a good deal of trouble without undertaking to intrude upon our determination with these various amendments.

Mr. WINDOM. One purpose I had in view was to ascertain precisely how far your caucus decrees had gone. Now I ascertain from the Senator from Delaware that they have gone to the extent of forbidding all amendments no matter what they may be on this bill.

Mr. WITHERS. I feel authorized to state that the caucus has expressed no opinion and given no instructions whatever in regard to it, so far as I am apprised.

Mr. WINDOM. I will ask the Senator if there is not a managing committee of the caucus that has charge of this bill?

Mr. WITHERS. No, sir; not one word has been spoken by the executive committee or any other person about it.

Mr. WINDOM. I asked the Senator for information on this subject.

Mr. WITHERS. The Senator must remember that we are not as well skilled in our caucuses in prescribing the duties of legislation as the other side. We have had no caucus on these provisions of this bill. The Committee on Appropriations have reported this bill just as they in their judgment deemed best, and so far as I know there has been no expression of opinion by any caucus on the subject.

Mr. WINDOM. I should like to ask the Senator from Delaware, who speaks apparently with authority on this subject, from whom he derives his commission to say that it is of no sort of use for myself or anybody else on this side of the Chamber to offer an amendment to this bill?

Mr. SAULSBURY. I will say to the Senator from Minnesota that I have been a member of the Senate long enough to learn that the majority of the Senate always shapes its legislation. I remember to have seen the most obnoxious measures brought here by the Senator's own party, coming here I suppose from caucus decrees and forced upon the people of the country; measures of tyranny, measures of oppression. The democrats have fought against them, have called the attention of the country to their obnoxious laws until the people have waked up to the iniquities of his party, and have made them the minority party in this Chamber, and we now do not intend to let that minority party which has had the condemnation of the country come up here and shape our legislation. They have ruined themselves. They ought to be content with that and not seek to ruin us by their interference with our measures. [Laughter.]

Mr. WINDOM. Mr. President, we have heard to-day from the honorable Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] how this majority got its place upon this floor. I will not repeat what has been so well said by him. It is yet ringing in the ears of my honorable friend from Delaware. I want to ask him this, however: Suppose that this amendment which I have proposed is right and will improve the bill, then will the Senator vote it down and call upon his united party to do so simply because a member of the minority proposes it?

Mr. SAULSBURY. Well, I do not know; I will not say that nothing good can come out of Nazareth; but at the same time we think that we are fully competent to shape legislation while we are in the majority in this body.

Now, in reference to what has been said to-day. I have heard a great deal said to-day and a great deal said during this discussion that has no foundation in fact. I have heard it said here that the people of Delaware were protected by Federal troops in the right of free suffrage. Why, sir, I am a citizen of the State of Delaware, and like my colleague I voted under the protection, as it has been called, of Federal bayonets, when I saw with my own eyes Federal soldiers, at the dictation of a man in my town who was appointed provost-marshal, charge twice upon the polls at which I voted, and one man who was knocked down by the Federal bayonets was taken into my own office. I have seen the effects of your Federal troops, and I am prepared by my vote to wipe out and take from the President of the United States and from the Commander-in-Chief of the Army the right to send his troops to grant that kind of protection to the freemen of this country. Sir, I have heard a great deal and I am prepared to vote for this bill and to abide by it now, henceforth, and forever. Amen. [Great laughter.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair must remind persons present that the rule will be enforced, even to clearing the galleries, if there is not order kept; and there must be order kept on the floor of the Senate, too.

Mr. WINDOM. Mr. President, the honorable Senator from Delaware has a very great apprehension of soldiers I perceive, and I want to state to him that there is not a soldier in this amendment of mine. The Senator can dismiss all apprehension upon that subject. It does not say one word about soldiers. The majority of Senators have already voted that there shall not be a soldier about the polls to protect them from the violence of the armed ruffians and rowdies who thwart the will of the people by terrorism and murder. They have already voted too, or will very soon do it, that no civil officer shall be there with power to protect the polls from violence. They have also just voted that it is not an offense for armed men to come about the polls. Now, I want to have the Senator distinctly understand that the proposition I make is that where armed men come to the polls for the express and avowed purpose of violence and ruffianism, to break down the barriers that are provided for the protection of the ballot-box, and such intent can be proved, they shall be punished, and I want to know whether the Senator from Connecticut intends to vote that they shall not be punished when they come with that intent, and that intent is proved in the courts?

Mr. EATON. The Senator has asked me a question; now I want to put one first in all kindness, and I know that my friend will not for a moment suppose that I doubt his sincerity——

Mr. WINDOM. Not in the least.

Mr. EATON. For I believe him to be a very sincere gentleman. Now, if we adopt that amendment, will he vote for the bill?

Mr. WINDOM. The bill contains so many other things that are obnoxious that I would not vote for it; but I think the amendment would very much improve the bill. Does not the Senator himself think it would improve it?

Mr. EATON. I will answer the question put to me. This is question No. 2.

Mr. WINDOM. Well, try them both.

Mr. EATON. In the first place I shall not vote to amend the bill with that or anything else my friend can draw, by a provision which for one moment gives any Federal power. That is all. I want the Senator from Minnesota to understand my objection. It is that the Government of the United States has no constitutional power here, and therefore I will not vote for it. I have heard to-day, I heard my friend from New York say here, not in so many words, but he left the inference, that five hundred thousand of the citizen soldiers of the State of New York could not protect the people of the city of New York. Sir, I do not believe that doctrine. I believe that the citizen soldiers of my State can protect the people of my State, and they have the constitutional right to do it.

I want to say one other thing. For seventy-five years it did not enter into the mind of any living man that the Federal Government had any such power as this. For seventy-five years it did not enter into the mind of any statesman, of any member of any party, that the Federal Government had any power of this character, and therefore I will not vote for anything which gives to the Federal Government a power of this description. That is my answer to the question.

Mr. WINDOM. Then I understand the answer of the Senator from Connecticut, and I think that he has fairly and honestly expressed the sentiment of his party.

Mr. EATON. I express my own.

Mr. WINDOM. If he has not expressed the sentiment of his party, I shall be glad to hear some other Senator deny it. I want to say this, then, that as I understood him he proposes that the Federal Government shall be warned from the boundaries of every State in the Union; that even in a case where the Constitution expressly provides that Congress may at any time by law make or alter regulations of the States as to the "time, place, and manner" of holding elections for members of Congress, even in that case the National Government shall be utterly powerless; that it shall be an alien enemy for all purposes; precisely the doctrine which brought about secession and rebellion. That doctrine is again brought here to-day and advocated by the Senator from Connecticut, and will be voted for, I apprehend, by every member of the democratic party. I have believed from the beginning of this debate that it was the doctrine of State rights, the old secession doctrine which ripened into rebellion and blood, that has brought this section of the pending bill before the Senate. It is not because the Senator from Connecticut or any other Senator on that side is afraid that the United States soldiers will interfere with elections. They know, as the Senator from Maine showed the other day, that there is but one-fourteenth of a soldier to every thousand people who are to be intimidated. No, Mr. President, it is not fear of the soldiers which moves the democracy, but it is because they will not have the emblem of nationality which appears in the blue coat of the United States soldier within the limits of any State in the Union. That is the secret of this whole movement. It is to destroy all protection to the ballot-box in order that, having solidified the South through the doctrine of State rights or "home rule" they may secure political success by defrauding the honest people of the North out of their votes. Before the war the democratic doctrine was that the United States should not go into any State in the Union unless it was to hunt down a panting fugitive from slavery. It is now proposed that the nation shall not go into any State except it be with an appropriation and without the old flag.

Mr. EATON. Ah, Mr. President, my honorable friend from Minnesota knows just as little about my conception of State rights as I know about the Hebrew dialect. He has no idea of it. The very moment that I propose to do what the Constitution of the United States says I ought to do, the very moment that I propose to do what his fathers and mine for more than three-quarters of a century did, that very moment he uncovers the ensanguined garment. It is high time that our friends on the other side should understand that the democratic party of this country as represented upon the floor of this Senate do not believe that the Federal Government has the constitutional power to control the elections in the States, call it what you please.

Mr. ALLISON. For members of Congress?

Mr. EATON. Yes, for members of Congress, or Senators, or President. They have no such constitutional power, and they never undertook to exercise it until an oligarchy in the House of Representatives, of which a gentleman from Pennsylvania was the chief, brought forward this heresy. Go to the convention that framed the Constitution, examine the debates, and point me to one single word from any man from which you derive any authority of this character.

Mr. CONKLING. Will it be agreeable to the Senator to hear me ask him a question?

Mr. EATON. Certainly it will.

Mr. CONKLING. Then I should like to inquire whether this evangel that he is preaching goes to this extent: he has said that the Government of the United States has no power to conduct an election for members of Congress. My question is, does it go so far as to deny that the United States may interpose to preserve peace while the States are conducting an election for members of Congress?

Mr. EATON. I did not quite say what my friend says; but I will not quarrel with the difference between the words "conduct" and "control." He used one and I the other.

Mr. CONKLING. I will use yours, whichever it is.

Mr. EATON. Mine was "control."

Mr. CONKLING. Very well; I will adopt that.

Mr. EATON. I say this in reply to your question: I am now speaking for myself, and not for anybody else. I am not speaking for any caucus or at the command of any caucus——

Mr. CONKLING. When the Senator speaks for himself, he speaks for the better part of the democratic party.

Mr. EATON. I am very much obliged to my friend for his good opinion of me.

Mr. CONKLING. That is my conviction.

Mr. EATON. I say the Government of the United States has no power under the Constitution to control the elections in the States for members of Congress, for presidential electors, or for any other officers; and I say further, that the uniform practice of this Government for seventy-five years (and nobody knows it better than the Senator from New York) runs on all fours with my claim. Was there any trouble in the country for three-quarters of a century, any trouble in New York?

Mr. CONKLING. I rise to thank the honorable Senator for the answer he has not made to my question.

Mr. EATON. I presumed that I would not give just such an answer as the honorable Senator from New York might want.

Mr. CONKLING. If the honorable Senator will pardon me, I endeavored to draw his attention to a different point——

Mr. EATON. I will hear the Senator.

Mr. CONKLING. And therefore I propounded this inquiry: The Senator affirms that the States and not the National Government have the right to control—I believe I use his word?——

Mr. EATON. Yes.

Mr. CONKLING. Elections at which Representatives in Congress are to be chosen. Now, I inquire of him, does he maintain and hold also that the United States has no power to preserve the peace or to encounter disorder when and while and where the States are conducting elections for national officers?

Mr. EATON. Mr. President, I am astonished, I am amazed——

Mr. CONKLING. So am I.

Mr. EATON. I am amazed that the Senator from New York should put a question of that character to me.

Mr. CONKLING. And I am also amazed that the Senator does not answer it.

Mr. EATON. I will answer it. The Constitution provides that when the authorities of a State require the assistance of the Federal Government that assistance shall be rendered to repel invasion, or to put down riot, or to do any other thing that may be necessary whenever the Legislature of the State requires it, or if the Legislature can not be convened, then the executive of the State. My friend is answered.

Mr. CONKLING. If my honorable friend will allow me, I again thank him for speaking to a point which I did not suggest to him. The honorable Senator from Connecticut is too good a lawyer not to know that "domestic violence," in the constitutional sense, and "invasion" were not the cases at all to which I referred. I am not speaking of a case where a State is invaded or where insurrection rises above the power of the State to cope with it. I am speaking of disorder in the ordinary and municipal sense, and I inquire again of the Senator whether his doctrine is that where disorders, riots, mobs break out where and when the States are conducting and controlling an election for the choice of national representatives, the national authority has no right to interpose to preserve order? That is my question, not whether the Legislature of a State or in its absence the governor may call on the United States for military assistance.

Mr. EATON. I answered that question when I said that the authorities of the State had the power to protect themselves and their people, and they exercised it for three-quarters of a century and did not call for or desire Federal assistance. I understand the Senator from New York to say that his great Empire State, with its half a million of citizen soldiers, is unable to keep the peace on election day. I regret that the State of New York has arrived at a condition of that character. It is not so with my State, sir. We are able to keep the peace and to protect the polls and to have honest ballots cast in the State of Connecticut.

Mr. CONKLING. If the honorable Senator is able to bear with me once more——

Mr. EATON. Why, certainly, always.

Mr. CONKLING. I rise to apologize for having asked him a distasteful question.

Mr. EATON. Not distasteful.

Mr. CONKLING. A question which he is unwilling to answer; and having ascertained his repugnance to it, I will withdraw it.

Mr. EATON. My friend knows that I have answered the question just as clearly as the question can be answered; that the State has the power, and it is the duty under the Constitution, the duty of the State, to keep the peace.

Mr. CONKLING. But, if my friend will pardon me, I did not ask him whether the States, I asked him whether the United States had the power, when an election is proceeding for the choice of national Representatives; not whether the States but the national power had authority to intervene, if need be, to throttle mob violence; and he will not answer me.

Mr. EATON. Suppose you drop New York, leave that for other men, then how could you determine whether Connecticut or Maine desired assistance in controlling their elections? Sir, it is a mere begging of the question. The Senator from New York knows that for three-quarters of a century the theory which he has advanced on this floor would not have been tolerated by anybody, whig, republican, or democrat.

Mr. WINDOM. Mr. President, I should like to press the Senator from Connecticut a little further to an answer on that point.

Mr. CONKLING. You cannot do it. [Laughter.]

Mr. WINDOM. I say so because I have offered an amendment here the validity of which will turn upon the constitutionality, perhaps, of the point raised by the Senator from Connecticut. The proposition I have submitted applies where an election for members of Congress is being conducted, and armed men, in large bodies or small, go to the polls for the purpose, with the declared and openly expressed intent to obstruct, hinder, and prevent the free exercise of the right of suffrage. In that case, does the Senator from Connecticut hold that the United States have no power to prevent it?

Mr. EATON. What do you mean by "power?"
Mr. WINDOM. Constitutional power.
Mr. EATON. Do you mean constitutional right?
Mr. WINDOM. Constitutional power.
Mr. EATON. Constitutional right—is that what you mean?
Mr. WINDOM. Constitutional power or right?
Mr. CONKLING. What is the difference between constitutional power and right?
Mr. WINDOM. I have put it in the alternative so that the Senator need not be troubled on that point. [A pause.] Is that the answer to the question, Mr. President?
Mr. EATON. Really, I was sat down on so hard by my distinguished friend from New York that I should like to have you put that question again to me if you can. [Laughter.]
Mr. WINDOM. I will make another effort. It seems to be very difficult for the Senator to understand it. I have offered a proposition here to punish armed men——
Mr. EATON. I am going to vote against it. [Laughter.]
Mr. WINDOM. I have not any doubt about that. Now, the Senator will allow me to start again, if he really wants to hear the question. The amendment proposes to punish armed men who go with the intent, the declared, avowed intent, to prevent the exercise of the right of suffrage; has the Government the right or the power—either one—to prevent it or to punish it?
Mr. EATON. I have now got the question a little different from what I did before, for the Senator did not put in "the Government of the United States." He says "the Government" now. Now, I answer, yes; I answer the last question. If you want to change it, I will answer again. You ask if the Government has any power. I say, yes. If any body of armed men interferes in the State of Connecticut with the polls, with the freedom of election, the people of Connecticut by its authorities have the power and will take care of it.
Mr. WINDOM. Now let me try my friend once more. Has the Government of the United States of America the right to punish armed men who go to the polls for the express and avowed purpose of preventing the free exercise of the right of suffrage at an election for members of Congress?
Mr. EATON. Now, my friend from New York will be evidence that I use the words of the Senator from Minnesota: has the United States Government of America the power to punish? Those are the words——
Mr. CONKLING. Oh, no.
Mr. EATON. I say no, not until a law is made, and that law I never will vote for.
Mr. WINDOM. Now, Mr. President, once more. I will ask the Senator once more whether Congress has the power to pass such a law, the constitutional power to pass it?
Mr. EATON. No. Now you have got your answer. Therefore I will not vote for it. If it had the constitutional power I might vote for it.
Mr. WITHERS. I hope we shall have a vote now.
The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. WINDOM.]
Mr. CONKLING. Let us have the yeas and nays.
The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.
Mr. BURNSIDE, (when the name of Mr. ANTHONY was called.) My colleague, [Mr. ANTHONY,] if here, would vote "yea." He is paired with the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD.]
Mr. KERNAN, (when Mr. BAYARD'S name was called.) I am requested by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] to announce that he is paired on this and kindred questions with the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. ANTHONY.]
Mr. BECK, (when his name was called.) I will not interrupt the roll-call any more during the vote on the different amendments on the bill, but now state once for all that on all these questions of amendment I am paired with the Senator from Nevada, [Mr. JONES.] If at liberty to vote on this particular amendment I should vote "nay."
Mr. HEREFORD, (when the name of Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia, was called.) My colleague [Mr. DAVIS] is paired with the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. WINDOM.] If he were present, my colleague would vote "nay."
Mr. BUTLER, (when the name of Mr. HAMPTON was called.) My colleague [Mr. HAMPTON] is paired with the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. ROLLINS.] If here, my colleague would vote "nay."
Mr. MORRILL, (when Mr. EDMUNDS'S name was called.) My colleague [Mr. EDMUNDS] is paired with the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN.] If he were present, my colleague would vote for the amendment and the Senator from Ohio would vote against it.
Mr. DAWES, (when the name of Mr. HOAR was called.) I repeat the announcement that my colleague [Mr. HOAR] is paired with the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. MCPHERSON.] My colleague, if he were here, would vote "yea."
Mr. MCDONALD, (when his name was called.) I am paired on this question with the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. CARPENTER.] If he were present, I should vote "nay."
Mr. ROLLINS, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. HAMPTON.] If he were present, I should vote "yea."
Mr. WINDOM, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. DAVIS] on all these questions. If he were present, I should vote "yea."
The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 24, nays 32; as follows:

YEAS—24.

Bell,	Cameron of Wis.,	Hill of Colorado,	Morrill,
Blaine,	Chandler,	Ingalls,	Paddock,
Booth,	Conkling,	Kellogg,	Platt,
Bruce,	Dawes,	Kirkwood,	Plumb,
Burnside,	Ferry,	Logan,	Saunders,
Cameron of Pa.,	Hamlin,	McMillan,	Teller.

NAYS—32.

Bailey,	Groome,	Jones of Florida,	Slater,
Butler,	Grover,	Kernan,	Vance,
Call,	Harris,	Maxey,	Vest,
Coke,	Hereford,	Morgan,	Voorhees,
Eaton,	Hill of Georgia,	Pendleton,	Walker,
Farley,	Houston,	Randolph,	Wallace,
Garland,	Johnston,	Ransom,	Williams,
Gordon,	Jonas,	Saulsbury,	Withers.

ABSENT—20.

Allison,	Cockrell,	Hoar,	Rollins,
Anthony,	Davis of Illinois,	Jones of Nevada,	Sharon,
Bayard,	Davis of W. Va.,	Lamar,	Thurman,
Beck,	Edmunds,	McDonald,	Whyte,
Carpenter,	Hampton,	McPherson,	Windom.

So the amendment was rejected.
Mr. WINDOM. On page 14, line 20 of section 6, I move to strike out the word "civil;" so that the clause may read:

Every officer of the Army or Navy, or other person in the military or naval service of the United States, who orders, brings, keeps, or has under his authority or control any troops or armed men at any place where a general or special election is held in any State," &c.

The object of that I will state to the Senate. The argument of those who have favored this bill has been that there is great danger to the liberties of the people if the soldiers are permitted to keep the peace at the polls. This bill punishes civil officers who keep the peace at the polls precisely as it does military or naval officers. I want to strike out the word "civil," so that the punishment shall apply to the Army and Navy only, and so that civilians may keep the peace without going to the penitentiary for five years or paying $5,000 fine.
Mr. WITHERS. I wish merely to state in that connection that the object probably is different from that so exactly stated by the Senator. The object is simply to ingraft an amendment upon this bill. I care not how specious the character of it may be, I hope it will be voted down.
Mr. BECK. I simply rise to say that we have no more respect for John Davenport than we have for General Sherman controlling the Army on election day.
Mr. WINDOM. My purpose was not at all as it seems to be understood by the Senator from Virginia. I do not desire an amendment for the sake of an amendment, certainly. An amendment could do no great harm, however. There is no time fixed for an adjournment. The bill may go back to the House, if amended, and be acted on. I do not desire to hinder its passage by an amendment, but I do desire that when the bill is passed it shall not punish civil officers of the Government by fine and imprisonment for helping to keep the peace at the polls.
The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota, to strike out the word "civil" in the sixth section of the bill in line 20.
Mr. FERRY and Mr. WINDOM called for the yeas and nays.
The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.
Mr. BURNSIDE, (when Mr. ANTHONY'S name was called.) On this question my colleague [Mr. ANTHONY] is paired with the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD.] If my colleague were here, he would vote "yea."
Mr. HEREFORD, (when the name of Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia, was called.) My colleague [Mr. DAVIS] is paired with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. WINDOM] on all these questions. If he were here, my colleague would vote "nay."
The PRESIDENT pro tempore, (when Mr. THURMAN'S name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.]
Mr. WALLACE, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL,] who has left the Chamber temporarily. If he were here, I should vote "nay."
Mr. WINDOM, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from West Virginia, [Mr. DAVIS.] I should vote "yea" and he would vote "nay," if he were present.
The roll-call was concluded.
Mr. ROLLINS. On this question I am paired with the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. HAMPTON.] If he were present, I should vote "yea."

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. PADDOCK. I now offer the amendment that I submitted to the Senate some days ago, but which has not been hitherto formally offered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to insert after line 16, section 6, the following proviso to the section:

That the provisions of the fifteenth section of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes," approved June 18, 1878, shall not be construed so as to prevent the employment of the Army in the government and control of the Indians in any of the States or Territories, whether on or off an Indian reservation, or to prevent such employment in the enforcement of the intercourse laws, or laws affecting the government or control of Indian reservations, or as applying to, or be enforced against, the Army, or any part thereof, employed in the protection of life and property in the States of Nebraska, Oregon, Nevada, Kansas, and Colorado, and the Territories subject to Indian incursions.

Mr. PADDOCK. Mr. President——

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to move an adjournment. Before doing so, I wish to say in the presence of the Senate that I think there is no use in our struggling in reference to this bill to-night in order to obtain a vote upon it. There are one or two Senators who desire to be heard on the questions involved prior to taking the vote. I wish now to say, so that the Senate may understand it, that on the last section of the bill in reference to the retirement of officers, after we pass over the sixth section, there will be some discussion on that proposition. I merely give this notice so that it may lead the Senate to now adjourn and meet to-morrow as usual at twelve o'clock.

Mr. EATON. I think we had better discuss it to-night.

Mr. LOGAN. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. WALLACE. I ask for the yeas and nays on that motion.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask the Senator from Illinois to withdraw the motion for one moment.

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly, with pleasure.

Mr. CONKLING. My object is to inquire of the Senator from Virginia, (and I will stop to say that I do this not for my convenience, because I am not one of those concerned,) whether an hour cannot be fixed to-morrow when the vote may be taken. I make this suggestion chiefly because there are several Senators, not on this side alone, who have made appointments which will be interfered with if they are compelled to stay here much longer now. I say again, I am not one of them, and I speak, therefore, in a behalf not my own. It seems to me that if we could fix some hour to-morrow convenient to all, by unanimous consent, it would be better, for the bill will not be advanced at all by the vote being taken to-night rather than at some hour to-morrow.

Having conferred with the Senator from Virginia and one or two other members of the Committee on Appropriations, I make this suggestion in the hope that it may be agreeable to my friend from Illinois and to everbody else.

Mr. WITHERS. I will state that two distinct efforts have been made to fix an hour to-morrow at which the vote may be taken upon the bill and all the amendments, and they have failed because of the want of the unanimous assent of the Senate.

Mr. CONKLING. Let us try it again.

Mr. BLAINE. Let us agree to vote at four o'clock to-morrow. ["No!" "No!"]

Mr. RANSOM. To-morrow is Friday; let us fix the time at two o'clock.

Mr. WITHERS. I individually have no objection in the world to such an agreement, and would defer to the convenience and wishes of Senators, but it is my duty to get the bill through at as early an hour as practicable. I have refrained from making an effort to weary the Senate by the process of sitting out the bill in order that a vote shall be secured, so long as I could do so consistently with my views of duty. I am not at all desirous of subjecting any Senator to inconvenience by insisting upon that course. Yet it is absolutely, I think, my duty to secure a vote upon the bill as speedily as practicable, and I am of opinion that the speediest mode of effecting that object will be by remaining in session until we shall have secured a vote upon it.

Mr. CONKLING. But may I inquire, will not the Senator name himself some hour to-morrow which, if others do not object, he will agree to as the time when we can vote?

Mr. WITHERS. I will make an effort to accommodate the wish of the Senator, and of several other Senators who have approached me on the subject. I will make a third effort to secure the fixing of an hour at which the vote shall be taken on the bill, and if there is unanimous consent I will name two o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. CONKLING. Is there objection?

Mr. LOGAN. Yes.

Mr. BLAINE. The honorable Senator gains nothing by fixing two o'clock. If the bill is passed at four o'clock it will reach the Executive just as soon practically as if passed at two o'clock.

Mr. CONKLING. Split the difference and make it three o'clock.

Mr. WITHERS. I will put it at three o'clock, if that meets assent, with the distinct understanding—let it be understood unequivocally—that at three o'clock to-morrow we shall proceed to take the vote upon the bill and all amendments, without further debate.

Mr. LOGAN. I merely wish to say that so far as I am individually concerned I have no preference as to the hour at which the vote shall be taken. I should dislike, however, to see the vote taken on the last section without the opportunity of an explanation and some discussion of it, if only for five minutes. I have no desire to discuss the bill further so far as I am concerned. There are Senators, however, who do desire to make some remarks on the bill. I propose to say but a few words on the last section, and any hour will suit my convenience provided there be an opportunity afforded at least of five minutes or ten minutes to Senators who desire to discuss the last section of the bill. I do not think it will require very much time.

Mr. HAMLIN. I hope there will be no objection upon this or the other side of the Chamber to the very fair proposition which the Senator who has the bill in charge has made. It is suggested by the Senator from Illinois that he wants a few moments to discuss a particular section of the bill. We shall have three hours after twelve o'clock, two hours after one o'clock, which will afford ample time. The Senator from Nebraska, [Mr. PADDOCK,] I think, has now the floor upon his amendment. He will have ample opportunity, I have no doubt, to present his views within that time, and it will give ample time for a brief debate upon any point. I hope there will be no objection to the proposition.

Mr. WITHERS. So far as I am concerned I will agree to that hour with the understanding I have stated.

Mr. PADDOCK. I would not ask the Senate to listen to any observations that I have to make, but upon my amendment it will be necessary to submit a few remarks. I think I shall not consume more than thirty or forty minutes, but I believe, under all the circumstances, it is due to me from the Senate that I should have thirty or forty minutes at an opportune and proper time. That is all I demand.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia suggests that at three o'clock to-morrow the discussion on this bill shall cease and, without further debate, the vote shall be taken on the bill and all amendments that are pending or may be offered.

Mr. WITHERS. That is right.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to that arrrangement?

Mr. HOUSTON. If the Senator will say two o'clock I shall not object to it; but otherwise I shall.

Mr. PADDOCK. I hope the Senator will withdraw his objection after the statements that have been made.

Mr. WITHERS. I hope my friend from Alabama will withdraw the objection. There is only a difference of one hour. I am sure he will accommodate himself to what it is apparent is the sentiment of almost the entire Senate on both sides. Such an arrangement will secure a vote I think about as early as we can get it under any circumstances.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will once more state the proposition and again ask the Senate whether there is any objection to it. The proposition is, that at three o'clock to-morrow all debate on this bill shall cease, and the Senate shall then proceed to vote upon any pending amendment or amendments that may be offered, and finally on the bill itself without further debate.

Mr. CONKLING. That is right.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to that understanding? The Chair hears none, and it is agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING. Now I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. HAMLIN. Let the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. PADDOCK] first take the floor for to-morrow.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator from Nebraska has the floor on his amendment; I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Before the motion is entertained the Chair will suggest that there is an executive message on the table. If it is material that it shall be communicated to-night, a motion will be necessary for an executive session.

Mr. CONKLING. If the message be on executive business, I renew my motion that the Senate do now adjourn. A good many Senators would be incommoded by being detained longer.

Mr. WITHERS. The message can go over until to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New York that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at six o'clock and three minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, April 24, 1879.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

TREATY WITH FRANCE.

Mr. KELLEY. I rise to a question of privilege, or perhaps I should say for the purpose of receiving parliamentary instruction.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state the question to which he rises.

Mr. KELLEY. I have been absent from the House on leave, and I find from the RECORD that on yesterday the gentleman from New York [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD] introduced a resolution requesting the President to consider the expediency of entering into a convention with the government of France for the negotiation of a treaty touching international trade between the two countries. I observe also that the resolution carried by a small vote, and that the motion was then made to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted, and that the motion to reconsider was laid on the table. I believe that the action of the House must have been inconsiderate. I do not think that it can have deliberately invited the executive department to assume the highest prerogative of the House, that of regulating the revenue.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. To what point does the gentleman rise?

Mr. KELLEY. I rise with the object of asking whether it is under any form of parliamentary law admissible to move to reconsider the vote by which the motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. It is not. The Chair directs a paragraph to be read from the Digest.

The Clerk read as follows:

A motion to reconsider a vote laying a motion to reconsider on the table is not in order; if entertained it would lead to inextricable confusion, by piling up motion upon motion to reconsider.

The SPEAKER. This has been the practice of the House as long as the present occupant of the chair has had the honor of being a member of this House and while the gentleman from Pennsylvania himself has been a member of this House, which is a little longer, that gentleman having been here nearly twenty years.

Mr. KELLEY. I feared such might be the decision of the Chair; but I felt myself bound to call the attention of the country to the resolution somewhat more emphatically than the mere vote itself might do.

DIRECTORS OF COLUMBIA HOSPITAL.

The SPEAKER. The Chair announces as directors on the part of the House for the Columbia Hospital Hon. JOHN H. REAGAN, of Texas, and Hon. HIRAM PRICE, of Iowa.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. MORSE, for ten days, on account of sickness.

REGISTRY OF VOTES IN PARLIAMENTARY BODIES.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of State, transmitting a communication from the minister of the United States in Vienna relating to an apparatus invented by Mr. C. A. Mayrhofer for the registry of votes of parliamentary and deliberative bodies; which was referred to the Committee on Rules.

NATIONAL ACADEMY OF SCIENCES.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from O. C. Marsh, esq., acting president of the National Academy of Sciences, transmitting a report of the operations of the National Academy of Sciences during the past year; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

PRINTING OF BILLS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to ask in behalf of sundry members who had bills introduced and referred to committees through the petition-box that such bills may be printed for the use of the House. Of course, being presented through the petition-box, they would not have numbers, but they can be printed for the use of the House. The bills introduced on Monday last, public bills, are all ordered to be printed, and it is desired by members who resorted to the petition-box for the introduction of public bills that they be printed also.

Mr. CONGER. I suggest that they can be introduced on Monday next.

Mr. REAGAN. If the gentlemen who presented bills in that way will reintroduce them on Monday next, they can be ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER. In that case they would secure numbers, and that would perhaps be the better course to pursue. They could then be referred to with convenience by their numbers.

Mr. CONGER. That would give precedence to those bills that have crept in in some other way than the usual way of introducing bills.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I understand that there are no bills to be reported this morning, and I therefore move that the morning hour be dispensed with in order to allow the House to resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of proceeding with the legislative bill.

The motion was agreed to, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of proceeding with the consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. BLACKBURN in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. DE LA MATYR] has seven minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. DE LA MATYR. Mr. Chairman, this being my first experience in civil legislation, I had not proposed to enter the arena of debate this session, but this discussion has reached a point at which I desire to utter a few thoughts which have been suggested by its course.

The center around which this fierce war of words has seemed mainly to rave has been the anticipated action of the President. It strikes me that we have no legitimate concern with that matter whatever. We are not supposed to know what that action will be. "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." It is at least a far-fetched and forced gage of battle. It indicates that the combatants are spoiling for a fight.

The charge made by the distinguished leader of one extreme of the House [Mr. GARFIELD] and echoed by every speaker on that side here and in the Senate, that the effort by the majority to repeal certain statutes which have been added to our laws within a few years is pregnant with the dire horrors of revolution and threatens to give birth to a monster, compared with which Milton's first-born of sin appears harmless and beautiful, impresses me as supremely ridiculous.

The further attempt to charge a purpose to starve this Government to death on the slim pretext that individuals have threatened not to strike the repeal of those statutes from the appropriation bills even if the President vetoes them, because of the clauses of repeal, is as ridiculous. The grave importance attached by the majority to the repealing clauses seems to me making a mountain out of a mole-hill. A stranger watching these frantic charges and counter-charges across the center of this House would judge that the nation represented here must be in the last throes of dissolution.

Does any man in his sane moments doubt that the Republic would abide the repeal of the statutes in dispute or that it will stand if they remain in force? The important fact is, this frenzied debate is the skirmishing between the two parties who have wrangled over the grave of the civil war for fourteen years, preparatory to the great struggle for power and pelf to come off next year. Its brilliant display of rhetoric and acting varied by tragic scenes has been a sublime farce. I am certain that when the actors have cooled off and amid calm reflection study their exhibition, they will find little to glory over.

Mr. Chairman, there is but one way in which the Republic can be seriously imperiled. It will be my aim to suggest where alone danger lurks. It is fortunate that the measureless interests embodied in our national life do not rest on those statutes in dispute, nor on any action the President may see fit to take concerning their repeal, nor on the course the majority of Congress may pursue after the President's action. This quarrel may cost the country much more than it has, but it cannot overthrow the Government.

Those statutes may or may not be repealed. The threatened collision between the Executive and Congress may come and expend all its fury, as this debate is dissipating the wrath of party leaders, and yet the Government will live and flourish. For the cost and disturbance of this protracted wrangle the people will hold its actors responsible, but they will not permit the Government to suffer material harm from so impotent and ridiculous a fiasco.

Sir, our Government rests upon the moral sentiment of the whole people and it can be destroyed only by debauching that sentiment. While the people have reason to love the Government, "the gates of hell shall not prevail against it." That party whose policy weakens the interest of the people in the stability of the Government is the dangerous traitor to be fought to the death.

The common-sense view of these statutes is, they increase the influence of the party in power over the elections. The influence resulting from control of scores of thousands of Federal office-holders scattered over the whole country, which the existing Administration exerts over elections, is as great as it is safe to give any party. Any addition is to be deprecated. Whatever of good may arise from these statutes in force, in my judgment, is more than balanced by the evil which must result from increasing the power of the party which may be in possession of the administration. If the democratic party were in power now, does any man question that every republican would vote for their repeal?

It was in committing the civil power to the hearts of the whole people instead of centralizing it that our fathers reversed the whole theory and practice of ruling civil society. They regarded man not as rich nor poor, patrician nor plebeian, white nor black nor mixed, but alone in those high endowments which distinguish him as man. They wholly ignored orders and castes and special political rights in civil society and formed a government for the whole people. Such a structure must of necessity be sustained by the love of the governed. Our fathers with a sublime faith trusted the people to sustain their civil institutions solely from the inspiration of love for them. They wisely ordained that the power they intrusted to the people should express itself through the elective franchise, and find embodiment in written constitutions and statutes.

Their work was a grand experiment. The question which immediately arose and deeply interested the statesmen of the civilized world was, "Is a government not centralized, not supported by an army wielded by a single will, strong enough to pass through all the vicissitudes of national life?" The universal theory had been that society could be controlled only by force. The framers of the Constitution were themselves deeply impressed with a sense of the awful responsibility they assumed in basing their structure on an untried foundation. Those cautious and well-instructed men were impelled by a divine inspiration so far upon untrodden ground that they were startled at their own work, and as long as they lived they regarded it with extreme solicitude. The statesmen of the next generation shared the fears of their predecessors. Mr. Webster in the peroration of his immortal speech in reply to Hayne voiced that anxious interest. He said:

> I shall exert every faculty I possess to prevent the Constitution from being annulled, destroyed, or impaired; and even should I see it fall I will still, with a voice feeble, it may be, but earnest as ever fell from human lips, and with a fidelity and zeal which nothing shall extinguish, call upon the people to come to its rescue. When my eyes are turned for the last time to behold the sun in heaven, may I not see him shining on the broken and dishonored fragments of a once glorious Union.

The first severe test of the power of our Government was the civil war. That test was the all-important issue of that memorable struggle. It was so regarded by the civilized world. Immediately on its opening the haters of our institutions in Europe rejoiced at their overthrow as if already accomplished. In the language of our great historian, "Lord Russel, voicing the wishes and hopes of them all, hastened to publish through the palaces of Europe that the great Republic was in its agony."

It was in agony, but not of dissolution; it was the agony of the throes of the birth of a higher, grander life—a new incarnation of liberty.

With deep and awful anxiety the oppressed peoples of other lands watched our trial. Victor Hugo expressed that anxiety when he wrote, "If liberty should fall in America, there would be a frightful deluge—a shipwreck of humanity." The test could not have been more severe. In the glare of its lurid fires the pop-gun flashes and squibs of this sanguine debate sink beneath contempt.

Sir, there have been but few, if any, among the world's greatest commanders who have surpassed Lee. No general was ever supported by abler lieutenants, one of whom is now an honored member of this House. The immense armies he wielded were filled with men who regarded the war as a sacred defense of their homes. Never did braver men fight, never were armies more skillfully led.

The nation's chief, when first confronted with the formidable array, had no tangible force to meet it. He appealed to the invisible power of our Government, the moral sentiment of the people, and it responded to full measure of the extremest need. The people, inspired alone by love of their own Government, sacrificed partisanship to patriotism, laid on the nation's altar their accumulated and prospective wealth, and with quivering hearts and unwavering faith gave their sons to the hazards of war.

The great conflict which followed was a spectacle to men and to angels. The measureless issues pending; the giant forces in array; the daring, desperate, reckless stand of millions on one hand; the calm, steady, relentless march of millions on the other, forming lines of armies across a continent, and ever and anon hurling themselves together in the crash of battle, held the absorbed and profound attention of mankind. Millions of eager eyes were on us, because the interests of millions were in our keeping.

Had the confederacy secured its independence, its peculiar institution, its fatal theory of the right of any State to secede at will and set up for itself, and a powerful neighbor touching it on a long line destitute of any natural barriers, would have impelled it to the establishment of a centralized power, with a standing army as its right arm. That would have forced the Northern States to a like form of government, and power would have been transferred from the hearts of the people to standing armies wielded by tyrants, and liberty would have fallen in America, and there would have been a "frightful deluge, a shipwreck of humanity."

Thanks to the God of battles, the Government prevailed and the catastrophe of liberty was averted. That test will never be duplicated. Threats and fears of it are alike idle and puerile.

What has followed the war has given evidence of the strength of the sentiment of the people, on which the Government rests, only less convincing than the uprising of that sentiment to prosecute it to victory. The world's history furnishes no parallel to the fact that two vast armies, called from the ranks of the people and disciplined in the field, after four years of war returned their arms to the national armories and immediately retired to civil life. More surprising still, these armies, after fighting each other with desperation so long, filled the bloody chasm between them and together went to work to repair the wastes of their fratricidal strife.

It is an obvious fact that the sectional conflict which has been our weakness and disgrace since has been instigated and kept up mainly by those patriots of the North who made their sacrifices by urging their wives' relatives to enlist and by loaning their money to the Government at the rate of about fifty cents on the dollar, and when it emerged from its trial, and its every obligation was at par, persuading Congress and the President, "in order to strengthen the public credit," to change the contract and pay them gold instead of the depreciated currency which they agreed to take and with which they took their loans; and a class of politicians who have devoted themselves to crying "honest money," while they have secured legislation which has impoverished the great mass of the people to enrich themselves and their fellow-patriots, the bondholders; and at the South a set of infamous cowards who, to atone for sneaking into the swamps during the war, have given themselves to the pastime of shooting helpless negroes.

But very few men who really fought in the war now fight over its ghost. Brave men never fight disembodied spirits. Let any tangible enemy threaten this country; let any power or combination of powers challenge to battle, and the soldiers of the North and the South would rally under the old banner, forming such a host as was never led to battle in the world's heroic history. Down with this puerile cry of revolution raised by those who were cowards on the one side or cormorants on the other of the great struggle. I have no language in which to utter my supreme contempt for it. I cannot believe that either side will make any more political capital out of it. Cover up the foul putrescence and let the air clear itself from the unendurable stench.

Mr. Chairman, legislation demanded by a suffering people has been blocked for five long weeks by this unworthy clamor, and by every species of low filibustering, on the plea that the country needs rest. The system of financial legislation which has transferred all values from the many into the coffers of the few is now complete; the paralysis of death is on all productive enterprise; now let us rest; do not disturb this delicious repose; we have accomplished our supreme purpose; the money lords are satisfied and happy; their mortgages and bonds have appreciated in relation to all other property and labor so as to give them full control of them; now "let us have peace;" your agitation disturbs the country's nabobs; it makes them fear that the people will be aroused to throw off the intolerable yoke they have so complacently imposed. Thus plead the tools of the money power.

Sir, the country does need rest from this infamous sectional strife which those who cry "peace, peace," are perpetually fomenting. It is a cormorant mêlée, of the croaking of which the people both North and South have had a surfeit. It is apparent that all the lofty flights of eloquence in this debate have been for a like purpose that eagles soar. The poetic idea is that the eye of the eagle is fixed on the sun as he ascends, but the hard, unpoetic fact is his vision is steadily sweeping field and forest in search of a carcass on which to feed. Let me remind gentlemen that the civil war has been ended fourteen years, and the Constitution has been adjusted to the changed conditions, and each State which sought to secede is in normal relations to the General Government, and reconstruction is completed, and all danger which arose from slavery has expended its force, and all fears of peril from that direction which now disturb any member of this body, or any of the people, are like childish fears of ghosts. Let us have rest from it. But, sir, the quiet which these men demand would be the rest of death. There is a paralysis of productive energy which must be thrown off by immediate and determined effort. In this direction there will be no rest. The suffering people will not be lulled into repose that their stupor may enable their oppressors to complete their enslavement.

Mr. Chairman, let us survey the situation. We came out of the war deeply in debt. The payment of debts was the task before us. Much of the debt was matter of immense gain to our creditors. It had accumulated during the uncertainties of war. Hard conditions had been exacted, and perforce accepted. The nation's triumph made every obligation perfectly good, and greatly enriched its creditors. They alone were gainers by the war, and fattened on the miseries of others.

There was, however, nothing for the nation to do but to abide by its contracts, hard as they were. Repudiation was not to be thought of, for that would involve dishonor. There was but one way to pay those debts and not impoverish and distress the people, and that was to produce the means by labor out of our measureless undeveloped resources. That could be done only by keeping the people at work. The great problem which challenged our responsible statesmen was how to inspire to the full maximum the industrial forces of the whole people. Compared with that problem, all other questions which demanded their attention were "less than the small dust of the balances." Providence had made its solution comparatively easy. We had exhaustless resources in soil, mine, and forest. The South was a desert, but so situated that skill and muscle, aided by machinery, could have rapidly covered it with cotton-fields and fruit-orchards, making it, with its sunny climate, "flourish as the garden of the Lord."

The immense plains stretching from the Mississippi westward were corn and pasture lands, cleared by the infinite Father and ready for the plow and the herd. Our mountains were stored with gold, silver, iron, and coal. The temper of the people favored intense activity. The tremendous excitements of the war had quickened the pulses of the masses. We were favored with a volume of currency, swelled by the exigencies of the war, based upon all the resources and the honor of the nation—a pretty substantial cradle for a rag baby—which set in motion and was competent to sustain a vast system of productive enterprise. The whole land echoed the cheerful voice of industry. The line of cottages and corn advanced as by magic over Dakota, Nebraska, Kansas, and Texas. Herds multiplied on the plains beyond. Still further on the mountain glens echoed the strokes of the pick and the quartz-crusher. There was less, yet hopeful, activity at the South.

This vast development of the West and South called for machinery, clothing, &c., in ever-increasing quantities, and to supply them manufacturing increased and flourished. All the land became a workshop, and production of substantial wealth was immense. Had that condition of industry been held steady up to this time all our debts would have been paid and the wealth of the nation more than quadrupled.

France, after her disastrous war with Germany, notwithstanding the smallness of her territory and poverty of natural resources, by the wisdom of her statesmanship inspired to intense activity her industrial forces, and kept every muscle, wheel, spindle, hammer, and plow in motion, and in less than three years fully repaired the wastes of the war and paid the enormous indemnity, and did not impoverish her people. The statesmen of France performed a far more difficult task than was committed to our statesmen at the close of our war. There was no possible way of keeping our people at work but by keeping their currency in equilibrium with the demands of the vast and widespread system of their industries, and that was the special work for the party which was in power. Unfortunately, instead of shaping their policy to that end the leaders of the republican party turned their attention exclusively to bringing the currency down to the gold basis, with the sole object of paying the principal and interest of the bonds and mortgages held against the people by the money-loaning class in gold or its equivalent. The result of that policy is now before us. It soon paralyzed productive enterprise, and it has been prostrate for five long years. The capital invested in production and commerce is lost. That large body of our citizens who live by earning wages are toiling for a bare subsistence or begging the opportunity to work, and are in utter poverty.

These years of ruin and misery to the people have been years of harvest to the money loaners. They have stood behind their counters, and in interest—ruinous, crushing interest—have gathered all the surplus of the people's earnings, and have appreciated their mortgages by the depreciation of all other property until they have confiscated vast amounts of the people's capital. Taking advantage of the desperate struggles of men to save a little of their life gatherings, the creditor class have turned down the screws of interest until the struggle has become hopeless, and then by foreclosure they have secured titles to the farms, factories, workshops, and homes of their victims, turning them adrift penniless, with their families, into a desert where there is no opportunity to earn bread by labor. Thus there has been a fearfully rapid gathering of values from the many into the hands of a few, and all property interest in the stability of the Government has been taken from a very large majority of the people.

It is not exaggeration to assert that four out of five of the men in mature life would be relieved by freedom from all claim on their future productions and permission to start again without a dollar. Not one in five is worth a dollar above the claims of creditors upon them, and many have mortgages fixed upon all they can produce till the day of death.

This concentration of wealth has created a tyrannical power over the masses. Money is power. A large capitalist has power and every temptation to be a tyrant. He can confiscate the business and property of small capitalists. He can oppress laborers with an iron hand. No intelligent man will dispute these statements.

Until since the war the number of very rich men in our country was too small to excite alarm; but now they imperil the liberties of the people. Their dangerous power is manifest in the obvious fact that they have dictated the legislation of the General Government. Congress, Presidents, and Cabinets have done their bidding with an obsequiousness utterly amazing. The passage of the bill to partially restore silver to the place from which they had degraded it is the only financial measure which they have not dictated since the war. They fought that measure desperately, through their agents, in both Houses of Congress, and their President vetoed it. It was passed over his veto, because the murmur of an outraged people made Congress afraid.

Now, sir, as the people, stripped of their property and robbed of the means of producing more, demand that there shall be a halt in this ruinous policy, and that legislation looking toward their relief shall be entered upon, they are told by their oppressors that they are ignorant of the awful mysteries of finance; that they are only reaping the fruits of overproduction and extravagance; that their asking for relief is dishonest and smacks of repudiation, and they are branded as communists and threatened with a strong government. Those who represent them and plead their cause are sneered at as blatent blatherskites; and in the original, chaste, elegant, scholarly, gentlemanly language of one of the most distinguished representatives of New England culture [Mr. HAWLEY] they are branded as the rag, tag, and bob-tail of the democratic party. Rev. Joseph Cook, another representative of New England nabobs rather than of the Divine Master who toiled as a mechanic and preached His gospel to the poor and laid the foundation of His kingdom in the hearts of the working people, has affirmed that before the people shall be permitted to regain control of their Government, rescuing it from the hands of aristocrats, the right of suffrage shall be taken from them, even if their blood has to be spilled in doing it.

Mr. Chairman, I wish with an unmistakable emphasis to assure these oppressors and despisers of the toiling masses of this country that neither their victims nor those who represent them on this floor feel alarmed or humiliated at these impotent assertions, threats, and sneers. We shall not turn and rail at them. I will not blame the money-loaners for what they have done. No doubt that most who call them Shylocks would do as they do if in their places. There are a few Christians who really do unto others as they would others should do unto them. There is occasionally a man with such a high sense of honor as not to desire to live off the toil of others without returning any equivalent, but such virtue is too scarce to reckon upon in this world. Governments are instituted to defend people from the rapacity of their fellows, and not to aid that rapacity to wholesale robbery as our Government has done for fourteen years.

The love of money is the master passion of human nature and "is the root of all evil." It coins hearts and consciences into a harder substance than silver. It congeals into supreme selfishness and cruelty the sympathies which were meant for mutual helpful offices. This money power has not and will not exhibit the slightest weakness of pity for the people who have been impoverished to enrich its class. It will not show the slightest disposition to compromise. It will exert its utmost energy to consolidate and extend its sway. It has and will use every press, legislator, and executive officer that money can buy. It has sent Mr. Grant, its chosen champion, careering over the Old World amid a halo of glory which has eclipsed all the splendors of ancient Roman triumphal processions. It is arranging to meet him on his landing at San Francisco and escort him across the continent in a style of magnificence that will throw into the shade the regal display of the former moguls of India. It boasts of its purpose to put the Government into his iron hand, that he may hush the threats of labor strikes and communistic murmurs of an outraged and suffering people by a strong administration.

Mr. Chairman, while I can see no peril in the petty matters over which this Congress is wrangling, I do see danger in this attempt of the money power to enslave the people. Sir, I am sure that the people of this country will not submit to permanent serfdom. Not even Grant with his iron will could administer a government over them for that purpose. There are ominous indications that efforts in that direction have been already carried to the very verge of the line of safety. Wisdom commands a halt. It is madness to cover up the facts or ignore them; the people cannot longer be deceived. The promise of relief through resumption has utterly failed, as any intelligent man not blinded by partisanship knew it must. With claims on the property of the country above what it would sell for in cash held by money-loaners, and with the prices of labor and property where resumption has brought them and will hold them, the people must toil for a bare subsistence and turn over all the surplus, through the channels of interest and taxes, to their taskmasters.. They cannot possibly meet the full drain of interest and taxes, and their indebtedness must increase, as it has steadily every year since this ruinous policy of depressing prices has been pursued. The producing classes in England, Russia, Germany, and especially India, are reduced by a like process to utter destitution and almost hopeless misery, and they are held to it by standing armies. Such is the slavery which is sought to be permanently fastened upon our people. It is far more intolerable than the slavery of the colored people at the South before the war, over which there has been a waste of morbid sentiment in this debate.

The southern slaves were cared for when sick, and when either too young or too old to work, but the slaves of the money oligarchy are fed and cared for only while they can work.

Mr. Chairman, it is the purpose of the national party to avert the danger indicated, by changing the policy of legislation and administration which has caused it. It proposes to do this in a legitimate and peaceful way before the contest between the people and their oppressors drifts into bloody revolution, which without such peaceful settlement it will inevitably do very soon.

I have slowly and reluctantly but fully reached the conclusion that such settlement can be reached only through a new, distinct, and separate party. I hoped until within the last three years that the republican party, of which I was a member, would see where its policy was leading and stop, but I was forced to learn that it had sold out to the money power and had become its willing and pliant instrumentality. I then hoped that the democratic party, purified in the furnace of defeat and disaster for so many years, would espouse the cause of the people and take direct issue with the republican party on the all-important matter of finance; but that hope has failed. If any measure of it had lingered when the debate began it would have been dissipated by its course. As long as these parties continue to face each other the bloody shirt will be shaken as the inspiration of their fury. The Ethiopian cannot change his skin, nor the leopard his spots; no more can old political parties cease to do evil and learn to do well.

We must have a party organization that runs its lines north and south across the whole breadth of the country as well as east and west across its whole length. A new party, having no memories or prejudices which are sectional, can array the people on the vital issues of the day, and we propose to do it. We have devoted ourselves to the task of guiding the intense and restless sentiment of the people into the peaceful channel of seeking relief through the ballot. There is no need of resorting to communistic lines of redress. Mobs and disloyal acts are mad and futile efforts. The people do not want to destroy anybody's property. They need all the property to tax. Having the ballot and being the majority, they are sovereign. The Government belongs to them, and they can and will make it do their bidding. We propose to restore hope and inspire prosperity by having this Government supply the people with a currency in sufficient volume to be equal to the demands of the healthful maximum of their productive power, and not beyond that demand. We do not propose any wild inflation, as we are so liberally charged by the agents of the money power. We mean to have a currency made full legal tender, and not crippled as Congress crippled and degraded the greenbacks at the dicta of gold gamblers.

The war called forth and distributed the currency, which, though crippled by being only partly money, inspired the vast and active industry which followed it. We believe that if the issue of that currency was in accord with the Constitution in time of war, the issue of currency like it is constitutional in time of great commercial distress—distress which surpasses the suffering caused by the war. I am not a lawyer, but I have read the Constitution and have not found any provision by which war makes unconstitutional measures constitutional.

We propose to distribute the currency in part by a wise, judicious system of internal improvements. Such a plan would immediately furnish employment to the idle, suffering, and restless host, dissipate their bitterness, hush their complainings, and enable them to make their families comfortable, and to again become freeholders and gain a property interest in the stability of the Government and enable debtors to pay off the claims which make them slaves. It would also open facilities for marketing our augmenting products. At the same time it would quietly and legitimately infuse life currents into all kinds of industries by furnishing the indispensable means of exchange—money. Such a course pursued by the wise statesmen of France has made that country the most prosperous of the world at the present time.

I had the honor of presenting to the House at the request of Colonel John Chiles, of Kentucky, a memorial on the subject of internal improvement, accompanied by two draughts of bills prepared by him with great labor and care. One of them proposes the improvement of the Mississippi and Ohio Rivers by the Government direct. I most heartily indorse that bill. The other proposes that the Government shall loan to certain companies, whose works were carefully examined by Senator WINDOM'S committee and recommended by it, certain sums of money which that committee estimated they needed.

The bill is guarded as fully as such a measure can be. It seeks to open a general plan of extending aid without granting subsidies. Its general purpose I indorse, but I am not prepared to indorse the loan idea and I am opposed to building up corporative monopolies.

I regard the bill as worthy of the attention of the committee of this House to which it is referred, and the subject of it as worthy careful study and free discussion by the press.

We propose to distribute it further by paying it out to meet all current expenses of the Government and the interest and principal of the bonded debt as far as the original contracts will allow, and also for silver to pay the interest and principal of that portion of debt contracted to be paid in coin. We propose further that this currency, issued directly by the Government, shall take the place of the national-bank issues.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I wish to say that I am proud to be a Representative of the toiling masses. My lot was cast with them in my early years and I have never aspired to be separated from them. I have never desired to rise above Him, who, though He was rich became poor that others might be enriched; who associated with the people and defended them against all who sought to oppress them, whose only severity was manifested toward the proud despisers of the people. Sir, it is sneeringly said that the people form the lowest stratum of society. We admit and glory in the fact. Geologists teach us that the lowest stratum of the earth's crust is the granite on which all the strata rests, even the uppermost which is soft and shaly. They teach us also that the mountain ranges whose sublime summits pierce the clouds, and whose capacious reservoirs are the sources of the streams and rivers which replenish the slopes and valleys, are but the upheavings of the granite. Sir, our Government rests upon the solid granite of the people, and the frail nabobs who would lord it over them would starve to death but for the supplies they furnish. From the people have risen the grandest men who have towered into the heavens of truth and gathered their treasures for the refreshing of the pampered sons of wealth whose feebleness forbids them to do more than drink at the fountain of the generous store.

From the people in this time of need I pray—

God give us men! A time like this demands
Clear minds, pure hearts, true faith, and ready hands—
Men who possess opinions and a will;
Men whom desire for office does not kill;
Men whom the spoils of office cannot buy;
Men who have honor—men who will not lie;
Tall men—sun-crowned—who live above the fog
In public duty and private thinking;
Men who can stand before a demagogue
And damn his treacherous flatteries without winking:
For, while political tricksters, with their worn-out creeds,
Their large professions and their little deeds,
Wrangle in selfish strife, lo! Freedom weeps,
Wrong rules the land, and waiting Justice sleeps!

Before Mr. DE LA MATYR concluded his remarks the hammer fell, his hour having expired.

Mr. WEAVER. I hope the time of the gentleman from Indiana will be extended.

Mr. HAZELTON. I object; he is not saying anything about the bill.

Mr. WEAVER. He is saying something about the gentleman's party, which I suppose he does not want to hear.

Mr. BROWNE. I hope the gentleman's time will be extended to allow him to respond to one or two questions which I desire to ask him.

Mr. DE LA MATYR. Our party has had but one hour in this debate, and this is the first time that any one except Mr. KELLEY, of Pennsylvania, has been arrested in the course of his remarks upon either side; but we submit.

Mr. PHISTER. I hope objection will be withdrawn to the gentleman's proceeding.

Mr. HAZELTON. I cannot withdraw the objection; I make it as a matter of life and death to the balance of us.

The CHAIRMAN. Did the gentleman withdraw his objection?

Mr. HAZELTON. I did not.

Mr. DUNNELL. I yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. JOYCE,] and then fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. O'NEILL.]

Mr. JOYCE. I will yield two minutes to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. PRICE.]

Mr. PRICE. While we are making history, I think that all of us on either side of this Hall will agree that we had better make it tell the truth. My colleague who last addressed the committee has given such a gloomy description of the State in which we both live that I want to correct him. One would suppose from his statement that every agriculturist in the State of Iowa was not only sold out but in a situation of starvation, if not on the road to the poor-house. All this, he says, is attributable to the republican party. Now I happen to have lived in the State of Iowa ever since that gentleman was four years old, and I know more about the State than he does.

Under democratic administration wheat was forty cents a bushel, payable in store goods; pork $1.50 a hundred and corn ten cents a bushel, payable in the same way. You scarcely ever got a dollar in money, and when you did get it, it was of doubtful value. Now all these products, under republican rule, are worth more than twice that amount, and payable in dollars worth one hundred cents each.

He also says that while the balance of trade was in our favor to the amount of two hundred and fifty-seven millions, last year it took all that and $4,000,000 more to pay the interest on our debt. I call the attention of gentlemen to this fact, that the whole interest that we are paying to Europe and every place else on our bonds is less than $100,000,000; and if the balance of trade in our favor is two hundred and fifty-seven millions, and four millions, added to it, were used to pay the interest on our debt, I would like to know whose arithmetic he studied when he went to school and where he learned these startling facts, to wit, that it takes two hundred and sixty-one millions to pay ninety-six millions of interest. The fact is that the whole argument on that side goes so far from the facts in the case that it is necessary to contradict them, because, unless they are contradicted, somebody in the country who has not the time or disposition to make the examination might think it proper to believe them. We are further told by this gentleman that the whole country is going to destruction and that all branches of business are in an awfully bad condition and daily growing worse.

I insert as part of my remarks the following statement, which shows the fallacy of that gentleman's statement in reference to the general depression of business throughout the country:

A busy summer is predicted in all the Lowell (Massachusetts) cotton mills.

The trade of Saint Louis has been exceptionally good for the last thirty days.

The Harmony Mills, at Cohoes, New York, are running on full time and capacity.

Thousands of pedometers are being manufactured in Newark, New Jersey, for Europe.

In Sandusky, Ohio, the building outlook is said to be better than it has been in years.

The Newark (New Jersey) cutlery manufacturers have, it is said, more orders than they can fill.

Pittsburgh, Scranton, and Troy are furnishing steel rails for the Southern Pacific Railroad.

The rolling-mills of Portland, Maine, are running day and night, with orders for months to come.

Ohio's iron interest shows marked signs of improvement. Blast-furnaces and rolling-mills are everywhere resuming operations.

At New Albany, the chief manufacturing city of Ohio, a highly encouraging condition of affairs is reported by the Cincinnati Gazette. All the factories are full of orders and running on full time.

Philadelphia, which eight years ago had only sixteen shoe factories, has now over one hundred and forty. Their annual production is estimated at forty-eight million pair. At the present time work is very brisk, and the employés are receiving higher wages than they have in many years.

Boston's boot and shoe trade is fairly active. Ready-made goods are reported to be in demand for immediate delivery, and jobbers who are able to fill orders from stock on hand are said to be doing a good business.

At Troy, New York, the iron-works are all busy. Twelve hundred and fifty tons of steel rails are produced by the Bessemer Works weekly, an unexampled product. A large extension will be made to the Burden Works, and it is reported that E. Corning & Co. contemplate an addition to their extensive establishment. All the founderies are running, and a first-class season is anticipated by stove manufacturers. The linen-goods business, in all its branches, promises well. All the manufacturers expect a hurried and profitable season.

Mr. GILLETTE. May I rise to correct the statement made by my colleague, [Mr. PRICE?]

Mr. PRICE. I want to reply to him if he does.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. JOYCE] yield?

Mr. JOYCE. I cannot.

Mr. GILLETTE. Then I rise to a question of privilege.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PRICE. And I shall rise to a question of privilege to reply.

Mr. GILLETTE. In my statement to which my colleague refers I did not confine myself to Government bonds, but I explicitly included all debts of every kind owed across the water. My statistics were from the Bureau of Statistics.

Mr. PRICE. The gentleman stated positively that this Government had to pay not only $257,000,000, but four millions more, as interest on its bonds and debts.

Mr. GILLETTE. I refer to my speech for an absolute refutation of the gentleman's statements.

Mr. JOYCE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to return my sincere thanks to my honorable friend from Minnesota [Mr. DUNNELL] for his courtesy in granting me a portion of his time.

In discussing the question now before the committee, I purpose, in the first place, to take a hasty glance at the course pursued by the democratic party in this House during the past four years, and, secondly, inquire what that party is now attempting to accomplish, the means and methods resorted to, and the intent and purpose by which it is moved and actuated.

Sir, I speak to-day from an overpowering sense of public duty. I speak because I can no longer remain silent and be justified. For four long years I have sat in this Hall and heard the people of the North defamed, maligned, and the republican party traduced and vilified. I have heard the loyal men of the North charged with being the originators and primal cause of all the crimes and blood and misery of the past eighteen years, while the conduct of traitors and rebels has been held up as heroic, as honorable, and as worthy of imitation. I have heard men who in their hearts despise the Union, who hate the flag, but who love the lost cause and glory in their treason, with brutal audacity and vulgar impudence prate about the sacred obligations of the Constitution, and lecture republicans upon their duties to the Republic.

I have heard men whose souls are stained with the blood of the prisoner and the helpless, and against whom thousands of murdered men will rise up in judgment, insult the intelligence, the patriotism, and the sense of justice of the American people by assuming the role of guardians of the Constitution and conservators of the public peace and the rights of the people.

I have heard the loyal and noble men whose strong arms and stout hearts crushed that unholy and accursed conspiracy, and vindicated the power of the Government to defend and preserve its own life, abused and reviled by those whom a just and righteous God will hold responsible for the brutal and fiendish outrages at Fort Pillow, at Bell Isle, and at Andersonville.

I have seen the whole democratic party in this country rise up and heard them howl about United States soldiers at the polls, while bands of armed ruffians in the South take possession of the ballot-boxes, stuff them with tissue ballots, and shoot down and hang those who refuse to vote the democratic ticket.

Sir, it is a shame and a mockery, and should be endured no longer. The time has come when modesty and delicacy should be laid aside, and the men of the North should denounce this arrogance, expose this hypocrisy, resent the insult, and again bid defiance to resuscitated treason and modified rebellion.

It may as well be known now as ever that the people of the North, "standing securely upon their own conscious rectitude and bearing aloft the shield of the Constitution of their country," have no further concessions to make, that they have no pardon or forgiveness to ask, but that under God they are determined that the great principles settled by the war and crystallized into the organic law of the Republic shall be preserved and enforced at all hazards and at any cost; and that the men who bared their bosoms to the storm of rebellion in 1861 to guard the life of the nation from the rebel's bullet and the traitor's steel are ready in 1879 to again stand in the breach and protect it against the treason of those who are now seeking to destroy it under the forms of law.

Mr. Chairman, the record of the democratic party since it has been in power in this House is full of instruction and warning, and cannot be too often held up to the gaze and contempt of the American people.

Through base deception and fraudulent representations that party gained control of the national House of Representatives in 1875. In the campaign of 1874 you told the people that the republican party was corrupt; that it had squandered and misapplied their money; that it had burdened them with taxes, and was responsible for the great commercial panic which the year before had prostrated business and placed an embargo on trade and enterprise.

You said then that if the people would give you the control of this House you would wipe out all corruption, you would cut off all the extravagant expenditures of the Government, relieve the people from the burdens of taxation, and revive and establish the prostrate industrial interests of the country.

Unfortunately you succeeded in making enough weak-minded men in the North believe you, so that with their help and a solid South you captured this branch of the National Legislature.

In December, 1875, you organized the House and proceeded, not to carry out the solemn pledges and promises you had made to the people during the canvass, but to break every covenant, violate every pledge, and repudiate every obligation.

Instead of originating and maturing legislation which would break the terrible force of the panic and relieve the commercial distresses of the people, you attempted through your usurped and fraudulently obtained power here to buy or steal the Presidency.

In your great anxiety to play the hypocrite you hastened to pass a resolution against the granting of subsidies by Congress in order to quiet and delude the people, and then you attempted to open the doors of the National Treasury to the greed and hunger of southern schemers and to pay thirty thousand millions of rebel war claims.

You have endeavored to destroy the Army and Navy that you might hereafter recruit and officer them with those whose crimes have rendered them unfit and unworthy to be again trusted by the Government.

You have exerted every power and tried every scheme to depreciate our currency, destroy our securities, and prevent resumption and the return of commercial confidence and prosperity.

You have made a show of cutting down the expenditures of the National Government only to waste the money you thus saved in fruitless investigations and in partisan efforts to blacken the fair fame of the men who saved the Republic from the treason and rebellion of the democratic party.

You have obstinately refused the necessary appropriations to carry on the several departments of the Government, to the great injury of the public business, so that you could have money to pay pensions to those whose names had been dropped from the national pension rolls for participation in the rebellion.

You have attempted to destroy the manufacturing interests of the North by repealing the tariff, and have done all in your power to render it impossible for the Government to collect its revenues in the Southern States.

You have violated the Constitution, set the laws at defiance, and outraged humanity by depriving the colored people of the South of the right to vote.

You have attempted to crush out the republican party in the South by fraud and violence, breaking up their meetings and compelling them by force to abandon their organization, while you stand here and insult the loyal people of the country by talking about a free ballot and pure elections.

You have by bloody persecutions and political intolerance driven the colored people, on whom you are really dependent for the food you eat and the clothes you wear, from your borders, and then when they are fleeing from the house of their bondage to the promised land in the great West you fall upon them and kill them in the wilderness.

You have stricken down the right of free speech in the South, and by violence and murder compelled free men to vote the democratic ticket against their will. You have shot and hung men for opinion's sake, and ridden into power in this House by intimidation, fraudulent voting, ballot-box stuffing, and false counting. You have by the most shameless partisanship and barefaced pettifogging turned out of this House members who were fairly and legally elected, and filled their places with men who are willing to do your bidding. You have sought to sanctify and canonize treason and to debase loyalty by eulogizing traitors and contemptuously spurning those who fought to save and preserve the Republic.

You have openly and boastfully declared on the floor of Congress that you intend not only to repeal the laws for the protection of the ballot-box, which you seek to do by this bill, but that you will also strike from the statute-book every vestige of legislation made necessary by the war, so that while you cannot lay your impious and sacrilegious hands upon the amendments to the Constitution you will by repealing all laws passed for their enforcement render them powerless and of no effect.

You have forced this extra session of Congress against the protest and determined efforts of the republicans because you could not compel the Senate of the United States to pass the Army and the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bills, loaded down with vicious legislation, calculated to perpetuate the power of the democratic power in the South and give them the control of the ballot-boxes in Cincinnati and New York City at the next presidential election.

Learning nothing by observation or experience, and taking counsel only of those who represent the worst element in your party, and having gained control of the Senate, you now propose to coerce the Executive by threatening the Government with starvation and death unless he betrays his trust and surrenders to your demands. In this unconstitutional and revolutionary proceeding you affect to believe that the people are with you, and will respond with their votes. Let me tell you, gentlemen, that you are terribly deceived. Instead of the people standing by you and sustaining you in this attempt to destroy the purity of the ballot-box and subvert the Government, you are solidifying the people of the North against you and daily filling the ranks of the republican party with recruits from your own camp. Every patriot, every honest citizen, every lover of his race, and every Christian man and woman in the whole North is to-day arrayed against you.

You have missed the golden opportunity for victory, and your political doom in 1880 is already sealed. The rising wave of republican triumph is now gathering its conquering force and will soon strike the golden shores of the Pacific, and rolling eastward, bearing upon its sparkling crest the proud ensign of our great leaders, will ingulf the famous political chameleon of Ohio, bury the ambitious holder of the gavel from Pennsylvania, drown the backsliding statesman from Delaware, overwhelm the great railroad and revenue fraud at Gramercy Park, and finally swallow up in its mighty flood the last remnant of the democratic party.

Now, sir, I am well aware that because I speak plainly, declare the truth, and call things by their right names I shall be charged with cherishing a spirit of bitterness and hate toward the people of the South.

Why, sir, these gentlemen would have us weigh every thought, measure every word, and pluck from our memories every feeling and recollection of the war when we venture to speak of what has occurred in this country since 1860. The very moment a man on this side rises to defend the republican party from the assaults of those who sought for four years to destroy the Government, we are at once met with the charge that we are stirring up sectional strife and animosity. Why, sir, it is impossible to speak of the glorious victories and achievements of that grand old party without stirring up the anger and animosity of gentlemen on the other side over whom those victories have been won. If gentlemen so dislike these stinging memories, the way to settle this whole matter and bury the recollections of the past eighteen years is for the people of the South to renounce forever the doctrine of State rights and secession, disband their rifle clubs and ku-klux, and allow every citizen to cast his ballot free from fear and intimidation and to have that ballot honestly counted. If you will do this then may be realized in the near future the dreams and visions of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. TUCKER;] but if you persist in your present course, depend upon it the conflict will be and ought to be irrepressible until in God's own good time and way it shall, as it certainly will, be settled forever on the broad basis of right and justice.

Now, sir, what has the democratic party to offer as an offset to this long indictment of dark and damning sins? Nothing, sir; absolutely nothing. Not one honest patriotic motive or intention. Not one noble or loyal act, and not one victory for humanity, justice, and right, during these four long and dreary years of democratic outrage, audacity, and wrong. Truly doth the inspired word declare that "when the wicked bear rule the people mourn."

From this dark and disgraceful history of the past let us turn to the present, and see what this party, which has now control of both branches of the National Legislature, proposes to do, and the means by which it is sought to corrupt the ballot-box in our large cities in the interest of democracy, and drive honest men from the polls.

It is the science of true statesmanship not to cause unnecessary alarm by exaggerating and magnifying the evils which may at any time threaten us, but to fully measure and comprehend them, and then, by a wise and prudent course of action, surmount the difficulties and mitigate or avoid the evils.

Surely no man in his sober senses will accuse me of being an alarmist when I say that the people of this country find themselves to-day face to face with a question the magnitude and importance of which cannot be exaggerated, and which in its results may involve not only the future welfare and prosperity of the people, but the very life and existence of the nation. Treason, after lying in a state of partial stupor for the last decade, has through the warming influences of conciliation and republican magnanimity recovered, and again rears its brazen head, while the spirit of rebellion, taking on another form, again threatens the peace and perpetuity of the Government.

In the city named for Washington; in the sacred capital of the nation; ay, in the very halls of Congress, the men whose hands are yet red with the blood of thousands, and upon whose souls rest all the woes and crimes and agonies of four years of bloody and unnatural war, stand up and in the presence of the people of the North and before mankind laud their treason, eulogize the traitors, glory in the devilish dogma from which it sprung, and mourn only because they were not successful.

Sir, the same political elements, the same spirit of evil that in 1861 inaugurated rebellion and plunged the country into a civil war, which cost the people of the North the lives of a million brave men and seven billions of treasure, which scattered the weeds of mourning in every northern household and left a vacant chair at every hearthstone, have under the banner of democracy again come to the front, and with unblushing impudence and shameless audacity they now seize the Government by the throat and threaten its life unless they are permitted to tear down every bulwark and safeguard which wisdom and experience have placed around the ballot-box, and drag the Government down into the unfathomable depths of democratic infamy and corruption.

The men engaged in the present revolutionary and treasonable scheme manifest the same spirit of "rule or ruin" that has always characterized their purposes and acts from the time of Calhoun down to the present moment.

They and the ravenous and famishing horde at their backs, who are hungering and thirsting for the spoils of office, have set their hearts upon gaining control of the National Government in 1880, and there is nothing that bad men can conceive, or human ingenuity invent, to which they will not resort to accomplish their purpose.

They understand fully that with a free, fair ballot and an honest count they would stand no more chance of consummating their designs than they would of being translated.

In fraud, in intimidation, in ballot-box stuffing, in false registration, and fraudulent naturalization, in false counting, and in all manner of corruption and violence, which none but democrats could discover or would dare to resort to, lies the only road to a democratic victory in 1880, and they know it, and for this they are beginning to prepare by the repeal of every statute which stands in the way or which seems to offer the slightest obstruction to their scheme.

Sir, do the men who are engaged in this attempt at revolution; who are thus seeking, through the pollution of the ballot-box, to sap and mine the Government; who are, by repealing these laws, endeavoring to remove the last great prop which supports the Republic; who are intent upon striking down the ballot, and with it the cause of civil and religious liberty in this country; who are seeking to destroy the only free Government on earth and curse us with anarchy and despotism; who are ready and anxious to tear down the sacred right of suffrage and establish upon its ruins the edicts and behests of a corrupt and servile political caucus; who are laboring to encourage and protect fraud and corruption by relieving it from the possibility of detection of punishment—do these men suppose that the people of the North are asleep and off their guard; that they fail to comprehend the situation or that they will ever submit to such degradation at the hands of the men who now occupy positions of honor and profit under the Government through republican leniency and magnanimity? It may be well for the people of the South, amid their arrogant assumptions of to-day, to remember the lessons of the war.

The people of the North ask for nothing unreasonable or unjust, but what is their right they will have at all hazards. They are slow to anger and of a forgiving spirit, but when once aroused, in the maintenance of their rights, let the adversary beware. They make no threats, they offer no menace, but they are solemnly determined that, cost what it may, every citizen of the Republic, North and South, East and West, shall be protected in his rights, and if the principles for which they fought four years are, in the opinion of the Southern people, not yet settled, rest assured the time will come, and that right speedily, when they will be, and settled most effectually.

The right of every citizen of the Republic to cast his ballot without fear or intimidation, and to have that ballot honestly counted, is regarded by the people of the North as sacred as the right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. Whatever tends to secure, protect, and defend that right, they are earnestly in favor of, and whatever tends to weaken, impair, or expose it to danger, they as constantly and resolutely oppose.

Sir, the loyal men of this country are fully aroused by the revolutionary acts of the democratic majority in Congress; they see that the rebel element in that party is again in the ascendant; they believe that the acts of 1870 and 1871, now sought to be repealed, are absolutely essential to a free ballot and an honest count; they comprehend in its full force and power the momentous and vital importance of the issue now thrust upon them; and every republican in all this broad land, from President Hayes down to the most humble member of the party, is as firm as the everlasting hills, and ready to resist the repeal of these laws to the bitter end, regardless of the consequences.

Cheered and encouraged by the loyal and law-abiding people who send us here, we should be recreant to every principle of honor, betray the sacred trust committed to our charge, and deserve to be sent home in everlasting disgrace, should we fail to resist this atrocious and wicked conspiracy with all our power, and denounce this revolutionary and treasonable democratic scheme in the most emphatic manner and in language which cannot be misunderstood.

And, sir, as far as I am concerned, I desire gentlemen to understand here and now that if need be I will stand here to resist every encroachment upon the sacred right of suffrage and in defense of what I conceive to be the inalienable and constitutional right of every citizen of the Republic, North, South, East, and West, asking and giving no quarters until the expiration of my term on the 4th of March, 1881; and will also guarantee that at the end of that time the people of the first congressional district of Vermont will be represented here by a man who will be ready to assist in taking up the good work where we leave it and carry it on to a sure and certain victory.

Looking at this struggle from a political stand-point, I deem it exceedingly fortunate, Mr. Chairman, that this important question has come up for discussion and, as I hope, for final settlement at this time.

I am glad the democratic party, under the lead of its southern masters, has, upon its accession to power at both ends of the Capitol, defined its position and taken its stand. The issue is now so plain and distinctly marked that the people everywhere understand and appreciate it.

It is the republican party standing up nobly and manfully for a free ballot and an honest count on the one side, and the democratic party as the advocate and champion of violence, murder, intimidation, ballot-box stuffing, and fraudulent counting upon the other.

Having paid my respects to the gentlemen on the other side, I desire now, Mr. Chairman, to examine a little more closely the question before the committee, and see what the democracy propose to do, how they seek to do it, and for what purpose. On reference to the printed bill now under consideration we shall find, on pages 83 and 84, a proviso which proposes, in a few brief lines, to repeal eleven sections of the Revised Statutes of the United States and amend four others, the object of which is to wipe from the statute-book every provision which authorizes Federal officers to protect the ballot-box and to keep the peace at the polls, and to deny to the General Government any and all supervision over the national elections, and leave them subject only to State laws and State control.

The sections of the statute sought to be repealed and amended provide, in brief, that the several circuit courts of the United States shall appoint a chief supervisor of elections for each judicial circuit, who shall be a commissioner of said court; that said chief supervisor shall assist the said circuit court in the selection and appointment of subordinate supervisors, when applied for under the law, furnish them with books, blanks, forms, &c., verify the registers of voters furnished by said subordinate supervisors, and preserve all returns, reports, and records provided for by the law; that the said subordinate supervisors shall attend at the registration of voters and at all national elections, and shall scrutinize, count, and canvass each ballot and make return of the same to the chief supervisor; and if they are interfered with in the discharge of their duties they shall report to the chief supervisor, and he shall take the testimony and transmit it to the House of Representatives.

They also provide that the United States marshals in the several districts may appoint deputies to aid the supervisors at the registration and voting, and that said deputy marshals shall keep the peace, prevent fraudulent registration and voting, and arrest any person who attempts to commit any offense against the laws of the United States, and when any marshal or deputy is hindered in the execution of his duty, he may call upon the bystanders or the posse comitatus to aid him, and they are bound to obey; that the marshals and court commissioners are to forward to the chief supervisor all complaints, records, and returns, and all oaths administered by them to subordinate supervisors and deputy marshals for preservation, and that any person arrested by either of the before-named officers is to be brought at once before the United States circuit court or a commissioner of said court for examination; also providing for the punishment of persons who shall hinder or resist a supervisor, marshal, or deputy marshal in the discharge of their various duties under this law, and for the payment of these officers for their services.

Now, sir, when these provisions of law, which were enacted for the protection of the voter and the purity of the ballot-box, are repealed, and no officer armed with the power and authority of the Federal Government is allowed at the polls, what assurance have we left that in New York City, in Cincinnati, as well as in nearly all parts of the South, our national elections will not be again controlled by fraud and violence, and instead of uttering the will of the people will only register the wild edict of a democratic mob?

It is true you leave upon the statute-book the law authorizing the appointment of two supervisors who may attend the registration of voters and be present on the day of election, but they are shorn of their power, they are stripped of their authority, they are powerless to prevent crime or to arrest the offender, they can only be present as witnesses, they are "there by the courtesy of the State," and are wholly "at the mercy of the mob."

The democratic caucus has determined, and the adoption of the proviso in this bill will accomplish it, that hereafter no civil officer of the Federal Government shall be permitted to approach the polls on election day, and that State authority shall be supreme, so that democratic repeaters, ballot-box stuffers, rifle clubs, and fraudulent voters may have free course and be glorified. And this you propose to do, not according to the customary and established rules and forms of law, but by seizing the Government by the throat and threatening to starve it into submission unless your outrageous demands are complied with. This assault by the democratic party upon the very citadel of our liberties the republicans stand solemnly pledged to resist; and, God helping us, we will resist it as long as a loyal voice can be raised in opposition and an honest vote cast in defense.

While we on this side of the House would resist the repeal of these laws in all forms and under all circumstances, yet had the majority brought in bills for that purpose they would have followed the usual forms of parliamentary usage, and we could have taken no exception to the manner of repeal and could only have resisted them on the ground that it was a blow struck at the purity of the ballot-box and would prove subversive of liberty. Had they placed them as riders on appropriation bills and nothing more, we could only have objected to that on the ground that such a practice is of evil and vicious influence, leading to all sorts of grave abuses and dangerous consequences; but when the repeal is attempted by tacking it on to an appropriation bill and saying to the Executive that unless he surrenders his constitutional rights and his judgment, and not only consents but approves of the repeal against his honest and settled convictions, you will destroy the diplomatic and consular service of the Government, shut up the Treasury, close the Pension Bureau, stop the work in the Patent Office, put out the lights on our coasts, and lock the doors of the courts, this is illegal, revolutionary, and criminal, and should be and will be resisted to the bitter end.

Gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber fall into a grave error when they talk about the laws they now seek to repeal as war measures, or as legislation growing out of the war; the fact is the war had nothing to do with them, and furnished no reason or motive for their passage.

In order, sir, to a full and complete understanding of the history of these statutes, and the real causes and reasons which led to their enactment, it will be necessary to go back to the political campaign of 1868, when the election in New York City was the culmination of democratic frauds and villainies at the ballot-box.

Prior to 1870, the Tammany wing of the democratic party had controlled the destinies of New York City most of the time for many years. They had done it by means of money which Tweed had accumulated, and which Samuel J. Tilden, as chairman of the State democratic central committee, had disbursed.

In the campaign of 1868, General Grant was the candidate of the republican party for President, and Horatio Seymour was the candidate of the democratic party.

The canvass was close and hotly contested by both parties, and at one time it seemed possible that the electoral vote of New York might decide the result of the national election.

In view of such a contingency, the issues of the campaign were deemed vital by the Tammany democracy, and every means was resorted to by Tweed and Tilden, backed up by Judges Barnard, McCunn, and Cardoza, which these ingenious and corrupt manipulators could invent to overcome all opposition, thwart the constitutionally expressed will of the people, and corruptly carry the State for Seymour and Hoffman against Grant and Griswold.

The evidence taken before a congressional committee established the fact, beyond cavil or question, of a deliberately planned gigantic conspiracy, on the part of the democratic party in New York, to perpetrate these frauds, and stamps with deepest infamy the conduct of that party during the whole campaign.

Prior to the year 1868, naturalizations were effected in that city only in the court of common pleas and the superior court; the average number naturalized annually, in both courts, from 1856 to 1867, being ninety-two hundred and seven.

In October, 1868, the supreme court, at the instigation of democratic politicians, commenced the work of naturalization, and in that month that court, presided over by Judge Barnard, naturalized 10,070 men, while the superior court, presided over by Judge McCunn, in the same period of time naturalized 27,897.

Why, sir, to such a perfect system was this business of making democratic votes reduced by these scoundrels that Judge Barnard naturalized 2,109 men in a single day, while Judge McCunn, who was equally corrupt but not quite as nimble, got through only 955 at a single sitting!

The naturalization laws of the United States provide that when a minor comes to reside here before he is eighteen years of age, he may be naturalized without having first made declaration in court two years before admission to citizenship of his intention to become a citizen. This is the shortest route for the foreigner to citizenship; requires less swearing and waiting, and consequently in New York City less perjury, and brings quicker votes. Under the provisions of this law out of 10,093 applications, filed for naturalization in Judge Barnard's court in October, 1868, 9,711 of them were minors' applications; and in Judge McCunn's court during the same month, out of 17,572 applications 13,541 of them were of the same character.

In addition to the facilities furnished by the courts of Judges Barnard and McCunn, naturalization offices were established by the democrats in different parts of the city, where the necessary papers were filled out and the forms of naturalization gone through with, so that, according to the best estimate, at least from sixty to seventy thousand persons were naturalized in that city in the year 1868, either in court or at the branch offices already referred to.

In the case of minors who come to reside here before they are eighteen, only two witnesses are required to swear to that fact and to their good character to complete the whole job of naturalization and put them in possession of the final papers which entitle them at once to all the rights, privileges, and responsibilities of an American citizen. For the accommodation of such applicants the democracy of Tammany Hall kindly furnished nine standing witnesses, with an officer to command them, and these nine witnesses made affidavit in behalf of nearly seven thousand applicants, one witness swearing in nine hundred and eighty-six cases, not a dozen of the applicants he or they had in all human probability ever seen or heard of before.

In Judge Barnard's court, twenty-one witnesses swore that they knew the fact that nine thousand seven hundred and eleven men who applied for minors' certificates of naturalization came to reside in this country before they were eighteen, an average of four hundred and sixty-two to a witness; while in Judge McCunn's court thirty-seven witnesses swore to 13,541, an average of three hundred and ninety-three to each witness; a thing false upon its face and absolutely impossible, and the judges of course knew it. As auxiliary to all this democratic villainy and wickedness, bands of picked men, on the days of registration and election, traversed the whole city, registering and voting at all the different voting places on assumed or fictitious names. These scoundrels were called "repeaters," and in one instance "nine of them registered in three hundred different places and voted in nearly every one of them." Men voted from twice to forty times upon false registration; more than five hundred were registered from localities where but fifteen residents could be found, and one vacant lot had registered from it one hundred and eighteen democratic voters.

And these villains were all promised at the time protection from prosecution and immunity from their crimes by the democratic leaders, and from that day to this no one of them has ever been tried or punished. The result of all these frauds and crimes against suffrage and a fair ballot, by the democrats of New York City in 1868, was that not less than sixty-eight thousand fraudulent naturalization certificates were issued, and from fifty to sixty thousand fraudulent votes were cast, which carried the State for Seymour against Grant, and made Hoffman governor, as against Griswold, by ten thousand majority. As Judge Lawrence in his report says:

These appalling and startling frauds were the result of a systematic plan of gigantic proportions, stealthily prearranged and boldly executed, not merely by bands of degraded desperadoes, but with the direct sanction, approval, or aid of many prominent officials and citizens of New York, with the shrewdly concealed connivance of others, and almost without an effort to discourage or prevent them by any of those in whose interest and political party associations they were successfully executed, who could not fail to have cognizance of them, and whose duty it was to expose, defeat, and punish them.

They were aided by an immense corrupt and corrupting official patronage and power, which not only encouraged but shielded and protected the guilty principals and their aiders and abettors.

These frauds were so varied in character that they comprehended every known crime against the elective franchise. They corrupted the administration of justice, degraded the judiciary, defeated the execution of the laws, subverted for the time being the essential principles of popular government, robbed the people of that great State of their rightful choice of electors of President and Vice-President, of a governor and other officers; disgraced the most populous city of the Union; encouraged the enemies of republican government here and everywhere to deride our institutions as a failure, and endangered the peace of the Republic by an attempt to defeat the will of the people in the choice of their rulers.

These flagrant and unparalleled frauds committed by the democratic party in that city in the election of 1868 aroused not only the honest men of that State but of the whole country, and attracted the attention of Congress.

The result was that in answer to a memorial of a committee of the Union League Club of the city of New York presented in the Senate and House of Representatives on the 14th of December, 1868, a select committee was appointed by the House of Representatives charged with the duty of investigating "the irregularities and frauds alleged to have occurred in the city of New York affecting the recent election for Representatives to Congress and electors of President and Vice-President."

That committee, with Judge William Lawrence, of Ohio, at its head, proceeded to the city of New York, and after a most thorough and searching investigation into all the charges of fraud and corruption alleged to have occurred at that election, made their report that—

The events of the past year in New York and the evidence taken by the committee furnish the proof of all the allegations which had been made.

That these frauds were so monstrous in character and extent that they could not have been the work of a few or of many irresponsible individuals. It was the work of the democratic party. That in their purpose and modes of execution they showed a systematic plan, devised by controlling minds for the purpose of carrying the election in the State.

This report, including the recommendations of the committee regarding new legislation, was duly considered and most elaborately discussed in both the Senate and the House, and the result was the passage by Congress of the act of May 31, 1870, making illegal registration or voting at elections at which members of Congress were chosen a national offense; the act of July 14, 1870, providing for the appointment of supervisors of election and special deputy marshals in all cities having over twenty thousand inhabitants, and the act of February 28, 1871, which was a revision of the act of July 14, 1870, defining the rights, powers, and duties of the said officers, and providing more efficient measures for the enforcement of both the foregoing acts, all of which statutes it is now proposed by the democratic party to repeal and blot out.

Now, sir, why should these laws be repealed? Can any man give a reason or a shadow of reason for it? I am aware that it is claimed by the ignorant portion of the democratic party that these supervisors of election and deputy marshals are used to further the designs and build up the political fortunes of the republican party, as well as to deter democrats from going to the polls to vote. But no intelligent man who has any claim to respectability, or who values his reputation for truth, will dare to make such a statement. There is not a man on this floor, or an intelligent man in this country, who does not know that such a charge, from whatever quarter it may come, is as false as the source from which it originates.

Why, sir, in all the sweeping and costly investigations which have been made since the democratic party took possession of this House, nearly four years ago, not a single case has come to the notice of any committee where any citizen either North or South who had a right to vote has been kept from the polls or prevented from casting his ballot by the officers appointed under these laws.

Rogues and scoundrels have often been prevented from desecrating the ballot-box, their fraudulent and wicked schemes have been nipped in the bud, and the guilty prosecuted and punished through the fidelity and untiring efforts of these officers acting in the capacity of conservators of the public peace and as protectors and guardians of the purity of the elective franchise; but no honest man has suffered or in any manner been impeded or hindered by them in the exercise and enjoyment of all his constitutional rights.

Surely, if these officers had been guilty of such flagrant violations of law as is claimed it would have been susceptible of proof, and democratic zeal and enterprise and Tilden's money would ere this have brought them to trial and punishment. The very fact that not one of them has ever been tried and convicted is conclusive evidence to my mind that the charges are either ignorantly made or are willfully and maliciously false. Not only this, but the history of elections in New York City since 1868 under the operation of these laws not only gives the lie to such a charge, but furnishes the strongest possible argument against their repeal.

Before the passage of these laws, it is conceded by everybody that there had not been and could not be under the State authorities a fair and honest election in that city for years. Tilden and Tweed, backed by Tammany Hall, had by means of fraud, corruption, and violence been enabled to thwart the will of the people at the ballot-box and keep the democracy in power. But the power of the General Government, acting through the laws it is now proposed to repeal, has wrought a mighty revolution, and since they were put in force by Supervisor Davenport in 1872 the elections in that city have been as quiet, as peaceable, and as fair as could reasonably be expected in a city which is made up of all nationalities, and which in 1876 polled 171,000 votes.

And, sir, it gives me great pleasure, by the aid of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. FRYE,] to be able at this time to present to the House the evidence of a no less distinguished witness than the eminent gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX,] in support of what I have said upon this point. In a report made by him as chairman of a democratic committee appointed to investigate the New York election of 1876, he says:

Whatever may be said about the United States law as to elections or their supervision by United States authority; whatever may be said as to the right of a State to regulate in all ways such elections, this must be said: that the administration of the law by Commissioners Davenport, Muirhead, and Allen, the United States functionaries, and their subordinates, was eminently just, wise, and conducive to a fair public expression in a presidential year of unusual excitement and great temptation.

Of course the United States marshal had his deputies to execute the warrants. There was one marshal for each election district. Extracts from United States statutes were sent out in circulars, together with directions to supervisors and deputy marshals. More care could not have been taken, in the judgment of the committee, for the verification of the registry and the purity of the election.

The committee would commend to other portions of the country and to other cities this remarkable system, developed through the agency of both local and Federal authorities, acting in harmony for an honest purpose. In no portion of the world, and in no era of time, where there has been an expression of the popular will through the forms of law, has there ever been a more complete and thorough illustration of republican institutions. Whatever may have been the previous habit or conduct of elections in those cities, or howsoever they may conduct themselves in the future, this election of 1876 will stand as a monument of what good faith, honest endeavor, legal forms, and just authority may do for the protection of the elective franchise.

From the moment the supervisors are appointed, from the moment that the lists are purged, from the moment that the applications are examined, to the very last return of the popular expression, this election shows the calm mastery of prudence. For this due credit should be given to men of both parties, and especially to the corporation counsel, Mr. Whitney, and United States supervisors.

Mr. Commissioner Davenport had maps of every house and building in the city These maps were corrected every thirty days. You cannot build a wing to your house or change its number, or add to its stories or rooms, or change the quality or character of the dwelling, without its being registered by the supervisor. All the doubtful or suspected or bad houses are registered and known. When these changes are made that fact is brought to the attention of the functionaries in charge of the trust, and all trouble appeased and all wrong rectified.

Whether this work, which is unexampled, should be accounted a republican work through their Federal election law, or the work of the local authorities and organisms, inspired by a desire for an honest vote among the people, who were especially jealous of it on account of what was occurring elsewhere, one thing the committee must report that it approximated as near to perfection as it was possible to do. There were no riots, no fights, no bayonets, no disturbance, no conflicts of authority, and none of the concomitants which accompany fraud and endanger free institutions.

The people of the country owe a tribute of respect to the police of a city of more than a million, and to the United States officers, who numbered thousands, for the harmony of action between the various officers, so as to illustrate to all the world how the imperial island city can conduct herself under great excitement and in view of startling events.

In Cincinnati so well satisfied are the honest people of that city with these laws and their administration that a few weeks ago they elected the supervisor city judge by a rousing majority, and no word of complaint has been heard, except from the scum of the city and interested democratic politicians; while in Philadelphia democrats as well as republicans petition the circuit court for the appointment of supervisors, so that peace may be preserved at the polls, honest men have a chance to vote, and the ballot-box be protected from violence and corruption. The objection is sometimes made that the deputy marshals appointed under the provisions of these laws have the power to arrest persons who are found attempting to commit any offense against the laws of the United States.

Why, sir, this power is possessed by every marshal, deputy marshal, sheriff, deputy sheriff, constable, and police officer, under State and municipal laws, in every city, village, town, and hamlet in this whole country, and has been from the organization of the Government down to the present time.

It has also been urged with great vehemence by gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber that a great and grievous wrong was committed by Davenport, in New York City, in arresting men before they had a chance to vote. Sir, what earthly object could have been attained by arresting them after they had voted? The fact is Davenport had investigated this matter and found that thousands of men who intended to vote the democratic ticket held fraudulent naturalization papers. He had their names, residences, and descriptive lists, and there could be no possible mistake about it, and he had the warrants issued beforehand for their arrest in case they offered or attempted to vote.

This was the only way to prevent the great wrong which these rogues were intending to perpetrate. After their fraudulent votes are deposited in the ballot-box the great crime is consummated, and there is no remedy or atonement. What did Seymour and Hoffman care, after they had received the benefit of the fraudulent votes cast in 1868, what became of the men who cast them? No man who has a legal right to vote, or who desires a pure ballot-box and an honest election, would object to the exercise by these officers of this wholesome preventive power, and no man can point to a solitary case where an honest man has ever been hindered or prevented from voting, in New York City or anywhere else, by deputy marshals appointed under these laws.

It is because the democrats do not want honesty at the polls, because they want to stuff the ballot-boxes with fraudulent votes, and have them presided over by repeaters and bullies, that they are so anxious to pass the proviso to this bill and be rid of these troublesome deputy marshals, who are continually breaking up their plans, and preventing the consummation of their corrupt and wicked schemes.

The truth is, Mr. Chairman, the democratic party is determined, by the repeal of these laws, to remove all the safeguards which have been thrown around the elective franchise and expose it to the assaults of the corrupt and vicious, because they hope and expect, with a clear field, to carry the next presidential election by fraud, violence, and foul play at the ballot-box. No party that has an honest purpose or that desires a just and fair expression of the will of the people at the polls would ever seek the destruction of every defense and protection which the experience and wisdom of years have thrown around the ballot-box by the repeal of these laws, and no party that bases its hopes of success upon corruption and bribery would suffer them to remain a single moment upon the statute-book after it had the power to remove them.

Sir, this scheme is a deliberate and cold-blooded attempt on the part of the democratic party to destroy the purity of the ballot-box, to strike down the right of free suffrage in the North as it has in the South, restore the old régime of Tilden and Tweed in New York, place the result of our elections in the hands of bullies and prize-fighters, drive honest men from the polls, and clear the way for the most gigantic frauds in 1880 that were ever perpetrated and before which those of 1868 would fade into insignificance. It is democratic preparation to carry New York in 1880. With Federal supervision of the election such as we have had since 1871 they know it would be hopeless; but if these laws are repealed and they are left free to naturalize, stuff ballot-boxes, and count the votes as in 1868 and according to the present democratic standard in the South, New York can be made to roll up fifty or one hundred thousand democratic majority, which with a solid South that they will have, law or no law, would give them reasonable assurances of success.

In the repeal of these laws the democracy have two objects in view: one is to save from conviction and punishment the men whose crimes against the ballot secured them their late successes both North and South, and the other is to remove and clear away all obstacles and to make the way easy and safe to the perpetration of election frauds in the future. The democrats carried many of the Southern States last fall by means of the most gigantic frauds, the most brutal violence, and dastardly intimidation. Scores of the men engaged in it have been tried and convicted, many are already in the penitentiary, and others are fast following.

Owing to the zeal and fidelity of Attorney-General Devens and his subordinates in the Southern States, the democratic party is in danger of being broken up; and the desperate straits to which they are driven is evidenced by the fact that the democratic paper in this city warned the faithful that unless these election fraud prosecutions were stopped the flower and chivalry of the party would be in the penitentiary before the regular meeting of Congress in December, and that the republicans would be enabled to organize the House.

Now, sir, who has asked for the repeal of these laws? Where are the petitions and memorials which have come up to Congress from the people, praying to be relieved from the burden, the oppression, and the torture of this terrible republican inquisition?

Sir, from one end of this great country to the other not a prayer has been uttered and not a petition has been indited except in the hearts and desires of democratic politicians, who see through the fraudulent voting, ballot-box stuffing, and false counting, made easy and certain by the repeal of these laws, hopeful signs of a democratic victory in 1880.

Again, Mr. Chairman, if these laws are so outrageous and oppressive, and the republican party is constantly degrading them for political purposes in compelling men to vote that ticket and keeping honest democrats from the polls, why has this House not repealed them before this late day?

The democratic party has had control of this House for four years and could have passed any act they pleased during that time, and yet we search the record in vain for the evidence of an attempt even to repeal these obnoxious laws. Why, then, this great haste and reckless determination to repeal them now? Sir, the answer is, because heretofore the democratic bullies, ballot-box stuffers, and fraudulent counters, whose crimes and villainies have brought shame and reproach upon the cause of free suffrage, have not been brought up for trial and punishment; they have been permitted to go on in their iniquity without check or hinderance. The laws have not been rigidly enforced until Attorney-General Devens took hold of it, and now the democrats are alarmed; they are beginning to think that it will be difficult for them to keep up a majority in the national House of Representatives and in the State penitentiaries at the same time, and the leaders and presidential aspirants are calling lustily for repeal. The people have not asked for it; the masses do not require it, in fact they have protested in thunder tones against the outrage; but the terrible necessities and exigencies of the democratic party demand it, the caucus decrees it, and it must be done if at the expense of an extra session of Congress and the certain ruin of every industrial interest in the country.

The revolutionary manner in which it is sought to force the repeal of these laws by putting it on as an amendment to the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, with the evident design and purpose of compelling the President to approve it or stop the wheels of Government, has no parallel in the history of this country. Never before has any party in either House of Congress, even in the full flush of victory, dared to attempt to force upon the country vicious partisan legislation by a threat to cut off necessary appropriations and suspend the functions of the Government unless the other branches would accept the terms and bow to its decree. We have been taught to believe that the powers of the General Government are divided into three great co-ordinate branches, the legislative, the executive, and the judicial, each in its own sphere independent of the other, and yet so joined and blended as to all work together in perfect harmony in accomplishing the end of all good government, the welfare and happiness of the people.

We have always supposed that the only legitimate way to enact a law or to repeal one was by the voluntary concurrence of the House and Senate and the approval of the President. It has been always understood and never disputed or questioned before that under our form of Government, for the House of Representatives to attempt to compel the Senate to pass any measure, or the Executive to approve it, by refusing to pass the necessary appropriation bills to carry on the Government, would be as much a violation of the provisions of the Constitution as it would be for the Executive to attempt to intimidate Congress by the use of the military arm of the Government. Through all the years of our history until now no political party has been bold enough, no politician has had the audacity, to dream for a moment that the people of this country would ever consent that either branch should usurp the whole legislative power of the Government to the exclusion of the others in violation of law and in defiance of the Constitution.

No, sir, history records no parallel, and it was reserved for the democratic party of this day, made up and controlled as it is by the rebel element of the South, to inaugurate the scheme of stealing the Presidency, to commit this outrage upon the sacred right of citizenship for the purpose of wrenching the Government from the control of its rightful possessors and natural guardians, and installing in power a party controlled and led by the worst element that ever afflicted or cursed a people.

As has been well said during this discussion, "the proposition to repeal these laws takes hold, and violent hold, of the whole body of criminal law applicable to the purity of elections and ruthlessly repeals it while it substitutes nothing in its stead." It is an attempt "to cut out twenty sections from the body of the criminal laws of the United States, and virtually declare that the crimes of ballot-box stuffing, fraud at the polls, intimidation, and outrage of voters may go on without check or observation by national authority; that to poison the very fountain spring of the elective franchise shall be no crime against the nation; and that all the machinery for punishing it shall be destroyed." Ay, sir, it is more than this. As was said by an eloquent gentleman from Indiana in the discussion of this proviso in the last Congress:

It is another effort of the hydra-headed viper, State rights, to sink its poisoned fangs into the heart of our nationality; another demand that every landmark between loyalty and treason be effaced; another blow at the vital doctrine that we are a nation and not a mere confederation of States. It is intended as a recognition of the heresy that the States are absolutely sovereign and the nation powerless to enact such measures as will secure to every citizen qualified by law the right to vote at a national election and have such vote counted. It wrenches from the statute-book one of the safeguards of loyalty and aims a deadly stab at the purity of national elections. It is in the interest of the law-breaker of every grade, in the interest of fraud, force, intimidation, violence, and a corrupt ballot, and a vicious attack upon the purity and safety of the elective franchise. It will subserve the purpose of the outlaw in whatever field of villainy he may be an adept, and as a consequence the murderous rifle club, the ballot-box stuffer, the tissue-ticket user, the repeater, the plug-ugly, briber, and forger, and every criminal in the land will hail it with approval. It will encourage the lawless to strike down with impunity and rob the citizen of one of the inestimable rights guaranteed by the Constitution.

* * * * * * *

Can it be that those who inscribed upon their banner "Tilden, Hendricks, and reform" are driven to such extremes to preserve the liberty of the reformer? Must the criminal code be abolished, all penal provisions in United States laws wiped out, all safeguards for the protection of the honest voter repealed, for the reason that the same are a standing menace to democratic supremacy and tend to thwart the practices of the democratic reformer.

In this crisis, thus forced upon us by a reckless and disloyal party, there is but one course for the republicans to pursue, and that is to stand firm, and with courage and determination resist to the last the consummation of this infamous scheme. Upon the record made by the democratic party in the last Congress, supplemented by that of the present session, we can safely appeal to the people of this country for their verdict.

At a time when the industrial interests of the whole country require exemption from disturbance and agitation; when business needs time to recuperate and adjust itself; when the glad news of the revival of trade is wafted to us upon every breeze; and when courage and confidence are surely returning, the democratic party, for mere partisan purposes and to gratify an insatiate greed for power, dashes the brightening prospects of every business man to the ground, checks the rising hopes of every son of toil, and unsettles every enterprise by forcing upon us an extra session of Congress because the Senate refused to allow a revolutionary majority of the House of Representatives to inject into an appropriation bill legislation which is abhorrent to the feelings of every patriotic man and repugnant to all the principles of a free government.

It has also been urged by distinguished members of the democratic party upon this floor and at the other end of the Capitol that the sections of the statutes now sought to be repealed are in conflict with the provisions of the Constitution of the United States.

Now, sir, I shall not tax the patience of the House at this time by going into a discussion of that question, first, because I believe that the provisions of the Constitution under which we claim Congress has the power to provide for a fair ballot and honest count at the Federal elections, which declares that "the United States shall guarantee to every State a republican form of government;" which provides that "the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators;" which says that "each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members;" and finally decrees that "no State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; * * * nor deny to any person * * * the equal protection of the laws," are so sweeping, so explicit, and so plain, that no intelligent, honest man can be misled by them, and no unbiased mind can entertain a doubt; and, second, because, if the opinion had been seriously entertained by anybody that Congress had no constitutional power to prevent by law fraudulent voting, ballot-box stuffing, and false counting at the Federal elections, there have been ample time and opportunities since 1871 to test the question in the courts, but it has not been done.

If the Government has power to preserve its own life; if it has the authority to put its foot upon the neck of treason, put down revolution, and crush red-handed rebellion; if it has the constitutional strength to guard and protect the citadel of American liberty and the very ark of our political covenant, then surely it must have the power to protect the voter from democratic intimidation and violence and guard the ballot-box from democratic fraud and corruption.

Sir, this howl of "unconstitutional" is the old democratic cry whenever Satan's stronghold is attacked and an effort is made to sustain honest government and to expose and punish corruption. It is the old "rebel yell" which revives the lost cause and marshals under the banner of democracy the serried legions of the defunct confederacy. It is State rights and secession revived and an attempt by the South to capture the Government and to gain by fraud and corruption what they failed to achieve in the field. In the courage and firmness of the Executive and the republicans in Congress are the hope and safety of the country.

Sir, upon this issue as made up I am in no doubt as to the position I should take. I am in favor of honest elections and a pure administration of the Government, and therefore opposed to the repeal of the laws which alone render them possible. I am not to be frightened from my position by threats nor prevented by intimidation from doing my duty. I was opposed to the bill creating the electoral commission, because I then believed, as I do now, that it was a surrender, under a threat, of our constitutional rights to the men who had tried by force of arms to destroy the Republic and had failed. I am opposed to the payment of southern war claims, to the restoration of rebels to the pension-roll, to the granting of southern subsidies, and to every measure and project which can give the South an undue advantage over the North or lift any man or party above and beyond the reach of the Constitution and laws.

I believe that treason is wicked and rebellion a crime, and that the welfare of the people and the honor and perpetuity of the Republic alike demand that a broad distinction should ever be maintained between the loyal citizen who risks his life for the Government and the traitor who tries to destroy it.

Conscientiously believing as I do that my position is right, I consider it my duty to maintain and defend it, not for an hour or a day only, but as long as God in his mercy permits me to live.

In my judgment the issue presented to us by this attempt to repeal all the laws which enable the republican party to guard and protect the right of suffrage is vital and admits of no compromise or backing down on our side.

By an attempt to usurp the whole powers of legislation the democratic majority of this House has forced upon the country an extra session of Congress, and for all the evils to the trade and commerce of the country, to the Government, to our finances, to our bonds and securities, which follow, the people will hold the democratic party responsible.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, permit me to say that I have no fears as to the ultimate issue of the question now before us, or as to the future destiny of our country. The men who saved this nation will protect and preserve it, and those who suffered it not to be overwhelmed by organized treason and armed rebellion in 1861 will not permit it to be destroyed now by the revolutionary acts of the men whose flag went down at Vicksburgh and Appomattox before the conquering legions of the North.

You threaten to stop the wheels of the Government by withholding supplies, but you will not do it, you dare not do it, and in the end you will surrender and ignominiously retreat from the position you have so unwisely and rashly taken. If in your folly and madness you refuse, depend upon it not a single democrat will be returned to the Forty-seventh Congress from north of Mason and Dixon's line.

The people of the North have allowed you, after having forfeited citizenship and even life itself, to come back to the halls of legislation and to the council-board of the nation, but they will not suffer you to destroy the Government or endanger its existence. You are here and you will be treated with moderation and fairness, and while you conduct yourselves as good citizens you will enjoy all the rights and privileges guaranteed to you under the Constitution and laws, but you will never be permitted to lord it over the people of the North or to dictate and shape the policy of this Government. The men who pay the taxes and do the voting, who stood by the flag amid the dark storms of the rebellion, will continue to hold the rudder, stand at the helm, and direct the course of the ship.

Sir, I believe if Congress passes these bills in their present form that the President will veto them, as he is in duty bound to do, and that when they come back here for further consideration gentlemen on the other side will take a second sober thought and conclude either to strike out the objectionable features and pass the bills or by a special act extend the present appropriations until next winter, allow the Government to go on, and give us a chance to come here and fight it out at the next session.

I do not believe the people of this country will permit the repeal of these election laws at any time or in any form, or that they will ever consent that the Federal Government shall be stripped of all authority and control over our national elections, and that the whole matter shall be turned over to the incompetent and dangerous power of State authority; and I believe, sir, if the majority in Congress will go home and commune with their constituents before they take the fatal leap they will come back here in December deeply imbued with that idea; and if they do not, depend upon it, that supreme power which stands in awful majesty behind this House will send men to the Forty-seventh Congress who will heed its admonitions and obey its commands.

No, Mr. Chairman, these wise and salutary laws will not be repealed, the voter will be protected, the right of suffrage preserved, the ballot-box guarded by all the power and authority of the General Government, and the republican party, which has paved the nation's pathway to a glorious future "with the shackles struck from four millions of bondmen," which has emancipated and enfranchised a race and cemented forever the bonds of our Federal Union with the blood of a million brave men, will, under God, continue to hold the power and guide this magnificent Republic onward and upward in her career of greatness and grandeur.

Mr. O'NEILL. I thank the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DUNNELL] for his courtesy in yielding me a portion of his hour.

Mr. Chairman, having had an opportunity during my congressional service of voting for most of these sections now before the committee for consideration, I propose to adhere to my votes, because I believe great good has been wrought by such legislation. I will vote against the repeal of the sections which have been proposed as amendments to this bill just as I felt it my duty to vote against the repeal of the sections which were added as amendments to the Army appropriation bill. I know that in the locality where I live the enactment of these laws—and I refer both to deputy marshals and supervisors of elections—has been of very great benefit. I desire to say to the committee, and I say it without fear of contradiction, that in the last eight years violence at elections has almost entirely disappeared in Philadelphia. Ten or eleven years ago, for several years, election day in our city was certain to be a day of riotous proceedings, brought about by the violence of the democratic party. Since 1871 we have had a republican mayor and a republican police force; supervisors of election and deputy marshals when necessary.

The fair city of Philadelphia, the fairest in the country, the republican city par excellence of the country, has been maligned, abused, and insulted upon this floor, and no republican member from that city has been permitted the chance of making an answer to the fearful and unjust and baseless charges which have been made against her. To be sure I have taken occasion several times during the debate upon this bill and the Army appropriation bill, when Philadelphia elections have been assailed, to interrupt the assailant upon the spot and to defend the conduct of her republican election officers, her republican police force, and those who under the laws of the United States have been appointed by republican officials to see that the election laws were not violated by unscrupulous and unqualified voters. Now I have the floor I intend to state hard facts, and I only regret that I must condense and hurry through.

I allege here that no fairer elections have been held in this country than those which have been held in the republican city of Philadelphia while that city has been under republican control. No man has been deliberately deprived of his vote there by any republican election officer who was legally entitled to vote, excepting perhaps under a misapprehension of the law, while all the trouble in the six hundred and eighty-six election divisions has been brought about by the violence of those adhering to the democratic party. A deliberate breach of the election laws never has gone unpunished during the republican administration of the district attorney's office of Philadelphia, for the prevalence of republican principles in our city has never cherished or sustained wrong-doing at the polls.

In the divisions of that city which are republican no democrat has ever been deprived of his vote who was legally entitled to it, while in the divisions under the control of the democratic party hundreds of republicans have been driven from the polls and denied their right to vote. In the early days of voting of our colored population no election day passed in wards and divisions where they were entitled to vote and were largely in the majority and where democracy prevailed that they were not driven in terror from the voting places by hordes of democratic partisans. Assaults have been made upon my own colored constituents. Yes! this race of patient people in some parts of Philadelphia had to struggle for their rights at the polls, and to deposit their votes wounds and death had to be suffered.

The democratic party never willingly accepted the provisions of the amended Constitution and the laws which gave the colored man the right to vote, and even in the loyal republican city of Philadelphia the adherents of democracy, when its municipality was temporarily under its control, gloried in its success, in some localities accomplished by notoriously depriving freemen of their votes whose only fault in their eyes was their color. This patient colored race certainly has a future, and in spite of the depressing influences of democratic organization when accidentally in power they will exercise their rights and have the full enjoyment of citizenship. The powers conferred by the sections now under discussion and those which have been repealed, as far as the House is concerned when it voted upon the Army appropriation bill, protected, when it was necessary to use these powers, the rights of these citizens at the polls. Because of this protection the democratic party seeks their repeal.

Mr. Chairman, unfair and unwarranted assaults have been made in this committee upon some of my own constituents by members who have spoken. The testimony taken by the Wallace committee in Philadelphia has been partly read to the committee by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FINLEY] and by my colleague, [Mr. BELTZHOOVER.] The cross-examinations of those witnesses, however, have not been read by them. I would read them to the committee, but I have not sufficient time to do so. Those who will examine the testimony given by these witnesses, on cross-examination, will find that it almost invariably terminates with the statement that no democrat was deprived of his vote who was entitled to it, and this in election divisions which gave very large republican majorities.

Now, although several of these seven hundred and seventy-three men who have been appointed as deputy marshals may have had at distant periods of their lives reputations not entirely clear, yet almost all of them have been good and worthy citizens of Philadelphia, and to-day they stand better in the community than do the prejudiced democratic witnesses who were summoned before the Wallace committee to assail them for the purpose of mere party malignity. Not one of them who has been charged with a crime or misdemeanor has had the opportunity to defend himself, and from all appearances the chairman of that committee will never call it to meet again in Philadelphia, because the testimony of republican men will contradict with truth the false assertions under oath made by partisan witnesses, and for partisan purposes. Prosecutions for perjury have been commenced against some of these witnesses.

I wish more particularly to call the attention of the committee to my own district, and to one or two of my constituents who have been assailed. Dr. Oliphant, residing in the Twentieth ward, composing a part of my district, is a quiet citizen, a gentleman of business habits; and because of his intelligence and high reputation as a man he was persuaded to become a deputy marshal. Yet a democratic witness has had the hardihood before the Wallace committee to stand up and charge Dr. Oliphant with being a man given to drink, with having abused and interfered with voters, and in many ways has attempted to destroy his character. None of this is true. He was terribly beaten and black-jacked by democrats.

So with another man in the Eighth ward of my district, Mr. William Augustus, a very respectable, worthy, quiet, inoffensive, and good man. He has been charged with attempting to deprive men of their votes. This is a base fabrication. When the Wallace committee again goes to Philadelphia, if they have the manhood to go there and finish the work they have commenced, they will have before them witnesses who will testify to the respectability of these men to whom I have referred, and of others who have been named by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FINLEY] and my colleague, [Mr. BELTZHOOVER,] and outrageously abused by them through their quoting the falsehoods of democratic witnesses.

Our republican people have been demanding the return of that committee, yet the committee does not go because the majority of its members know that when they are brought face to face with republicans, with honest men, with men who believe in the purity of elections, the statements made by witnesses interested in depreciating that great republican city will be found to be entirely baseless. In defense of these men who have not been allowed to testify I will incorporate in my remarks the paper I hold in my hand, which contains affidavits setting forth the truth, and disproving the false statements of democratic accusers:

The other side—Marshal Kerns defends his deputy marshals—Affidavits for the Wallace committee—False testimony taken at the Girard House refuted.

When the Wallace investigating committee, after a two days' session at the Girard House, adjourned without giving the deputy marshals, whose personal and official characters were assailed, any opportunity of being heard in rebuttal, it was supposed that the committee would soon return to Philadelphia and resume its work. From present indications, however, it would seem that the committee did not intend to pursue the investigation any further, and the citizens of Philadelphia whose characters were so wantonly assailed by irresponsible and untruthful witnesses are obliged to seek another method of defending themselves. Marshal Kerns has addressed the following letter to the chairman of the committee with the accompanying affidavits:

"UNITED STATES MARSHAL'S OFFICE,
"Eastern District of Pennsylvania.
"Philadelphia, April 22, 1879.

"Hon. William A. Wallace, United States Senator
"of Pennsylvania, Washington, D. C.:

"SIR: I have the honor to inform you that I have received the printed testimony taken before the investigation committee of the United States Senate of which you are the chairman. I have given the testimony careful consideration and examination. The good name of our city and the conduct of elections here being involved, it is natural that in common with all good citizens I should feel indignant at the character of the evidence palmed off upon your committee as true. We have looked anxiously for your promised return, when the falsity of the charges made could be shown.

"Inasmuch, however, as the testimony taken—virtually ex parte—has been published and is being given to the country, I feel it my duty to state that I have sent for the deputy marshals and others therein charged with offenses, and find that the evidence given against them in nearly every instance is utterly untrue. I have already thus far affidavits not only of the deputy marshals, but of other reputable citizens, to disprove fully more than two-thirds of the charges made, and fix the stigma of fraud and wrong upon those making them.

"What I now respectfully ask is that an opportunity shall be offered to rebut the allegations and do that justice which I feel sure your committee desires in its investigations. The fact that your session is advancing must be my excuse for urging that you will at an early day return to Philadelphia and pursue these investigations.

"Meantime I desire as a matter of right to the people of Philadelphia, as well as to the officers whose good names have been assailed, that as chairman of the committee you will present this statement to the committee of the Senate at your earliest convenience. Out of the seven hundred and seventy-three deputy marshals who were appointed by me in the six hundred and eighty-six election divisions of Philadelphia, the character and conduct of but thirty-three have been attacked. Nevertheless it is due to them that the sworn affidavits in my possession which vindicate them shall be given publicity if the testimony they are ready to present cannot be heard before your honorable committee."

DEPUTY MARSHAL OLIPHANT.

"The first case heard by the committee, on page 28 of printed testimony, was in reference to the conduct of Charles Oliphant, the deputy marshal in the second division of the Twentieth ward. Mr. Oliphant was appointed upon the following application:

"PHILADELPHIA, October 25, 1878.

"DEAR SIR: We, the undersigned citizens of the second division, Twentieth ward, respectfully request you to appoint Charles Oliphant, 702 Girard avenue, deputy United States marshal, to serve at the coming election, Tuesday, November 5, 1878.

"Very respectfully, yours,

AFFIDAVIT OF CHARLES OLIPHANT.

"UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
"Eastern District of Pennsylvania:

"Charles Oliphant being duly sworn says: That at the election held on the 5th day of November, A. D. 1878, he resided at 702 Girard avenue, where he carried on the business of a druggist, in the second division of the Twentieth ward. I was appointed a United States deputy marshal upon the recommendation of a number of citizens of this division. The election went on quietly until about 2 o'clock in the afternoon, when R. C. Howell and others brought a man by the name of Henry Eisenhart there to vote, and insisted upon his voting. I knew Eisenhart; he did not live in that division; he resided at the corner of Eighth and Girard avenue. His vote was challenged by me, and the officers of election refused his vote for non-residence. About a half hour afterward a difficulty occurred, in which this man Howell assaulted John D. Severn and drove him from the polls. Mr. Severn was a resident of the division for many years, and resides at 942 North Seventh street. I then interfered with Howell, and took hold of him, and said he must not interfere with voters. He said he could whip me, and wanted to fight, and offered to bet money he could whip me. I told him that after the election was over I would accommodate him. Howell kept up a disturbance at the polls during the afternoon and until the polls closed.

"About six o'clock a man came there to vote, who was challenged on his tax receipt. He could not produce the tax receipt, and his vote was not received. William B. Hackenburg, a resident of the division, came there and blockaded up the window, and said that if this man could not vote no other person should be allowed to vote. I put my hand on him and told him he must leave the window. He wanted to know who I was. I told him I was the deputy marshal, and he should not interfere with the voters. He said I could not take him away or nobody else. I took him from the window, and told him if he interfered again I would arrest him. After the polls closed I went to the station-house to hear the returns of the election. As I was returning home, in the neighborhood of Eighth and Poplar streets, twelve or fifteen men met me and made an assault upon me, knocking me down with a club in the middle of the street, where they kicked me and beat me in a fearful manner. I was confined to my house for near three weeks from the injuries that I had received. These same men I had seen the same day with Howell in a cigar store before the polls closed, and I believe it to have been a job set up by Howell for that purpose. These witnesses that appeared before the Wallace committee swore that I was intoxicated. I had not taken a drink until the middle of the afternoon; was not intoxicated at any time during the election, which I can prove by a number of witnesses residing in that division.

"Personally appeared before me, the subscriber, one of the magistrates of the city of Philadelphia, John D. Severn and Arthur Nusbaum, who, being duly sworn according to law, depose and say: 'We are residents of the second division, Twentieth ward, Philadelphia, and legal voters in said division for ten years past, and at the election held November 5, 1878, were at said division house, and in said division all day; and further swear that Dr. Charles Oliphant, United States deputy marshal, was sober, and did not interfere with the voters in said division; that R. C. Howell swore to what was false and untrue when he swore to the contrary on March 27, 1879.

DEPUTY MARSHAL ROBERTS.

"On page 110 of the report, Isaac N. Roberts, the deputy marshal of the sixteenth division of the Third ward, is charged with the arrest of John Johnson, who was held for his appearance for trial before the United States court at Philadelphia. At the meeting of the investigating committee, held at the Girard House, at Philadelphia, John Johnson appeared and testified to the facts of his arrest. When upon cross-examination by Senators Cameron and Hoar he admitted, in the presence of the committee, that the tax receipt upon which he attempted to vote was declared to be a forgery by the clerk of the tax office, (at the hearing before the United States commissioner.) The tax clerk swore that it was not his signature; that it was forged and fraudulent.

"The affidavit of Isaac N. Roberts, deputy marshal sixteenth division, Third ward, is as follows:

"UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
"Eastern District of Pennsylvania:

"Isaac N. Roberts, being sworn according to law, says that he resides at 1220 Catharine street, in the sixteenth division of the Third ward; that he was appointed deputy marshal and acted in that capacity at the election in November, 1878. I arrested John Johnson for voting upon a fraudulent tax receipt. I challenged his vote, but the officers paid no attention to any challenges that were made. Johnson was taken by me to the United States marshal's office, and had a hearing before a United States commissioner. He was held to bail to appear at court. I had his tax receipt at the hearing. The clerk at the tax office was sent for; it was Cauffman James. He pronounced the signature upon the receipt of his name a forgery. I also arrested a man by the name of Lowry. I challenged his vote also. My challenge was disregarded. I saw the tax receipt in Lowry's hands. They were urging him to vote. He hesitated a good while, coming back and forward to the polls several times. At last he voted; and then I arrested him and took him before United States commissioner. He was held for court to be tried. The clerk at the tax office, Mr. John Stimmel, was sent for, and he declared the signature on the tax receipt to be a forgery of his name. I made complaint to the United States district attorney at his office after the election about the conduct of the election officers. Warrants were issued for their arrest, and they were bound over to appear at court and are now awaiting trial for receiving illegal votes. According to the best of my belief, they received twenty or twenty-five fraudulent votes at this election.

THE CASE AGAINST THE ELECTION OFFICERS.

"The examination of witnesses by Aubrey H. Smith, United States commissioner, in the matter of John Dougherty and Robert Hance, charged with receiving illegal votes.

"Isaac N. Roberts, sworn and examined:

"I live at No. 1220 Catharine street; was a United States deputy marshal for the sixteenth division of the Third ward on election day. I was on duty at the polls. I know the defendants in this case. Dougherty was the judge and Hance the inspector. I warned Dougherty and Hance repeatedly not to receive illegal votes, and they said they did not care for me. I went away and returned, and again warned the defendants. There was a man named John Johnson voted at the polls on that day. I was standing by the window-book man when Johnson came up to vote. I challenged the vote, and Lewis Boyd, the window-book man, also challenged it. I said to the people inside, I challenge this man Johnson's vote. The defendants took the tax receipt from Johnson and put his vote in the box, and I then locked Johnson up. They did not swear Johnson. I locked up Joseph L. Lowry for illegal voting before Johnson came up. When Lowry came up I challenged him on his tax receipt, and had my face opposite the hole in the window, so that those inside might hear. The defendants received Lowry's vote. They did not swear Lowry at all. They did not examine him as to whether he had paid any taxes or not. Another man, whose name I don't know, but whose name witnesses in the room know, came to the polls to vote. He was challenged on his tax receipt, and went inside and took the oath, but refused to answer the questions put to him, and went out laughing. The defendants put his vote in the box; he was challenged by the window-book man. I don't know who swore him.

"Cross-examination by Mr. Cochran:

"I follow the newspaper business now. Between eight and nine a. m. I warned defendants. The judge did not tell me that if I would produce from the United States marshal a certificate that these white tax receipts were illegal, or if any of us would say on oath that these were illegal, that they, the officers, would refuse to take these votes. I arrested two people on election day. Johnson voted between five and six p. m. I saw Johnson's tax receipt; it was a white tax receipt, signed with Cauffman James's name. Lowry was arrested after dinner. The officers inside took these receipts and looked at them.

"ISAAC N. ROBERTS."

TESTIMONY OF MR. BOYD.

"Lewis Boyd, being sworn, says: I live at No. 1320 Kater street; I am a plasterer; I held the window-book outside on election day; I was at the polls when Johnson came to vote; he came about dark; the defendants were inside when Johnson came to vote; I challenged Johnson on tax receipt; some one from the inside asked Johnson to produce his tax receipt; he produced a white tax receipt similar to the one now shown me, and handed it inside; it was handed to Johnson again, and he put it in his pocket; Roberts then arrested Johnson; I was at the polls when Lowry came first in the morning; he was challenged on his tax receipt, and saying he had none went away; I did not see him at the polls again.

"Cross-examination by Mr. Cochran;

"I have lived in this division twelve years; I know that Johnson is a bona fide resident of this division; the tax receipt was detained about one minute inside, and was then handed to him again.

"LEWIS BOYD."

AFFIDAVIT OF COLLECTOR STIMMEL.

"John Stimmel, being sworn, says: I was collector of taxes in January, 1877, at the office of the receiver of taxes. [Two tax receipts here shown witness.] The signature on either of these is not mine; the signatures are forgeries of my name and are good imitations; I always fill up the receipts myself, and never authorize others to sign my name; the receipts are in two different hands, and the number 1877 on these receipts should be 1876.

"Cross-examined by Mr. Cochran:

"I do not know that previous to the ordinance requiring stubs to be kept that most receipts were issued loosely.

HUTCHINSON'S CASE.

"STATE OF PENNSYLVANIA,
"County of Philadelphia, ss:

"Arthur B. Vance, jr., being duly sworn according to law, doth depose and say: During the recent examination in this city by a committee appointed by the National Congress, of which Senator WALLACE was chairman, and to inquire into the action of the United States marshals at the late elections in this county, one Frank M. Hutchinson, under oath stated that your deponent was the United States marshal at the eighth division of Fifth ward of said city, and that as such marshal your deponent arrested the said Hutchinson and brought him to the United States marshal's office. Hutchinson further states that your deponent threw open a door and called into the room that he would arrest said Hutchinson if he voted. Now, the facts of the case are simply these: Your deponent was not at the time, neither has he ever been, a United States marshal, neither did he arrest the said Frank M. Hutchinson, nor did he open any door or doors and call into the room where any election was being held, 'if that man votes I will arrest him;' so that as to all the foregoing statements made by Frank M. Hutchinson under oath I pronounce unqualifiedly untrue in every particular.

"At the election held for members of the national House of Representatives in November, 1878, I held, by appointment of the court of common pleas of Philadelphia County, the office of overseer of election, having no power whatever to make arrests, but having full power, not only by virtue of my office, but in my general rights as a citizen, to see that no outrage occurred in the conduct of said election without formally entering my protest. On the day of election in question I went into the room in which the said election was being held, and I there found the above-named Frank M. Hutchinson. I inquired of an election officer the trouble, and was informed that this man had been challenged. I asked him where he lived. His answer was, in the Record building, southwest corner of Third and Chestnut streets. Having resided in the division aforesaid for a period of ten years, and knowing The Public Record building to be devoted exclusively to business purposes, printing offices, &c., and remembering but one person ever to have voted from that place, I inclined strongly to the belief that all was not right with the man Hutchinson; your deponent then desired to see Hutchinson's tax receipt, and noticed that it was an 1878 tax receipt with the figure 8 erased; the whole general appearance of the receipt was suspicious in the extreme; I then looked over the record of persons who had paid their taxes for the last two years, but the name of F. M. Hutchinson was not upon the list; I then examined carefully the receipt again, and to my great surprise I discovered that it alleged to be a tax receipt for taxes paid in the Twentieth ward of this city, and not for the ward in which he was attempting to vote; I did not see that it was possible for this man to have procured a tax receipt of 1878 in time to have moved from his ward and to have resided in another long enough prior to an election to have entitled him to vote; under all the circumstances of the case I felt then that he was not entitled to a vote at that place, and I am confirmed in my opinion to-day; I told him that if he attempted to vote I should call on the proper parties to arrest him; this he did; I then went outside of the room, and as overseer of that election properly qualified, and with my certificate to that effect, asked the United States marshal to arrest him, which was done, a course I should feel bound to pursue under similar circumstances, and with a man who could give no more satisfactory account of his tax receipt than did Frank M. Hutchinson on this occasion; the statement that I was United States marshal, or that I arrested him, is deliberate and willful perjury.

marshal. I have also read the testimony of Patrick Martin, who swore falsely when he said I was a deputy marshal; as overseer of that election I ordered Police Officer Andrew Myers to arrest John Carroll on the charge of illegal voting, both as to his residence and tax receipt; I was personally acquainted with John Carroll, and he only moved into the division three weeks and four days before the election, and the law requires sixty days; I know that he attempted to vote in another ward on the same day; when I challenged his vote I saw a piece of paper in his hand that he called a tax receipt; it was all in small pieces, and when he was arrested he threw it away; it was all in pieces, and could not be recognized as a tax receipt; he was afterwards brought before the United States commissioner, but as we did not have the tax receipt to produce at the hearing as evidence he was discharged; I have since made inquiries and have satisfied myself that he was not entitled to a vote and that he swore falsely before the Wallace committee when he said he was entitled to a vote.

Cook was the inspector of the election in the twenty-second division, Thirtieth ward, on the day of election in November, 1878; that a dispute arose in said division in reference to who was the qualified person to act as judge of the election. At the previous election Mr. George A. Ackerman received the highest number of votes on the republican ticket, and was duly elected and qualified to act as the judge; one Michael Feeney came to the polls and claimed that he was the judge, and that he had been appointed to fill a vacancy by the Hon. Judge Elcock. He was told there was no vacancy, and if there was to be any vacancy that the appointment should be a republican, as this was a republican division and had been so for years. The democratic supervisor, Mr. McLaughlin, directed the democratic inspector not to allow the polls to be opened. Mr. Ackerman refused to vacate the chair as judge; there was so much confusion that the republican supervisor called in the deputy marshal, and ordered Mr. Feeney to leave the room, which he refused to do; the election officers ordered his arrest; the two United States supervisors then, by mutual consent, accompanied us to the marshal's office; the election then proceeded with Mr. Ackerman as judge, until Mr. Feeney returned, and again the difficulty was renewed; the democratic supervisor then ordered the marshal to arrest Mr. Ackerman, which was done by officer Jackson; we then went to the United States marshal's office, where the case was heard by the marshal and our difficulties explained by the democratic and republican judges, claiming that each was in the right; Marshal Kerns then stated to us that we should go before a judge of the State court and have the question settled, which we did, and the judge ordered Mr. Feeney to serve as the election judge. That was the only difficulty that occurred at the polls that day; the election went on as usual and the voters in that division exercised their rights as voters; we do not know of any democrat that was deprived of his vote, nor do we know of any republican who voted there illegally that day; that cannot be disputed by any person living in that division.

"Andrew Lenoir, being duly sworn according to law, doth depose and say that he was the United States deputy marshal appointed for the fourth division, First ward, and acted as such on the day of election, November, 1878; that at the meeting of the Wallace investigating committee, which met at the Girard House, one

Charles F. Miller, said to be a murder detective in the employ of the district attorney, did upon oath, when the list of deputy marshals was handed to him, pick by name from the same, and when asked if he knew Andrew Lenoir, of the fourth division, First ward, said that he did; that I was charged with larceny and was a fugitive from justice.

"Now I, the said Andrew Lenoir of the fourth division, First ward, having received information of what Charles F. Miller swore to, immediately went to the Girard House while the committee was still in session, and met the said Charles F. Miller; I asked him what he meant by swearing before this committee that I was a thief and a fugitive from justice; then he apologized to me, and said he was mistaken; I demanded that he should come at once before the committee and take back what he had said. He went before the committee and asked to be re-examined. He stated to the committee I was not the person, and that he was mistaken. On the following day this testimony appeared in the Times, Public Ledger, and Record. As I am a man of family, and a story of that kind receiving such publicity, my character was greatly injured. I was fearful that my employers would discharge me from my employment. I then went to the court-house to see Charles F. Miller, and asked him to make a statement in the public press, in the same papers that he had published the libel on my character. He refused to do this, saying that he did not put it in the papers, and that I could go to the papers myself and do it.

"The election in the fourth division, Fourth ward, was quiet, and no disturbance of any character occurred in that division on the day of election.

A WITNESS WHO WAS NOT CALLED.

"Personally appeared before me, Daniel Reading, who, being sworn, says that he resides at No. 2121 Starr street, in the city of Philadelphia; that one Charles F. Miller, appeared before the Wallace investigating committee at the Girard House in the said city and testified that I was tried for murder, and that everybody knew me to be a bad and dangerous man; that I was so often before the court for trial, and that I always escaped from conviction; he said he believed that I was an honest man; he had never heard my character questioned in that particular; that was admitted on cross-examination by Senator CAMERON.

"Now I do further say that about ten years ago there was a political fight at the corner of Sixth and Tasker streets, in the First ward of the city of Philadelphia. It occurred after the polls closed. In the fight pistols were discharged and a man named William Martin was shot and died afterward, about a month afterward. I was not there at the time of the occurrence and knew nothing about the fight for more than an hour afterward. About a year after this occurred an affidavit was sworn against me and I was charged with the offense. I was tried before a jury of my countrymen and acquitted of the charge, the jury immediately rendering a verdict of "not guilty," as I was not near the place at the time the shooting occurred. I do further say that the testimony of this man Miller is false and malicious when he states that I have been tried for other offenses; I never was tried for any offense before this occurrence and never have been before any court since that occurrence, when I was fully exonerated of the charge. I wish further to state that I was subpœnaed to appear before the Wallace investigating committee at the Girard House and appeared at the committee-room and sent a request to the chairman that I desired to be heard before the committee in answer to the charges sworn to by this man Miller, but my request was refused, my name was not called. I was anxious to obey the subpœna, but was refused the privilege of denying the false statements of Miller. One of the clerks that was with the committee came to me and handed me $3 and said that was my witness fee and I should go home as I could not be heard. I waited there until the committee adjourned, but I was not called to testify.

"On page 81 of the printed pamphlet, Patrick F. Sherry being sworn and examined, says: That he knew James Brown, a deputy in the fourteenth division, Fourth ward, and that he had been convicted in the year 1872 for personating and voting in the name of another person. He said that he had known James Brown for twenty or twenty-five years.

"On cross-examination by Mr. CAMERON, the witness stated that Brown was a pretty good sort of fellow; he was a republican; sometimes he would give us a lift on the other side; he was always considered to be a right good fellow; his occupation is a provision dealer at the present time; he did not know anything wrong about him; he is regarded by his neighbors and acquaintances as comparatively at least a respectable, decent man; he was at the election place that day; I had no occasion to find fault with Brown, or of the manner he discharged his duties as marshal at the November elections; he did not interfere; there was no occasion to interfere particularly; the election was quiet and peaceful."

"George W. Kerns, esq., United States marshal, and as such deputy he was at the election poll all of the above-named day, and that he faithfully performed his duty; that one John H. Ford, a member of the bar, appeared before the 'Wallace committee,' and by solemn oath swore that the deputy marshal's name at said poll was Fleming; that there is no such name on the registry list of voters, and no such voter in the division, nor was there such a voter in the division during said November election; that all the facts testified to by said John H. Ford before said 'Wallace committee' were untrue; that there was no intimidation of voters whatever at said election poll on said day; that there was but one trouble during the whole of said day, when a voter was challenged for attempting to vote illegally upon a forged tax receipt; that the judge of said division refused to accept said vote, when at the instance of said Ford he was arrested and taken before the court of quarter sessions of this county; that said court, composed of Hon. Thomas R. Elcock (democrat) and Hon. D. Newlin Fell, (republican,) decided that said judge had acted properly in refusing the said vote, and returned him to his election poll; that after the return of said judge the said Ford appeared at the election poll again and tried to intimidate the judge and inspectors, by trying to compel them to receive said vote, notwithstanding the decision of the court to the contrary; that said Ford is not and never was a resident of said division, or voted therein; and that the only intimidation of voters practiced during the above-named day was by the said Ford himself.

That he was at the polls during the entire day, and that the election was quiet and peaceful all day. No arrests were made. That the statement published that I was at my work and did not serve as deputy marshal is false in every particular. That the marshal kept $2 from my pay is also false and malicious. I reached out of the window and took the man by the coat, so as to draw him within speaking distance to enable the election officer to qualify and interrogate him. It was with the utmost difficulty this could be done, and finding it impossible, we requested him to come inside, which he did with the aid of several men who brought him in bodily. Answering to all questions touching his right to vote, was declared a qualified voter, remarking that this was a democratic election board. The result of this election was very close, being almost equally divided; and at the ensuing February election the republicans had a clear majority of twenty-nine.

"On page 182 a list of republican divisions is published.

"A list of divisions in which there were United States marshals that had large republican majorities at the November election, 1878, was presented to your committee, and you reserved the question as to the admissibility of the list; it purported to be a copy made from the election returns filed in the prothonotary's office. It is apparent to me that the object in presenting this list was to show that deputy marshals should not have been appointed in republican divisions.

"Section 2021 of the Revised Statutes says that whenever an election at which Representatives or Delegates in Congress are to be chosen is held in any city or town of twenty thousand inhabitants and upwards, the marshal for the district in which the city or town is situated shall, on application in writing, of at least two citizens residing in such city or town, appoint special deputy marshals.

"Upon the application of more than one hundred citizens residing in this city, and in each of the wards of said city, I did appoint deputies for each election division. If I had appointed deputies in the democratic divisions only, and allowed the republican divisions to be without an officer, it would have been in violation of the law of Congress, which makes it imperative upon me to appoint when petitions are filed asking for such appointments.

"The appointments were made in democratic and republican divisions, and the same instructions were given to all the deputies. (See page 15 of the committee's proceedings.)

"Philadelphia never enjoyed a more peaceful election than that of November, 1878.

"His honor the mayor of the city of Philadelphia is justly entitled to the greatest credit for the admirable disposition made of the city's efficient police force. In those parts of the city where the criminal and dangerous classes mostly congregate and dwell, they rendered valuable assistance in the preservation of the public peace. In these localities it was difficult to obtain men who would accept the position of deputy marshal. They were assured they should be protected both by myself and with the assistance of the police force.

"In the list of deputy marshals appointed by me there appears to be several who, upon the testimony of Charles F. Miller, served in some capacity in the municipal affairs of the city. Councilmen, keepers of public squares, (which are closed during the winter months,) constables, and employés who are paid by the city for the days actually employed. I know of no law of the United States, and I have been advised that there is no such law as prevents a member of councils or a school director from serving as a deputy marshal. It is stated that there were several police officers who acted as deputy marshals. If there was they had a right to act, for they were not on duty as police officers, and received no pay from the city. Police officers receive their per diem only upon the day they are actually on duty.

"The sworn affidavits and statements of the deputy marshals and others are in my possession, and will be presented to the committee at their pleasure. The witnesses are ready to appear before your honorable committee and substantiate the truth of these allegations.

"I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

"JAMES N. KERNS,
"United States Marshal, Eastern District of Pennsylvania."

In two instances men have been charged with the commission of murders; yet it is shown beyond doubt in one case that the man had been acquitted of the charge, he never having been near the spot where the murder was committed, and in the other case the party charged was Mr. Springfield, a constituent of my colleague, [Mr. KELLEY,] formerly an officer of the police force of Philadelphia, who in pursuance of his duty fired upon a man and shot him in the effort to make an arrest—a killing which did not occur on an election day. He was tried for murder and acquitted. Such are the charges made by the testimony which has been read here by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FINLEY] and my colleague, [Mr. BELTZHOOVER.]

Why, Mr. Chairman, every member from the city of Philadelphia now in my presence knows of the riotous proceedings in Philadelphia in 1868. Every member from Philadelphia knows that at the October election in that year six men were killed by democratic violence in the streets of Philadelphia and twenty-six wounded. Is it any wonder that upon another election day General Gregory, then the United States marshal of the eastern district of Pennsylvania, now some years deceased, a gentleman and a soldier, well known to every man in our city and in the State of Pennsylvania, a gentleman who at one time had charge of a department of the Freedman's Bureau, who had a heart beating in sympathy with the colored man, dared to perform his duty at the third election division of the Fifth ward when the democratic mayor of Philadelphia stood upon the ground and refused to see the disgraceful scenes surrounding the election poll, his own policemen, all democrats, aiding the violent democratic mob in driving helpless, quiet, unoffending men from the polls, determined that the election in that division should result in giving a democratic majority.

Marshal Gregory called on the United States marines—as he had the power to do under the law—not to deprive men of their votes, not to drive men away from the polls, but to keep the peace; and he did keep the peace then and there, and most effectively. Every man who went to the polls was permitted to vote as he saw fit, and no disturbance occurred there during the remaining hours of that election day. Wherever soldiers have been at the polls there has been quietness and peace. Never, either South or North, did the United States soldier prevent a qualified voter from casting a ballot of his own choice; on the contrary his duty demanded of him that there should be a free election. One member of this House, I think from South Carolina, stated upon this floor that at his poll he had been invited by an officer of the United States Army to vote. He did not exercise that privilege because he disapproved of the presence of soldiers at elections. The United States Army certainly did not there prevent a citizen from voting but desired him to perform that duty. But to return to the third division of the Fifth ward of Philadelphia, one of the wards of the district then and now represented by the Speaker of the House. All the officers inside of the window were democrats with the exception of one or two who, under the election laws of Pennsylvania, represented the minority party. The election officers themselves closed the polls in that division, and not the marines. No marines were within forty or fifty feet of the polls at any time after the mob had been dispersed. The result was that upon the closing of the polls, in a division which should have given five or six hundred republican majority, the democratic majority was thirty or forty, I believe. The colored voters had been beaten and driven away by the democrats—affrighted and alarmed by the fearful raids upon them earlier in the day; they did not return to the polls to vote for fear of renewed and continued violence although they were protected by the United States marshal and marines as under the laws of the United States they had a right to be. This was an occasion when Marshal Gregory saw fit to call out the marines to preserve the peace. No man was injured by them; no man was prevented from voting as he wished; every man was permitted to vote in accordance with his rights under the laws. Never had United States marines, United States soldiers, or the uniformed militia of the State been required to be present at an election in a division in Philadelphia where the majority of the election officers were republicans. Republicans believe in free, untrammeled elections.

Again, who in Philadelphia can forget the fearful riot at an eastern election division of the Seventh ward, when a democratic mob charged upon the republicans and drove not only republican voters from the polls but also republican window-book men, and there murdered Policeman Young? Who can forget the wounding there of several republican citizens well known in their neighborhoods as influential political workers, who were, at the pleasure of the mob, when satiated with blood, allowed to be carried away from the middle of Lombard street? Two of the wounded men were supposed to be dead or dying. I knew these men. They were stalwart republicans, and are so now.

In October, 1871, a tremendous effort was made by the democratic party to continue in possession of the municipal government of the city of Philadelphia, especially to elect another democratic mayor.

Thus, Mr. Chairman, whenever a few years ago there was a struggle for the election of the head of the municipality of Philadelphia, we had these fearful riots and murders, which at one time, between 1868 and 1871, could not be quelled without the use of the power given by the United States laws, because in these three years we had a democratic mayor and a democratic police force that he himself dared not or could not control. The mayor was a gentleman himself, highly esteemed, then as now, for his intelligence and purity of character wherever he is known; but he had under him a police force which had been selected for him for the worst political purposes. These officers he could not restrain, for they were controlled by the local democratic politicians, at whose demand they had been appointed.

Mr. Chairman, election day, October 10, 1871, was bright and pleasant, and apparently everything was to be conducted quietly. Soon after midday, rioting commenced in the Fourth ward and extended into the Seventh ward. The colored population, very large in this section of Philadelphia, were peacefully endeavoring to cast their votes, much to the discomfiture of the democrats, and it was evident that the majority for the republicans in the Seventh ward would be very large, and the democrats, fearing they would not elect their mayor, began to abuse the voters, and especially to wreak their vengeance upon the colored people in that locality. Turmoil and confusion reigned. The unoffending colored voters were driven about the streets at the mercy of the mob, while the democratic policemen were afraid to make arrests, for the assailants were their political friends.

Three deliberate murders of colored republicans in cold blood was the result of that democratic riot, one of the victims being Professor Octavius V. Catto, a scholar, a gentleman, and a soldier who had attained the rank of major. He reminded me very much of Hon. Joseph H. Rainey who honored his State and his seat as a member of Congress from South Carolina for eight years, though Professor Catto had perhaps attained a more extended reputation as a scholar than Mr. Rainey, as my colleague [Mr. KELLEY] suggests. The other colored men who were murdered in the same neighborhood were Jacob Gordon and Isaac Chase, very respectable, hard-working, peaceable men, one of them killed in his own doorway.

One man was brought from Cincinnati and several times tried, but was not convicted; you cannot convict him. Another man is now on trial, or is about to be tried, who very likely will escape. His democratic friends will rush to his assistance as in the trials of the former.

Now, Mr. Chairman, not having time to go into these particulars as I should like to do, I will remark that I have on my desk a scrapbook, which was compiled by an intelligent man of color of the city of Philadelphia, Mr. William H. Dorsey, the messenger of the republican mayor of that city, in which are contained all of the newspaper statements of the occurrences on that fearful day in 1871. Here it is, and I ask members of the House to come and look at it, (many have already looked through it,) and to read these statements which fully verify all that I have said. At that election, October 10, 1871, a republican mayor of Philadelphia, Hon. William S. Stokley, was elected, and since that time there have been in that city no murders, no outrages at the polls. No man has been deprived of his right to vote in that city. He was elected then by a majority of eleven thousand and more republican votes against every effort of the democratic party and the democratic police force to defeat him. He was re-elected in 1874 by almost the same majority against a democratic combination with other voters, and re-elected again in 1877. And, sir, to-day, in Philadelphia no one is spoken of as a republican candidate at the next mayor's election but Mayor Stokley, such a reputation has he made for devotion to duty, for nerve, and for ability and judgment in selecting a police force. So we have in the eastern district of Pennsylvania, in United States Marshal Kerns, an official who knows his duty and dares to do it, a conscientious man who, in selecting deputies, always sought to have proper men. He fills his position greatly to his credit, and would not transcend his powers.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) I will ask the gentleman to allow me to put a question to him after he has concluded what he has to say.

Mr. O'NEILL. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has one minute left.

Mr. O'NEILL. Only one minute left! I think, Mr. Chairman, if any member upon this floor has the right to appeal to the committee for an extension of time I am that member. The city which I in part represent here has been abused upon this floor more than once, and I ought certainly to have the opportunity of defending her people. Such opportunity has been denied me save where I could inject explanatory statements into the abusive speeches of gentlemen on the other side. I should certainly have my time extended in order that a proper defense should be made of that great republican city, the bulwark of the republican party, a city of intelligent men, of enterprising merchants, a city loving pure republican principles, a majority of whose citizens upon all occasions have known how to do their duty to the Republic in war and in peace.

Mr. FINLEY. Did I understand the gentleman from Philadelphia to say that that city was the bulwark of the republican party?

Mr. O'NEILL. Yes; I did say so, and it is true, and so it will continue to be. Why, sir, the last election in Philadelphia in November, 1878, and my colleagues will testify to that fact, was quiet and peaceful; there never was a quieter election. There were supervisors of election and deputy marshals and policemen at the polls. The results of that election were acquiesced in by everybody. No democrat complained. There were no people on the streets the next day after the election complaining of the 18,000 fair republican majority given in that republican city.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) The gentleman said that he would yield to me when he had concluded. I only wished to ask him a question. I do not desire to enter into any of the individualities of the discussion in regard to my city, but I do want to ask my colleague whether he does not remember that the riots of 1877, known as the railroad riots, were kept in subjection and peace maintained in that city by a republican mayor and his police force, and that subsequently it was a source of great praise and commendation to that mayor and that police force that they were able to preserve the peace without interference on the part of the governor of the State and without asking Federal interference? Now in view of that fact I wish to know under the light of that experience what occasion there was to have brought into that city seven hundred and fifty United States marshals at an election which was conducted and gave promise of being conducted as peaceably as members sit here upon this floor?

Mr. O'NEILL. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say this, that Mayor Stokley, be it said to his praise, did quell that riot with twelve hundred republican policemen, every one of them republicans.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) And without any United States marshals?

Mr. O'NEILL. He had not the aid of United States marshals, but there were Federal troops sent to Philadelphia after he had quelled the riot. That mayor, with his phalanx of true and able policemen, broke down the force of that riot, and it was the source of great credit to him. But, sir, I want to say to my colleague that until 1871, up to the time of the election of Mayor Stokley to the place which he honors, the riots and outrages brought about by democrats in that city were a disgrace to our community.

Mr. RANDALL, (the Speaker.) The gentleman does not answer my question. Let me ask again whether, in view of past experience and the power of the mayor to put down riots, he believes there was the least necessity to bring seven hundred and fifty marshals there at the last election?

Mr. BINGHAM. If the gentleman from Minnesota will allow me to answer my colleague——

Mr. O'NEILL. Mr. Chairman, some of these marshals were appointed at the request of democrats, and all of the supervisors were appointed at the request of democrats. We wanted to have the thing fair, and it was made so.

Mr. BINGHAM. I wish to say, Mr. Chairman, that there were twelve hundred members of the veteran organization of Philadelphia who volunteered to aid Mayor Stokley in suppressing those riots.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota is entitled to the floor, and will proceed.

Mr. DUNNELL. I feared my time would be infringed upon by my courtesy, and I submit that it be extended to cover what I have lost.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

Mr. DUNNELL. Mr. Chairman, during the short time allowed me under the rules in this debate, I desire especially to ask the attention of the committee to two positions which have been assumed on the other side in this discussion, positions which are not, in my opinion, tenable, and ought perhaps to have a fuller reply than they have already received. What I shall say, therefore, at this stage of my remarks will be wholly and entirely aside from the political discussion which has sprung up upon the political amendments to the pending bill and to the Army bill which has passed this House and is now in the Senate.

I ask attention for the present to these two points or positions: First, that the President has no legislative function or power; and, secondly, the very oft repeated comparison which we have heard here made between the United States House of Representatives and the English House of Commons.

The wisdom of the fathers was displayed, Mr. Chairman, probably in a higher degree in the adjustment of the different departments of the Government than in any other manner. They labored in the formation of the Federal Constitution to adjust the different departments so that there might be no encroachment of one upon another. Concessions or special rights were granted to one department, peculiar privileges or powers were granted to another, in order that they might be so balanced that there should be harmony and not discord in their operation. The provision in the Federal Constitution that the President should have the veto power, was made a part of that instrument by a unanimous vote of the convention. In the debates which occurred when the Constitution was being made and in the debates in the different State conventions, it was conceded that the President must have this power given him that he might protect himself against the encroachments of the legislative department of the Government. Nowhere in the great debates which have sprung up under the exercise of the veto power has ever the most violent opponent of the President exercising that power asserted at any time that the President had no legislative function. In the great debate in 1834, when Daniel Webster arraigned General Jackson, he conceded at the very threshold of his arraignment that the President had the right to do what he did do in vetoing the bill which called out that great debate. At no period in our history has the position ever been assumed that the President had no legislative function. For the first time, here and now, the announcement is made by the gentleman from Ohio, from the Toledo district, [Mr. HURD.] He says:

> I deny that the President of the United States has any right to participate in the legislation of this country.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPARKS] who had charge of the Army bill when it was before the House this session said:

> I deny, therefore, that the President has any legislative power.

Now, Mr. Chairman, for a few minutes, let me call the attention of the committee to the utterances of two distinguished men belonging to an earlier period in the history of the country, representing different and extreme views, two distinct schools in politics. I refer to the utterances of John C. Calhoun and to those of Daniel Webster. In the first place, let me give the views of Mr. Webster upon this point. Before reading the words of Webster let me remark that we have heard during this debate a great deal of violent criticism upon the anticipated action of the President. It has been assumed that he would veto this bill, and also the Army bill now in the Senate. It has been said upon the other side that he would have no right to do so, because it was against the express will of the people as represented through the House and Senate.

Nothing is of more importance in a government, as was well argued by the distinguished gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. ROBESON,] than that the balanced and adjusted powers in it be preserved as fixed, because if they be disturbed there can be no foreseeing the results of such disturbance. Ours is a nicely adjusted and a limited Government. Daniel Webster said:

> The necessity of holding strictly to the principle upon which free governments are constructed and to those precise lines which fix the partitions of power between different branches is as plain if not as cogent as that of resisting, as our fathers did, the strides of the parent country against the rights of the colonies, because, whether the power which exceeds its just limits be foreign or domestic, whether it be the encroachment of all branches on the rights of the people or that of one branch on the right of others, in either case the balance and well-adjused machinery of free government is disturbed, and if the derangement go on the whole system must fall.

I now wish to furnish some of the utterances of John C. Calhoun. I read from the second volume of his speeches, on the four hundred and tenth page:

> Will not the same principle of our nature which impels one department to encroach upon the other equally impel Congress to encroach upon the executive department? Those who framed the Constitution clearly foresaw this danger and have taken measures effectually to guard against it. With this view, the Constitution has raised the President from being a mere executive officer to a participation in the legislative functions of the Government; and has, among other legislative powers, clothed him with that of the veto, mainly with a view to protect his rights against the encroachments of Congress. In virtue of this important power no bill can become a law till submitted for his consideration. If he approves, it becomes a law, but if he disapprove it is returned to the House in which it originated, and cannot become one unless passed by two-thirds of both Houses. And in order to guard his power against the encroachments of Congress through all the avenues by which it can possibly be approached the Constitution expressly provides that "every order, resolution, or vote to which the concurrence of the Senate and House of Representatives may be necessary," (none other can operate beyond the limits of their respective Halls,) "except on a question of adjournment, shall be presented to the President of the United States; and before the same shall take effect, shall be approved by him, or being disapproved by him, shall be repassed by two-thirds of the Senate and House of Representatives, according to the rules and limitations prescribed in the case of a bill."

Note, sir, the strong and conclusive language of Mr. Calhoun in this extract: "The Constitution has raised the President from being a mere executive officer to a participation in the legislative functions of the Government." No language could be stronger. These modern views of the Constitution would have sounded queerly in the ears of the fathers and the earlier expounders of the Constitution. They saw an adjusted government; its different parts so arranged that each should be a check upon the other, but it has been contended here that this House has only to utter its voice; that its voice should be the law even if a Senate and President do not agree to its utterances. This false construction of the Constitution has given us two extra sessions of Congress since the people in an evil hour turned over this House to the party now in power. It calls itself democratic, but not one member has or can quote one single line to sustain the wild doctrine that the President has no legislative function. Let me read one other extract from the words of Calhoun:

> Let us now cast our eyes back, in order that we may comprehend at a single glance the admirable arrangements by which the harmony of the Government is secured without impairing the separate existence and independence of either of the departments. In order to prevent the conflicts which would have resulted necessarily if each department had been left to construe its own powers, all the implied or constructive powers are vested in Congress; that Congress should not, through its implied powers, encroach upon the executive department, the President is clothed with the veto power, and that his veto should not interfere with the rights of the two Houses to control their respective proceedings, it is limited to bills or votes that require the concurrence of the two Houses. It is thus that walls are interposed to protect the rights which belong to us as a separate constituent member of the Government from the encroachments of the executive power, and it is thus that the power which is placed in his hands, as a shield to protect him against the implied or constructive powers of Congress, is prevented from being converted into a sword to attack the rights exclusively vested in the two Houses.

Let me read now from the second volume of Mr. Calhoun's speeches, a single sentence. Referring to a resolution which had been offered by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. Clay,] he said:

> It goes further, and is conclusive against the executive department itself as elected; for there can be no good reason offered why the will of the nation, if there be one, should not be as fully and as perfectly represented in that department as in the legislative.

This is read to refute what we have heard here during this debate—the announcement that the will of the people is only to be discovered in this House—that either here or in the Senate, or in these bodies united, resides the entire expressed will of the people; and that the people have no other repository of their will, no other protection or defense.

I hold that the President of the United States is, very often, and at the present time, a better exponent of the popular will than the House of Representatives. I make the announcement that the President of the United States to-day holds his seat by a much larger aggregate vote than the majority of this House. I assert, too, that the voter as he goes to the polls and casts his ballot for a President as much votes his will and as much expects that his will will be respected as when he votes for a Representative in Congress. The vote for President is always the largest vote, it is regarded as the most important vote that an American citizen can give, because by it he makes an expression of his will for the chief political officer of the Government. It is an expression of confidence, not only in the known political views of the man for whom he casts his ballot, but also in his high personal character. We have heard it said here very often that the President is not to exercise any will of his own. I will here insert extracts from a veto message sent to Congress by President Polk, December 5, 1848, and also from a message of President Pierce vetoing the French spoliation bill, sent to Congress February 17, 1855.

In the fourth annual message of President Polk, sent to Congress December 5, 1848, I find the following:

The Constitution provides that "every bill which shall have passed the House of Representatives and the Senate shall, before it becomes a law, be presented to the President of the United States; if he approve, he shall sign it, but if not, he shall return it, with his objections, to that House in which it shall have originated, who shall enter the objections at large on their Journal, and proceed to reconsider it."

The preservation of the Constitution from infraction is the President's highest duty. He is bound to discharge that duty, at whatever hazard of incurring the displeasure of those who may differ with him in opinion. He is bound to discharge it, as well by his obligations to the people who have clothed him with his exalted trust as by his oath of office, which he may not disregard. Nor are the obligations of the President in any degree lessened by the prevalence of views different from his own in one or both Houses of Congress. It is not alone hasty and inconsiderate legislation that he is required to check; but if at any time Congress shall, after apparently full deliberation, resolve on measures which he deems subversive of the Constitution, or of the vital interests of the country, it is his solemn duty to stand in the breach and resist them. The President is bound to approve, or disapprove, every bill which passes Congress and is presented to him for his signature. The Constitution makes this his duty and he cannot escape it if he would. He has no election. In deciding upon any bill presented to him, he must exercise his own best judgment. If he cannot approve, the Constitution commands him to return the bill to the House in which it originated, with his objections.

Any attempt to coerce the President to yield his sanction to measures which he cannot approve, would be a violation of the spirit of the Constitution, palpable and flagrant; and, if successful, would break down the independence of the executive department and make the President, elected by the people and clothed by the Constitution with power to defend their rights, the mere instrument of a majority of Congress. A surrender on his part of the powers with which the Constitution has invested his office, would effect a practical alteration of that instrument, without resorting to the prescribed process of amendment.

With the motives and considerations which may induce Congress to pass any bill the President can have nothing to do. He must presume them to be as pure as his own, and look only to the practical effect of their measures when compared with the Constitution or the public good.

But it has been urged by those who object to the exercise of this undoubted constitutional power, that it assails the representative principle and the capacity of the people to govern themselves; that there is greater safety in a numerous representative body than in the single Executive created by the Constitution, and that the executive veto is a "one-man power," despotic in its character.

* * * * * * *

The people, by the Constitution, have commanded the President as much as they have commanded the legislative branch of the Government to execute their will. They have said to him in the Constitution, which they require he shall take a solemn oath to support, that if Congress pass any bill which he cannot approve "he shall return it to the House in which it originated, with his objections." In withholding from it his approval and signature he is executing the will of the people, constitutionally expressed, as much as the Congress that passed it. No bill is presumed to be in accordance with the popular will until it shall have passed through all the branches of the Government required by the Constitution to make it a law. A bill which passes the House of Representatives may be rejected by the Senate; and so a bill passed by the Senate may be rejected by the House. In each case the respective Houses exercise the veto power on the other.

* * * * * * *

The executive, legislative, and judicial, each constitutes a separate co-ordinate department of the Government, and each is independent of the others. In the performance of their respective duties under the Constitution neither can, in its legitimate action, control the others. They each act upon their several responsibilities in their respective spheres; but if the doctrines now maintained be correct, the executive must become practically subordinate to the legislative, and the judiciary must become subordinate to both the legislative and the executive; and thus the whole power of the Government would be merged in a single department. Whenever, if ever, this shall occur, our glorious system of well-regulated self-government will crumble into ruins, to be succeeded first by anarchy, and finally by monarchy or despotism.

President Pierce in his message vetoing the French spoliation bill, sent to Congress February 17, 1855, said:

It is not incumbent on the President to sign a bill as a matter of course, and thus merely to authenticate the action of Congress, for he must exercise intelligent judgment or be faithless to the trust reposed in him. If he approve a bill, he shall sign it; but if not, he shall return it, with his objection, to that House in which it shall have originated for such further action as the Constitution demands, which is its enactment, if at all, not by a bare numerical majority, as in the first instance, but by a constitutional majority of two-thirds of both Houses.

While the Constitution thus confers on the legislative bodies the complete power of legislation in all cases, it proceeds, in the spirit of justice, to provide for the protection of the responsibility of the President. It does not compel him to affix the signature of approval to any bill unless it actually have his approbation; for, while it requires him to sign if he approve, it, in my judgment, imposes upon him the duty of withholding his signature if he do not approve. In the execution of his official duty in this respect he is not to perform a mere mechanical part, but is to decide and act according to conscientious convictions of the rightfulness or the wrongfulness of the proposed law. * * * The President's responsibility is to the whole people of the United States as that of a Senator is to the people of a particular State, that of a Representative to the people of a State or district. * * * When, however, he entertains a decisive and fixed conclusion, not merely of the unconstitutionality but of the impropriety or injustice in other respects of any measure, if he declare that he approves he is false to his oath, and he deliberately disregards his constitutional obligations.

There are some clauses in the foregoing extract to which I shall refer.

President Polk said:

The people by the Constitution have commanded the President as much as they have commanded the legislative branch of the Government to execute their will.

It is clear that the President of the United States has no more right to disregard his judgment, his convictions, to go against his views of public policy, than has any man holding a seat upon this floor. President Pierce said that the President who will sign a bill which does not meet with his approval is false to himself and false to his trust. Let me read the sentence:

When, however, he entertains a decisive and fixed conclusion, not merely of the unconstitutionality, but of the impropriety or injustice in other respects of any measure, if he declare that he approves he is false to his oath and he deliberately disregards his constitutional obligations.

In our Government the President constitutes a distinct branch of the Government, and is under obligations to obey the laws and to regard his oath with precisely the same carefulness and conscientiousness as an individual member of this House. I made the statement a little while ago that President Hayes was elected by a larger aggregate vote than the present majority of this House. The aggregate vote cast for the democratic members of this House was 1,778,313. The aggregate vote cast for Hayes in 1876 was 4,033,950. Less than one-half as many voters voted for and elected the majority of the House as voted for President Hayes.

It occurred to me to examine the vote cast in 1876 in a few States of the Union and then look at the votes of those States in 1878. I take in the first instance the State of Virginia. She has upon this floor eight democratic Representatives, and yet, what was the vote in that State in 1876 and 1878? Virginia gave for President Hayes 95,558 votes, yet she is represented on this floor by eight democratic members with an aggregate vote of 53,085.

The State of Kentucky, which has ten democratic Representatives, gave for Mr. Hayes 97,156, and yet those ten Representatives have come into this House by an aggregate vote of 86,169.

Take the State of Mississippi, your own State, Mr. Chairman, [Mr. HOOKER in the chair,] which you so ably represent. The State of Mississippi gave for President Hayes 52,605 votes, yet the six democratic Representatives from that State in this House hold their seats here by an aggregate vote of but 37,128.

The State of Arkansas gave for President Hayes 38,669 votes. For the four Representatives from that State who have their seats upon this floor it gave but 31,998 votes.

Take the State of Alabama: she has here upon this floor seven democratic Representatives. In that State President Hayes had an aggregate vote of 50,618, while these six democratic Representatives had an aggregate vote of but 40,295. Florida and other States could be included in this list.

Now, take these five States, with an aggregate representation of thirty-four members, which number being taken from the majority of this House would leave it largely in the minority, and those thirty-four democratic Representatives on this floor received an aggregate vote of 298,758, while in those very congressional districts President Hayes received an aggregate vote of 352,218. Where is the popular will? Shall these thirty-four men stand up here and say that they alone represent the popular will in those States? By no means. The President also represents those States, even if those members were elected by as large a majority as he received.

I find in volume 3 of the debates of the convention which was held in Philadelphia for the adoption of the Federal Constitution a speech made by a Mr. Wilson, in which this position is fully maintained in that convention as it was in others. He said:

I will proceed now to take some notice of a still further restraint upon the Legislature—I mean the qualified negative of the President. I think this will be attended with very important advantages for the security and happiness of the people of the United States. The President, sir, will not be a stranger to our country, to our laws, to our wishes. He will, under this Constitution, be placed in office as the President of the whole Union, and will be chosen in such manner that he may be justly styled the man of the people; being elected by the different parts of the United States, he will consider himself as not particularly interested for any one of them, but will watch over the whole with paternal care and affection. This will be the natural conduct to recommend himself to those who placed him in that high chair, and I consider it as a very important advantage that such a man must have every law presented to him before it can become binding on the United States. He will have before him the fullest information of our situation; he will avail himself not only of records and official communications, foreign and domestic, but he will have also the advice of the executive officers in the different Departments of the General Government.

If in consequence of this information and advice he exercises the authority given to him, the effect will not be lost; he returns his objections, together with the bill, and unless two-thirds of both branches of the Legislature are now found to approve it it does not become a law. But even if his objections do not prevent its passing into a law, they will not be useless; they will be kept, together with the law, and, in the archives of Congress, will be valuable and practical materials to form the minds of posterity for legislation. If it is found that the law operates inconveniently or oppressively, the people may discover in the President's objections the source of that inconvenience or oppression. Further, sir, when objections shall have been made, it is provided, in order to secure the greatest degree of caution and responsibility, that the votes of both Houses shall be determined by yeas and nays, and the names of the persons voting for and against the bill shall be entered in the journal of each House respectively. Thus much I have thought proper to say with regard to the distribution of the legislative authority and the restraints under which it will be exercised.

This much I have desired to say upon this point. In the few minutes remaining of my time I desire to make some reply to the position which we have heard advocated here, that the House of Representatives has in some way the right to have its will regarded; that it has the right to attach to an appropriation bill anything which it sees fit to style a redress of grievance; that we have the privilege of redressing grievances. Now I deny that the House of Representatives has any power given to it except it exercises that power in a legitimate way, in the regular passage of laws, either repealing vicious laws or in passing remedial laws which shall bring about a redress.

There is nothing in the Constitution that justifies the theory that the House of Representatives can stand out against the President; that it has the right to aggress upon the President, to coerce the President in the slightest degree. The messages of Polk and Pierce, the utterances of Calhoun and of Webster, are against this modern theory drawn from a comparison between the English House of Commons and the American House of Representatives.

What was the English House of Commons when it made its aggressions upon the Crown and acquired the Magna Charta, the Bill of Rights, and the Petition of Rights? Was it acting under a written constitution which limited its powers? By no means. It was a body of men which had come into existence for the redress of grievances and the acquisition of rights, and it has a glorious place in English history; but it played its part independent of any written constitution. It had the right to do what it did do because there was no written constitution which restricted its acts.

When we come to the American House of Representatives we must find in the Constitution itself, and there alone, all its power. We have in our Constitution all that the English House of Commons secured for liberty; we have there our Magna Charta, our Bill of Rights, our Petition of Rights. Our Constitution is the repository of all that the House of Commons acquired for English liberty, and through the English nation acquired for us. All our fathers had to do when they adopted the Federal Constitution was to take to themselves all that the English House of Commons had acquired. It acquired everything prior to the adoption of our Federal Constitution. The English House of Commons has acquired nothing since we took their acquisitions and put them into the Federal Constitution; adopted them as our principles. Having done that we then marked out each department of the Government and made for us a Constitution, which alone can guide us.

I wish to refer to one or two remarks made by Mr. Webster on that point. He said:

> Our constitutions are not made to limit and restrain pre-existing authority. They are the instruments by which people confer power on their own servants. If I may use a legal phrase, the people are the grantors, not the grantees. They give to the Government and to each branch of it all the power it possesses or can possess; that which is not given they retain. In England before the Revolution, and in the rest of Europe since, if we would know the extent of liberty or popular right we must go to grants, to charters, to allowances, to indulgences. But with us we go to grants and to constitutions to learn the extent and powers of government. No political power is more original than the Constitution. None is possessed which is not there granted, and the grant and the limitations in the grant are in the same instrument.

Now, when we go to English history to find arguments why the American House of Representatives should aggress upon or coerce the President because an English House of Commons made its aggressions upon the Crown, we make a false argument. I will read from Mr. Webster another sentence bearing upon this point:

> The grant of power—
>
> Says Mr. Webster—
> the whole source of power, as well as the restrictions and limitations which are imposed on it, is made in and by the Constitution. It has no other origin. And it is this, sir, which distinguishes our system so very widely and materially from the systems of Europe. Our governments are limited governments; limited in their origin, in their very creation; limited, because none but specific powers were ever granted, either to any department of government or to the whole; theirs are limited, whenever limited at all, by reason of restraints imposed at different times on governments originally limited and despotic. Our American questions, therefore, must be discussed, reasoned on, decided, and settled on the appropriate principles of our own constitutions, and not by inapplicable precedents and loose analogies drawn from foreign states.

As I have already said, the House of Commons grew in power and in conceded privileges by its aggressions on the Crown in the interest of liberty. Nothing stood in its way; no constitution controlled it or arrested it. Its great demands upon the Crown were, it is true, in the interest of the people and of liberty. It secured them, and therefore the history of the English House of Commons during that period when it was, by its own contests, securing its present position in the government of England is worthy of great admiration.

Our House of Representatives is regulated by a written Constitution. While it may make rules for its own government, it cannot arrogate to itself a single power which is not specifically set out in the Constitution itself. It cannot go beyond the Constitution, and whenever it does attempt to go beyond the boundaries set for it by the Constitution, then it will enter into that revolutionary course of procedure which will endanger the very Government itself. Our Constitution is our supreme law, our only guide. It was formed for the safety of the people, for their largest liberty. American liberty is only safe when the Constitution is followed, when the checks and balances of power conferred are carefully and religiously observed. The Constitution contains all we have, and tells us precisely what we may do. It is the suprema lex reipublicæ.

Let me again read the closing sentence of an abstract already read from one of the speeches of Webster:

> Our American questions, therefore, must be discussed, reasoned on, decided, and settled on the appropriate principles of our own constitutions, and not by inapplicable precedents and loose analogies drawn from foreign states.

Now, gentlemen on the other side tell us that this House may seek a redress of grievances. I insist, sir, that the only redress of grievances that the American House of Representatives can secure must be alone secured by following the regular modes of legislation. We can secure no redress which cannot be obtained by the passage of remedial measures according to the Constitution, or by the repeal of vicious and hurtful legislation, no matter whether it was passed upon an appropriation bill or by other acts. I do not contend that it is revolutionary to place legislation upon an appropriation bill, but it will be revolutionary to attempt to force that legislation by a manifest departure from the specific modes pointed out in the language of the Constitution. Provided the House and Senate do agree in the passage of a bill, which in the judgment of the House and the Senate is in the interest of the people and of the Government itself; yet the President of the United States, under the Constitution, must agree with the House and Senate in the character of the legislation. If he cannot and shall not agree, then it is the duty of the House and Senate to agree in passing such measures as he can conscientiously approve, and in no event will the people sustain Congress in an attempt to stop the wheels of Government because the President, in the exercise of his constitutional prerogative, shall see fit to veto supply bills containing political provisions which, in his judgment, would be hurtful to the public good. The Constitution does not provide for revolutionary legislation. The wise founders of the Government guarded against revolution in the execution of the Government.

As I have already shown in my remarks, that the President is as free to exercise his will, to follow his conclusions as to the wisdom or folly of this or of that measure, bill, order, or resolution submitted to him for his approval, as the House in the aggregate, or as each individual member of the House or the Senate has a right to his opinion.

I further maintain that when Congress refuses to support the Government because the President refuses to give his approval to those supply bills, because they contain obnoxious general legislation, such action is revolutionary; and it is just here that the seeds of national death are sown, when Congress departs from its sworn duty to provide for the Army which it has itself raised. We have to-day an Army; it exists by force and operation of a statute of the United States. It is officered, and that Army is largely protecting the vast frontier portions of the Republic. It is an absolute necessity for the public weal. He is not a patriot who refuses to supply this Army, guarding the outposts of the Republic, who refuses to give the supplies simply because he desires along with these supplies to pass measures in the interest of a party. No man on this floor can deny in the presence of the American people that this legislation now sought is partisan. The dominant party in this House, and now in the Senate, has determined to leave no effort untried, no stone unturned, to prepare the way for a political triumph in the next presidential election. It is always to me an unpleasant duty in this House to make what may be called a political speech. I have done it in but one instance during the eight years I have served here, but I am prepared in this instance here and now to declare that this legislation, in my judgment, has no other inspiration than in the purpose, plan, and determination of the democratic party, by whatsoever means may be used, by whatever processes, to secure if possible a national triumph in the next approaching national election.

It is not easy to say to men that they wish a dishonest ballot, but in the face of the history of the party and in view of all the frauds that have been committed in the South and in the North, the country does not accept the declarations of the democratic party that it desires a repeal of this law that it may enhance purity at the ballot-box. The masses of the American people see through this whole pretended virtue of the party here in power. The people of this country are grandly intelligent, and to-day they comprehend the issue. I have no wish to arouse a single passion in the South or in the North; nor have I in these remarks made a single allusion to the war. With me, the war is over. I do not hold in less political regard that man in the democratic party from the South than I do from the North. The party is a solid party here; it acts as a unit. It is making its first presidential skirmish here in Congress. It commenced the contest when the Senate was republican. It gave us an extra session during the Forty-fifth Congress, and now that the Senate is democratic, the House and the Senate have given us another extra session—two extra sessions, the only political extra sessions that we have ever had since the foundation of the Government, gotten up and determined upon in caucus, in the interest of a forthcoming presidential election.

I cannot fail to believe that the candidate of this party in the last presidential election is to-day the inspiring genius of this present condition of affairs. The last presidential election exceeded and transcended in a thousand degrees, in corruption, in fraud, and in the wicked use of money any other presidential election. It has now determined to strike down the defenses which have been thrown around the ballot-box. It has been determined that no supervisor shall be present to witness, to make note, to make a report of the proceedings at a single poll in the Republic. The polls are to be given up. In the larger cities they are to be turned over to the thugs, to the ballot-box stuffers, to the bad men, to hold and control. Intimidation and the tissue ballot are a part of the machinery with which it is determined to carry the election at all hazards.

I say this not so much because it is a conviction of my own. I am speaking now what is the universally accepted conviction of the American people. Men upon the other side may talk ever so patriotically, they may talk about liberty, they may talk about a pure ballot, they may tell us and the country how much they love the Constitution, nevertheless the people will say to them, "You are seeking power, you love it more than purity, you love it more than the Constitution or liberty itself." It is power that you have determined upon. The greed with which you use it here, the rapidity with which you fill every place put within your reach, shows the terrible thirst, the insatiable greed with which you are reaching forward to take hold of all the patronage and power of this great Government. The people see it, and while they may not be aroused upon the question of the war, yet the men who stood by the Union in her time of peril will stand by it in the future as in the past, because they love the Union and the liberty which it secures. I do not myself believe that the leading men in the democratic party from the South to-day are any worse than the men in that party from the North. The South has never raised the peer of Samuel J. Tilden. In organization for corruption and fraud he stands pre-eminent and without an equal. I have not yet been made to believe that these measures which have caused this extra session were urged upon us by men from the South. The northern democrat who has thrown himself into this contest is governed by no purer motives than the southern democrat who follows in the wake of his northern leader.

We are in extra session for the second time since this House came into the control of the democratic party. The Forty-fourth Congress organized in December, 1875. Hon. Michael C. Kerr was elected Speaker of that House. He received 173 votes; his republican competitor received 106 votes. That Congress left as a legacy an extra session, made necessary by its failure to pass the Army appropriation bill. That appropriation bill failed because the democratic majority of the House placed upon it a political rider. It arrogated to itself the right to load the Army bill with a political amendment. It did this although the Senate was clearly republican, and although the President was himself elected by the republican party. That extra session convened on the 15th of October, 1877. When the Forty-fifth Congress was organized the present able Speaker of this House was then elected for the first time. He received 149 votes, while his republican competitor received 132 votes. That Congress, learning nothing from the Congress which preceded it, determined to disregard both the Senate and the President, and loaded the Army appropriation bill, and the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill with three important political amendments.

The failure of the Forty-fifth Congress to provide for the Army and the Executive Departments of the Government the necessary supplies has caused this extra session. This Congress, called together by the President's proclamation, was organized on the 18th of March last. The Speaker of the House was elected by a majority of 2. No one can wonder at the gradual decimation of the democratic majority in this House when its history here has been carefully and thoughtfully considered. It came into power after wonderful assurances made to the people. It had during the Forty-fourth Congress well-nigh a two-thirds vote. That majority has dwindled, until the regular democratic candidate for Speaker of this Congress was elected by the small majority of 2. I shall be allowed, Mr. Chairman, to say that this decrease in the democratic vote of this House has been earned, causes have done their work, the effect is the inevitable result of unmistakable causes. The country was early tired of the announcements of economy and its utter failure to secure the legislation which it promised the people when they intrusted that party with power. Let me here say that this extra session of Congress, threatening the business interests of the country, wholly uncalled for, wholly the result of political party plans, will prove to be a very poor investment to the party which has caused it. Since the adoption of the Federal Constitution there have been but eight extra sessions of Congress. Two of these have been called during the present administration. But one extra session was called during the period of the rebellion. In a period of profound peace, the majority of this House has deliberately caused two extra sessions of Congress, and these solely for political reasons.

I have not intended, Mr. Chairman, to make a speech which could in any way arouse sectional feeling, or which should at all allude to the war, but simply discuss the questions which are now before the committee. The country well understands the issue between the parties now in Congress.

We have heard much said about free elections, and yet there has been substantially no evidence presented to this House that for the last eight years, during the existence of these laws, there has not been everywhere a free election, except in the South, where the colored man has been denied his rights. This denial of rights has not been caused by these laws which are sought to be repealed. Much has been said about the presence of the Army, about the intimidation of the voter, about the peril of civil liberty, and yet no evidence has been brought before the committee that these laws which are sought to be repealed have at all interfered with the free exercise of the elective franchise.

It is also, Mr. Chairman, a significant fact that a majority of the members of the other side of this House have been elected from States where there was not a soldier during the election of 1878. President Hayes withdrew the Army from the South. The republicans of this House have declared, through the gentleman from Ohio, their willingness in a separate bill to repeal those sections of the law which authorized the use of troops to keep the peace at the polls; but the amendments that were put upon the Army appropriation bill go beyond a repeal of the laws against which so much has been said, and attempt to deprive every civil officer in every State of the Union of all power to keep the peace at the polls, or to secure aid in the exercise of his duties as a local civil officer. The far-reaching and dangerous legislation attempted by this Army bill amendment was most thoroughly brought out and exposed by gentlemen who have preceded me, and it has passed into the current history of this session that the democratic side of this House refused to strike out so much of that amendment as applied to civil officers. This fact has not escaped the attention of the country, and it has gone very far to create that indignation which is everywhere felt throughout the country. If this party, in addition to this, shall refuse to vote supplies for the Army and the Executive Departments of the Government, it may make early preparation to give up its partial power and yield to the party which can be loyal to the country, both in peace and in war.

Mr. THOMAS TURNER. Mr. Chairman, in order that the committee, the House, and the country may fully and fairly understand the grave issues which now divide us, I ask to have read and printed as an appendix to my remarks so much of the enactments as it is proposed to repeal by the Army and the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bills, and the order of the War Department dated 27th October, 1870, and Brigadier-General McDowell's special order No. 229, and Ex-Attorney-General Taft's letter of instruction to United States marshals. These military orders and this letter disclose the construction given to the legislation which it is proposed to repeal, the motives which inspired it, and the use which has been and is intended to be made of it. These documents place before the country the real issues and not the mere partisan statements of them by their advocates opponents.

It will be conceded that these enactments should be repealed if they are unconstitutional or impolitic, liable to gross abuse, dangerous to the liberties of the people, or grossly inconsistent with the genius of American institutions and the traditions of Anglo-Saxon liberty. In order to discuss intelligently the constitutionality of the enactments which purport to authorize the use of the Army to keep the peace at the polls, and which undertake to control elections and stifle the voice of the people through the instrumentality of supervisors and marshals, with power to call the military to their aid, it is well to recur to the fundamental principles of government, and to familiarize the people with them—and especially do our republican friends need to be reminded of them—to inquire into the nature and purposes of our duplex State and Federal system, the objects designed to be accomplished by and the powers confided to each of these governments, and the purposes for which they were so confided.

It is, or should be, the object of all governments to protect the persons of and secure to each of their citizens the proceeds of their own exertions. In a state of nature before governments were established no one was secure in person or property; there was no law to restrain the malevolent passions of men except the law of God, the hope of future rewards, and the fear of future punishments. Experience soon demonstrated that these were insufficient, that the replevy was too long and suggested the establishment of some tribunal with power to prescribe the rule of right, to determine who infracted it, to enforce its judgments, and to protect the persons of its citizens and adjudge to each one the possession and enjoyment of that which he or she had acquired by his or her labor. Civilization is based upon labor and an exchange of its products. Men will not labor unless with the hope of enjoying the proceeds thereof, and cannot unless their persons are protected while so doing. Individuals, then, from motives of necessity and mutual interest established the creatures called governments, and they derive all their powers from the individuals who establish them. And the people delegated to the State governments all powers not inconsistent with the objects and purposes for which they were formed, not inconsistent with the liberty of the individual and the rights of minorities. The governments thus instituted had to be administered through agents and officials to make laws, construe them, decide who had infracted them, to redress wrongs, to enforce rights.

These agents or officials to whom the administration of public affairs was to be confided had to be in some way selected and agreed upon. It could not be hoped or expected that all would concur in selecting the same agents, and the right of selection was properly located in the majority of those who formed the government or became citizens thereof by birth or adoption. This is self-government. No government is one of self-government in which majorities do not rule, subject to restrictions for the protection of individuals and minorities. In the progress of time the people drifted away from these great principles and submitted to the so-called divine right of kings to govern wrong. Our ancestors of the Anglo-Saxon race were the first to make a manly effort to restore government to its primal objects and purposes and to regain self-government. Step by step and inch by inch they fought the assumed power of the kings and nobles until they established habeas corpus—the great writ of personal liberty. Until they established that even the King of Great Britain could not, without permission, darken with his shadow the door of the humblest peasant unless armed with a warrant of law. In due time came trial by jury, the establishment of the supremacy of the civil over the military authorities, and the acknowledged right of the House of Commons, elected directly by the people, to control the purse and the appropriations, or, in other words, the right of the people, through their representatives, to control the application of money collected from them as taxes for the maintenance of the government. The right to control appropriations, to vote or not to vote them, implies the right to direct the purposes to which they shall be applied and to vote them on such conditions as the appropriating power shall choose to append.

As far back as 1407 King Henry IV, in an ordinance called "the indemnity of the Lords and Commons," admitted this right upon the part of the House of Commons, and it has never been questioned since. (See May's Law and Usage of Parliament, fifth edition, page 532.) On the 13th April, 1671, the House of Commons resolved unanimously "that in all aids given to the King by the Commons the rate or tax ought not to be altered by the Lords." On the 3d July, 1678, the House of Commons of the British Parliament passed this resolution:

That all aids and supplies, and aids to His Majesty in Parliament are the sole gift of the Commons; and all bills for the granting of any such aids and supplies ought to begin with the Commons; and that it is the undoubted and sole right of the Commons to direct, limit, and appoint in such bills the ends, purposes, considerations, conditions, limitations, and qualifications of such grants, which ought not to be changed or altered by the House of Lords. (See pages 120, 122, 123, third volume Hatsell's Precedents of Proceedings in the House of Commons.)

Bringing with them these great rights and liberties, our ancestry emigrated from Great Britain and established thirteen separate colonies or States, holding separate charters from the political authority of the mother country; and when George III threatened their liberties which they had thus inherited they formed a coalition for mutual defense; and at the end of the war of Independence, by the treaty of Paris of the 30th of November, 1782, Great Britain acknowledged the independence of each of the thirteen colonies as separate, sovereign, and independent States, and not as one United States, in these words:

His Britannic Majesty acknowledges the said United States, namely, New Hampshire, Massachusetts Bay, Rhode Island and Providence Plantations, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia to be free, sovereign, and independent States, and he treats with them as such, and for himself, his heirs, and successors, relinquishes all claim to the government, proprietary, and territorial rights of the same, and every part thereof. (See Revised Statutes relating to treaties, page 261.)

At the end of the Revolution the thirteen old States were then each sovereign and independent States, and possessed of self-government or the right of majorities to rule and regulate their own social and property rights and internal police.

Their patriot statesmen looked to history and found that all efforts at self-government had proved a success, and the governments were honestly administered for the benefit of the whole people while the States were small and the citizens comparatively few so that the people could overlook their agents and officials and hold them to strict accountability in the exercise of their trusts, and could intelligently displace them if dishonest and continue them if honest and efficient. But when these republics grew in size, and embraced large populations and a wide expanse of territory and the scale of governmental operations swelled to such proportions as to defy investigation and the holding of their agents to accountability, that corruption and maladministration ensued, and the governments were administered not for the people but for the benefit of the officials and a favored few. On the other hand they recognized the fact that the kings and despots of the Old World, supported by large standing armies, felt that the existence of free states exercising the right of self-government rendered their thrones insecure and that they would use all their powers to crush out small infant republics.

Under these circumstances the thirteen old States selected their best men to devise a plan by which they could at once each maintain the right of self-government and could aggregate the physical force of all the States for the purpose of protecting each one in that right, and to this end first was framed the articles of confederation, and afterward the present Constitution of the United States and the present Federal Government. The Federal Government is, then, the creature of the States. They, through their delegates, framed the Constitution, and it was adopted by States. The people first delegated the general powers of government to the States, and out of these powers the States delegated to the Federal Government a few substantive powers and such adjective and resultant powers as were necessary and proper to carry them into effect, hoping that within the narrow boundary of power confided to the Federal Government the people would be able to understand the conduct and administration of their agents, so as to displace them when corrupt and retain them when honest and capable. I fear that the operations of the Federal Government have swelled to such colossal proportions, and that it gathers its revenues from and disburses them to so many sources, and its accounts are so large, that they now defy investigation and its officials have become practically irresponsible to the people or their representatives; and so selfish is human nature that irresponsible power will degenerate into corruption and despotism. If we have reached this point, patriotic efforts should be directed to the perfection of some plan by which the vast machinery and operations of the Federal Government can be simplified and subjected to rigid investigation and accountability.

It must be conceded, then, that the Federal Government is one of special powers, and has no constitutional right to employ the Army to keep the peace at the polls unless there is found in the Constitution a substantive grant of power to that effect or unless the use of the Army to keep the peace at the polls is a necessary and proper means of carrying into effect some granted substantive power. There is in the Constitution no express authority or permission to use the Army to keep the peace at the polls, and such use of the Army is neither necessary nor proper to carry into effect any granted power. None of the opponents of repeal have attempted to point out any such express or implied power. The Constitution authorizes but two purposes for which the Army can be used within the States, and they are in section 4, article 4, which reads as follows:

The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion, and on application of the Legislature or of the executive, (when the Legislature cannot be convened,) against domestic violence.

It is conceded that the Federal authorities may use the Army to protect a State against invasion, but they cannot rightfully use the Army to protect a State against domestic violence actually existing and defying State authority except on the application of the Legislature of the State, or the executive when the Legislature cannot be convened. The position of our opponents may be tersely stated thus: the President and Federal authorities cannot send the Army into a State to suppress domestic violence actually existing except on the application of the Legislature or executive, but can without such call send the Army into a State to be present at an election to prevent an apprehended breach of the peace. To state this proposition is to ridicule it. Again, in a government of special and delegated powers, the expression of a right to use the Army for one or more purposes or under certain circumstances is a denial of the right to use it for any other purposes or under any other circumstances. It will be hardly contended that the power to raise and maintain armies granted to Congress in section 8, article 1 of the Constitution carries with it the right to use them to keep the peace at the polls and control elections. If it does, there is no limitation to the purposes for which the Army may be used, and the administrators of the Federal Government may use it for any purposes they deem fit.

The Constitution on this subject must be construed in the light of the fact that our ancestry had ever deemed the presence of the military at the polls as destructive of liberty, and that in 1735 the British Parliament passed an act prohibiting, under heavy penalties, the presence of troops within two miles of the polls; and when, in 1741, a corrupt administration undertook to place a body of soldiers in the vicinity of the polls to overawe the citizens, the House of Commons passed a resolution "that the presence of a regular body of armed soldiers at an election of members to serve in Parliament is a high infringement of the liberties of the subject, a manifest violation of the freedom of elections, and an open defiance of the laws and constitution of this kingdom," and had the civil offenders who invoked the presence of the military arrested and brought to the bar of the house and reprimanded on their knees by the speaker. With this history and such traditions and these laws in force in the colonies we cannot for a moment indulge the presumption that the patriots who framed our Constitution intended to permit the presence of, or use of, the Army at the polls; that they were less jealous of military domination and of their liberties than the members of the British House of Commons. If any man or party, twenty years ago, before war had aroused the passions and blinded the reason of the people and accustomed them to violations of the Constitution, had proposed to legalize the use of the Army to superintend or control elections, he or it would have been met with a storm of indignation that would have sent him or it into merited retirement and disgrace. He or it would have been universally branded as an enemy to liberty and free government.

The convictions of the people upon the subject of the presence or use of the Army at the polls have been crystallized into law in many if not in most of the States. Upon a hasty examination I find that New York, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Maine, Wisconsin, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Virginia, and Delaware have statutes forbidding the use or presence of the Army or militia at the polls, and many of them inhibit the parading of the militia on election day or for five or ten days previous thereto, and declare that no election shall be fixed for a day on which the militia are paraded. (See Revised Statutes, New York, p. 488; of Massachusetts, p. 58. Laws of New Hampshire, p. 110; of Maine, p. 104; of Wisconsin, p. 227; of New Jersey, p. 338. Pennsylvania acts, 1803 and 1839. Delaware code, p. 107–108, and laws of Virginia.) I now come to the consideration of the constitutionality of the supervisors law. As it is conceded that the Federal Government is one of special powers, I may and will ask the opponents of repeal where in the Constitution do you find warrant for the passage of such enactments? The only provisions of the Constitution from which they claim or can claim to derive these extraordinary powers are these:

The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government.

* * * * * * *

The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the place of choosing Senators.

* * * * * * *

Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members.

* * * * * * *

The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

The Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

It is clear that the fifteenth amendment last quoted does not arm the Federal Government with power to make voters or confer suffrage, it can only see to it that no distinction is made by the States on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude. The second section of the Constitution reads thus:

The House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States, and the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature.

This section affirms that the States retain the right to confer suffrage, but all those who by State law are armed with a vote in selection of members of the popular branch of the State Legislatures are recognized as having the right to vote for members of Congress. The Federal Government, then, has no voters; they are all State voters. The Supreme Court of the United States, constituted largely of republican judges, have given this construction to the Constitution, including the fifteenth amendment, and said the Federal Government has no voters of its own creation and can only see that the States in conferring suffrage make no distinction on account of race, color, &c. (See Minor vs. Hepperstett, 21 Wallace, Supreme Court Reports, 178; United States vs. Cruikshank, 2 Otto, 542; United States vs. Reese, 2 Otto, 214.)

But it is ingeniously contended by our republican friends that although the United States cannot and has not conferred the right of suffrage on any one, yet having adopted as her voters those on whom the State has conferred suffrage, it has a right to see that its adopted suffragists exercise their rights, and to that end send her armies or marshals into the States to superintend the elections. This argument is as transparent as it is specious. The authority that confers a right must determine upon whom it is conferred and when it is conferred, and the decisions of the State authorities must be final. They must of necessity decide upon whom it conferred the right to vote for members of the most numerous branches of the State Legislature; and under the second section of the Constitution of the United States no one can vote for members of Congress except those that by State law can vote for members of the popular branch of the State Legislature, so that no one can vote for Congress unless by State law and State decisions he can vote for members of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature. If Federal officials can decide when a State has conferred suffrage so as to qualify one to vote for Congress who by the decisions of the State authority was not entitled to vote for the most numerous branch of the State Legislature, and which latter right is the only one that authorizes him to vote for members of Congress, then they can confer suffrage and create voters. The provision that the United States shall guarantee to every State a republican form of government confers no power to overlook or control elections. No government is republican where it is subject to the control and domination of another power over its internal police.

To guarantee republican government presupposes its existence, and it is evident from the latter part of the sentence of the Constitution that the words guarantee republican form of government meant to protect the State in the enjoyment of self-government against external physical force. The very next sentence is "and shall protect each of them [the States] against invasion;" that is, from external force. It is evident that the guarantee and protection meant is from force outside of the State, for in the latter part of the clause provision is made as to how and when the Federal Government may protect a State from domestic violence or internal force. This brings us to that clause in the Constitution which reads thus:

The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators.

It will be observed that the first part of this is mandatory upon the Legislatures, and that the latter is only permissive and allows Congress to make or alter such regulations. From this it might well be insisted that it was intended that Congress should exercise this power only when the States failed or refused to obey this mandate, but for the purposes of this argument it is not necessary to do so. The power to prescribe the time, place, and manner of holding elections does not carry with it the right to conduct the election or to determine who is entitled to vote, as manner relates to form and not to substance. To prescribe or write down the time, place, and manner of holding elections is one thing; to conduct and superintend and decide who shall vote at an election is another. To conduct and superintend elections is to determine who shall vote at them, and the authority conferring the right must do this. To regulate the time, place, and manner of holding elections is not to hold them or determine who shall vote at them, but to prescribe how those entitled to vote at them shall exercise that right.

It is evident that it was not designed that the Federal Government should conduct the elections for members of Congress, as the States reserved the exclusive right to determine who should vote for members of the most numerous branch of their Legislatures, and none but those so entitled can vote for members of Congress. The danger of a misconstruction of this clause and the fear that the Federal Government might assert the power under it of conducting and supervising the congressional elections evoked bitter opposition to the Constitution. It was perhaps assaulted with more bitterness by those opposed to the adoption of the Constitution than any one clause thereof. The conventions of the States of Massachusetts, New Hampshire, New York, Rhode Island, Virginia, and South Carolina accompanied their ratifications of the Federal Constitution with a solemn protest against the right of Congress to use this power except upon the failure or refusal of a State, and against the right of the Federal Government to in any manner interfere with elections, and the State of North Carolina refused to ratify the Constitution unless with an amendment declaring "that Congress shall not alter, modify, or interfere in the times, places, or manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives, or either of them, except when the Legislature of any State shall neglect, refuse, or be disabled by invasion or rebellion to prescribe the same."

The protests of the other States were to the same purport, and for eighty years after the adoption of the Constitution these views of a majority of the States that framed it and adopted it were conformed to—for eighty years, and until the republican party found that by corruption and extravagance they had lost the confidence of the people and determined to hold on to power in despite of the wishes and convictions of a majority and to control the elections in their own interest, through supervisors and marshals, with power to call the military to the polls to control and overawe the people. But it is contended that as Congress has jurisdiction of matters affecting the interest of the people of all the States, the Federal Government should have a right to conduct the elections for members thereof and see that they are fairly conducted whether the power is conferred on it by the Constitution or not. This is the tyrant's plea of necessity. The fifth section of article 1 of the Constitution confers upon each House of Congress the exclusive right to "judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members." Under this clause there might be a pretext, a mere pretext, for the House of Representatives alone to appoint agents to conduct the election of its members and to report to them, so that it could intelligently decide any contested election that might arise; and certainly if we are to imply any power in any part of the Federal Government to conduct elections, it must be implied in behalf of the tribunal that is made the final judge of them; and if the argument of our republican friends proves anything, it proves that the House of Representatives alone has power to conduct and superintend the election of its members, and the Senate alone the power to conduct and superintend the election of its members. The President and Senate have no voice in determining who is elected to the House of Representatives, and there is no reason why they should have any power to say how these elections shall be conducted.

I doubt not that if our republican friends were in a majority in the House of Representatives and the democrats had the Senate and the Executive, they would assume and attempt to exercise such power, for it seems to me that they assume the constitutional power to do and attempt to do everything necessary to their party success; but if the democratic House was to assume to do this you would hear from our republican friends a just denunciation that we intended to control the elections in the interest of the democratic party, and they would edify us with an ebullition of sound State-rights and strict-construction doctrine—a doctrine they inculcate when it suits their purposes and denounce when it does not.

Our republican friends contend for the right not of the House—that is the judge of the elections of its members—but of the Federal Government to send officials to the elections to report whether they are fairly conducted. If a court were to send its commissioner to witness a transaction that might become the subject of litigation therein, it would invite, deserve, and receive the contempt of Christendom.

In the last analysis the real argument of our republican friends is that a member of Congress is an agent or officer of the Federal Government, and that therefore the Federal authorities should overlook and conduct the election of members of Congress, although no such power is conferred by the Constitution.

Mr. Chairman, it is not necessary for the purposes of this argument, but if it was, it might be plausibly, if not soundly, contended that a member of Congress is not an officer of the Federal Government. It is true he discharges a Federal function and is paid for his services out of the Federal revenues, but he is selected by the people of the States, and is the officer or agent of those who elect or appoint him, and not of those who pay him or are affected by his action. The Constitution itself denominates members of Congress as representatives of the States. The second section, article 1, reads thus:

Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States * * * according to their respective numbers, which shall be determined by adding to the whole number of free persons, including those bound to service for a term of years, and excluding Indians not taxed, three-fifths of all other persons. The actual enumeration shall be made within three years after the first meeting of the Congress of the United States, and within every subsequent term of ten years, in such manner as they shall by law direct. The number of Representatives shall not exceed one for every thirty thousand, but each State shall have at least one Representative; and until such enumeration shall be made, the State of New Hampshire shall be entitled to choose three, Massachusetts eight, Rhode Island and Providence Plantations one, Connecticut five, New York six, New Jersey four, Pennsylvania eight, Delaware one, Maryland six, Virginia ten, North Carolina five, South Carolina five, and Georgia three.

This section of the Constitution is changed by the fourteenth amendment. It reads thus:

Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed.

None but citizens of a State are eligible to represent it in Congress. If a member of Congress is an officer of the Federal Government, all citizens of that Government should be eligible to the position if they reside in the United States. The Twenty-eighth Congress affirmed, by a vote of 126 to 57, that a member of Congress was the officer of the State that elected him, and among those voting to affirm this doctrine are such distinguished lights of the republican party as HANNIBAL HAMLIN, John P. Hale, and Andrew Johnson.

From the formation of the Government down to 1842 many of the States elected their members of Congress by general ticket, the electors of whole States voting in the selection of each of them. Congress, by act of the 25th of June, 1842, required the States to divide themselves into as many equal congressional districts as they were entitled to members, and to elect by districts. The Legislatures of New Hampshire, Georgia, Mississippi, and Missouri declined to district their States and elected by general ticket, and the seats of their members were contested, and on the 14th of February, 1844, the House of Representatives by the decisive vote named admitted them to their seats. While I claim that a State can elect her members of Congress by general ticket if she chooses, I would as a member of a State Legislature vote to elect by districts, so that each member could advise himself of the local needs of his people over which the Federal Government has jurisdiction. It has been decided by the Senate of the United States, sitting as a high court of impeachment, that a member of that body is not a Federal but is a State officer, and that soon after the adoption of the Constitution, while its framers were alive and while some of them were members of that body and many of them were in public life.

In 1797 William Blount, a Senator from the State of Tennessee, was guilty of corruption in the discharge of his duties, and articles of impeachment were preferred against him by the House of Representatives on the 7th of July, 1797, and he was tried on them by the Senate, and, although proven guilty, was on the 11th of February, 1798, acquitted by a vote of 14 to 11, on the ground that he was not a Federal officer, and that, therefore, the Senate had no power to try him. (See House of Representatives and Senate Journals of the Fifth Congress.)

I only moot these questions now, as their maintenance is not necessary to establish the unconstitutionality of the supervisor enactments. It is, however, true that the elections for members of Congress are not Federal, but State elections of a State officer to discharge a Federal function; and there is no pretext that the Federal authorities should conduct and oversee these elections. Then all pretext for interference in or overlooking congressional elections falls to the ground.

I might even go further, and assert that no popular Federal elections are held or known to the Constitution. The President is not elected by the people, but by electors appointed by the States, and even the infamous electoral commission had the grace and honesty to admit that the electors were State officers, and that elections at which they were selected were State elections. The truth is, Mr. Chairman, the Federal Government is not one of self-government—majorities do not control it. In the Senate a bare majority of the voters of the twenty States of New Hampshire, Rhode Island, Vermont, California, Delaware, Florida, Kansas, Minnesota, Nebraska, Nevada, Oregon, West Virginia, Arkansas, Maine, Connecticut, Louisiana, Maryland, South Carolina, Colorado, and Mississippi, with a population according to the last census of only 8,050,124, can pass or defeat a law against the will of the other States with a population of 30,155,474, so that it is possible for the voters representing only 4,026,000 people to defeat the will of 34,179,598 people in the event that the people of the other eighteen States agreed unanimously with the large minority in those twenty States. The President through the veto power, sustained by the votes of the Senators of thirteen of the smallest States, representing a bare majority of the 3,262,387 of people in those States, can defeat the will of the people of the remaining States, with a population of 34,943,211, and of a large minority in the thirteen States.

In the election of President the States of New Hampshire, Connecticut, Rhode Island, Vermont, Colorado, Arkansas, California, Delaware, Florida, Kansas, Louisiana, Maine, Maryland, Minnesota, Mississippi, Nebraska, Nevada, Oregon, South Carolina, Texas, West Virginia, New Jersey, Wisconsin, North Carolina, Alabama, Georgia, Iowa, and Kentucky, with a population of 16,596,962, can elect a President, while the remaining States have a population of 21,608,636; so we see that a bare majority of say 8,300,000 in the States named can elect a President against the unanimous will of all the other States and a minority of 8,296,962 in those States, or against the will of 29,905,598. Colorado with one ninety-third and Nevada with one seventy-third of the population of New York have each equal weight with New York in the Senate. It has happened prior to 1876 that a minorty have elected a President. In 1876 even, as the vote was fraudulently counted, Mr. Tilden had a majority of 250,935 votes over the present occupant of the White House. So far as this election was concerned it appears to have been a game of eight up and the republicans and democrats were seven and seven, and the republicans had the deal and turned up a knave (our people call it a jack) from the bottom of the pack and claimed to have won the game. But our republican friends are not willing to risk the next Presidency upon their skill in handling the pack, and propose to elect the next President with the Army and supervisors and marshals, and not to allow the people to have any hand in it unless they agree to vote for their candidate. If our republican friends are in a majority, they can without the Army protect themselves against a minority, and if in a minority they ought not to control.

It is because the Federal Government is not one of self-government in which majorities control, and is so far removed from the people that they cannot fully investigate and understand its operations and the conduct of its administration, that I advocate State rights and a strict construction of the Constitution of the United States. I would not by too liberal construction enlarge the powers of that Government which is far from the people and in which majorities do not rule, but would fairly construe it so as to retain the great body of governmental powers in the States where majorities govern and in which the people can subject the conduct of their officials to a stricter surveillance. In the main our General Government is federal in its character though national in some of its aspects, insomuch as in a few instances it acts directly upon the citizen and in its foreign relations.

But I do not and never did believe in that State rights which taught that the Union was a rope of sand, and the doctrine of secession and nullification. I was, am yet, and have ever been, a Union man. I never held to the doctrine that we owe a superior allegiance to the States and an inferior one to the Federal Government, or the doctrine that we owe a superior allegiance to the Federal Government and an inferior one to the States. The true doctrine is that each is supreme in the sphere of power confided to one by the people and to the other by the States, and that there can be no conflict of allegiance while each moves in the orbit of its constitutional limits. The true doctrine is that there is danger that poor, weak, corruptible officials will prostitute governments to their own purposes and not administer them for the benefit of the people; and that it is safest to have the great body of governmental power exercised on a small scale and near home, so that the people can overlook and check this tendency. Every farmer well understands that if he runs a comparatively small farm that is situated near him through an agent, and can overlook and see that he manages for his employer's interest and not for his own, he may make it a success and make money; but he also knows that if he has a large farm establishment (so large he cannot overlook its details) run by an agent a thousand miles from him, the agent will grow rich and he grow poor. This, if not the principle, is a fit illustration of the true principle of State rights.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me so plain that the enactments we propose to repeal, if not unconstitutional are impolitic, destructive of liberty and at war with the genius of our institutions, that to demonstrate it is "to gild gold and paint the lily." If the people are entitled to select their officers they should be allowed to do so freely, unawed by the presence of armed power. But we are told that the military are to be present to prevent a breach of the peace if one should occur. This ignores the existence of the civil power and assumes that they will be unable to keep the peace. If this is true, then the military should be present at all times and places, and there is as much need for them on other public and exciting occasions as on election-days; and if the people acquiesce in the use of military at the elections, it will next be asserted that there is equal use for them at public discussions and other occasions, and every vestige of civil government will by degrees disappear.

The presence of the military at the polls is inconsistent with free elections, but if we are to have them let them be under the control of officers of the regular Army, not of irresponsible deputy marshals. Accustomed as the Army officers are to doing everything by force, they are also accustomed to command, and would not be so apt to grossly misuse their power as irresponsible deputy marshals, who, swelling with the importance of directing military force and assuming that they know their interests better than the people, and that they are doing them a favor, would brook no difference of opinion and allow no votes in opposition to their crude opinions, interests, or prejudice.

But we should dispense with these supervisors and deputy marshals, because they are a costly luxury, and have each year cost the overburdened tax-payers more than $200,000 a year. The law allows as many deputy marshals as may be deemed necessary at $5 per day for ten days, and this is actually made use of as a means of buying votes for the republican party, and thus the Treasury of the United States is made to furnish by indirection the money to buy votes for the republicans, and the people are taxed to raise this money, to pay these deputies or purchased voters and controllers of elections.

The truth is, Mr. Chairman, that while the people have been blinded by the passions incident to civil war, the leaders of the republican party have become so rich from the spoils of office that they are afraid to trust a Government of the people, and are clamoring and voting for a large standing army with which to keep the people down and with which to control the elections by force and prevent the voice of the people from being heard or heeded, and in order to conceal their real motives, they claim to do this in the interest of free and honest elections—and under pretense of devotion to the Union, by constant inflammatory harangues, they try to keep alive the passions and prejudices of the war so that in their blindness the people will not penetrate their real motives. Sir, no man is a practical Union man who tries to keep alive the passions and prejudices of the war and to excite sectional jealousy, distrust, and discord; who advocates inequality in the rights of sections and States. We cannot live together unless at peace, and we cannot have peace and co-operation if we are constantly exciting prejudices against each other, and our Anglo-Saxon traditions and blood will not allow us to live together except on terms of equality. It would be to greatly underrate the intellect of republican leaders to assume that they did not understand the effect and tendency of their constant effort to inflame and keep alive the passions and enmities of the war, and we might without being uncharitable come to the conclusion that, as they alleged of the southern leaders when Lincoln was elected, they prefer disunion to the relinquishment of power.

They complain that the South is a unit against them. It is their own fault that this is so. If when the war was over they had shown that they made it only to maintain and restore the Union by saying to the southern people, "You have laid down your arms and come back into the Union; we have spent our blood and treasure for four years to keep you in the Union and will not now keep you out," and had taken them by the hand and trusted them and done what was in their power to restore their prosperity and build up the waste places where had rolled the fiery tide of war—if they had done this it is my humble opinion that a majority of the South would have been republican to-day. But in their mad love of power and place and spoils they tried to place the South in a position that it could not vote against them and put them under military government, and sent swarms of carpet-bag adventurers, who were elected by the Army, to preside over them and misrepresent them in Congress, and who robbed not only the white people they were sent to oppress, but the negroes whom they pretended to protect and that about election time they have such a gushing affection for; and the robbed and deceived and betrayed negroes and the oppressed white people have both turned against the party that sent these vultures to prey upon their substance.

The controlling element of the South is Anglo-Saxon, and they have enjoyed and love liberty; and so long as the republican party is in power and they are menaced with military domination they will be a unit against that party and will subordinate all minor questions and policies. Displace the republican party from power and remove this menace, and the South will divide on questions of policy and become comparatively non-partisan; and I do not hesitate to say that I think this would be one of the best results that would follow that welcome event. It is time that all of us should be less of partisans and more of patriots. It is time that we should cease to gratify the prejudices or approve the opinions of the past, and unite in an earnest effort to restore the prosperity and liberties of the present and take council how to secure them in the future.

Let us bury all that is unpleasant in the past and remember the noble acts, the high courage and splendid achievements of both parties to our late unhappy struggle—they were Americans all—and unite in an effort to build up every section of the country, in an effort to rehabilitate the wasted fields of the South, and make her once more the best customer for the grain, pork, beef, and breadstuffs of the Northwest, the manufactures of the East, and the live-stock of Kentucky and the Middle States. Every consideration of humanity, patriotism, interest, and religion demands this of us; and the love of office and power and the interest of parties must yield to these demands. The love and desire for the perpetuity of the Union demand it of us. Stagnant trade, paralyzed industries, and starving and unemployed labor demand it of us.

Mr. Chairman, I wish that every patriotic editor in the country would place at the head of the first column of every issue in mammoth type these words: "He who strives to keep alive the prejudices and passions of the war and inflame the sections against each other, or advocates the inequality of States or sections, is a disunionist." This done for a few months, and the people would accept the plain truth. It is time that all of us should sacrifice partisan prejudice and the desire for power and place on the altar of patriotism and unite together in an earnest effort to restore the prosperity of the country and to revitalize its paralyzed energies. But our republican friends will not allow us. In this debate, as in every other, our arguments are not answered, our statements of facts are not questioned, and we are met with no reply but some appeal to passion and sectional prejudice, some rehearsal of a real or alleged outrage committed. The democrats and southern men never introduce these things; but no matter what proposition we make to relieve starving labor, to relieve business, to restore prosperity, it is met with these appeals, and our propositions and arguments receive no other answer.

The South accepted the result of the war, and has accepted in good faith the constitutional amendments, and desires to and will aid in their enforcement and not question their validity, and has done everything required of them; and I do not believe there is any considerable number of men in the South who would restore slavery if they had the power. Her people and her Representatives are honorable, and they profess in good faith to have returned to their allegiance and to be for the maintenance of the Union; and I for one believe that if a foreign war should occur they would rally around the old flag with alacrity and defend it with valor. Let us trust them. The republicans of this House as men do trust them. They trust their wives and daughters with them in society. They pair with them, and, trusting their honor, go home to their families and on business with a perfect confidence that they will not vote in their absence on any question about which they differ, and thus trust them with, or rather about, the interest of their constituents, and in private conversation speak of them as men of honor and rely on them and their statements; and yet in their speeches they uncandidly for political effect try to make their constituents believe they are a set of graceless scamps that cannot and ought not to be trusted and whose professions should not be accepted and relied on; and when asked why they make such speeches, they acknowledge they do so for political effect. In private conversation most of them condemn the constant effort to stimulate the prejudices of the war and of the sections, and admit that this course is unfriendly to the maintenance of the Union and say it is a party necessity. But only one of them has risen to that lofty plane of patriotism which impelled him to denounce this practice of his party leaders in a public speech.

Mr. Chairman, when the existence of the Union was in peril the administrators of the Federal Government, under the pretext that the Constitution of the United States was an elastic instrument that permitted the exercise of powers in war that it did not in peace, and assuming that the public safety was the supreme law of the land, arrogated to themselves extraordinary and dangerous powers with the express understanding that they were to be surrendered when the exigency was over, and with this understanding the people acquiesced. But when the war was over they did not surrender these extraordinary powers, but used them to perpetuate party ascendency, and as a pretext for their continued use contended that the war was not over, and have kept up that pretext for fourteen years; but the people have found that the war is over, and have determined that you shall surrender the powers you have so grossly and corruptly misused, and you had better make a virtue of necessity and surrender them gracefully and make haste to evade the verdict of unmitigated condemnation which awaits in the near future all who array themselves against a government of the will of the people and in favor of a military government.

You need not fear the fate of the overgrown fortunes which you and your friends have accumulated by fraud, corruption, and class legislation. A generous people if you will give back their liberties and let us repeal your odious class legislation will permit you to retain your ill-gotten wealth, and will trust to the influences of time, death, family division, and to the dissoluteness of your children nursed in idleness, wealth, and luxury, to redistribute the property back to the many from whom it has been taken unjustly under the form of law.

The commercial ruin, poverty, bankruptcy, and distress you have by misrule brought on the country has aroused them and set them to thinking and investigating, and they have found out that you have betrayed and deceived them, and they are in terrible earnest, and will never cease their efforts until they sweep from the statute-book every vestige of class legislation you have placed there, and establish civil supremacy, intelligent and impartial juries, and a free ballot.

APPENDIX.

SEC. 820. The following shall be causes of disqualification and challenge of grand and petit jurors in the courts of the United States, in addition to the causes existing by virtue of section 812, namely: Without duress and coercion to have taken up arms or to have joined any insurrection or rebellion against the United States; to have adhered to any insurrection or rebellion, giving it aid and comfort; to have given, directly or indirectly, any assistance in money, arms, horses, clothes, or anything whatever, to or for the use or benefit of any person whom the giver of such assistance knew to have joined, or to be about to join, any insurrection or rebellion, or to have resisted, or to be about to resist, with force of arms, the execution of the laws of the United States, or whom he had good ground to believe to have joined, or to be about to join, any insurrection or rebellion, or to have resisted, or to be about to resist, with force of arms, the execution of the laws of the United States; or to have counseled or advised any person to join any insurrection or rebellion, or to resist with force of arms the laws of the United States.

SEC. 821. At every term of any court of the United States the district attorney, or other person acting on behalf of the United States in said court, may move, and the court, in their discretion, may require the clerk to tender to every person summoned to serve as a grand or petit juror, or venireman or talesman, in said court, the following oath or affirmation, namely: "You do solemnly swear (or affirm) that you will support the Constitution of the United States of America; that you have not, without duress and constraint, taken up arms or joined any insurrection or rebellion against the United States; that you have not adhered to any insurrection or rebellion, giving it aid and comfort; that you have not, directly or indirectly, given any assistance in money, or any other thing, to any person or persons whom you knew, or had good ground to believe, to have joined, or to be about to join, said insurrection or rebellion, or to have resisted, or to be about to resist, with force of arms, the execution of the laws of the United States; and that you have not counseled or advised any person to join any insurrection or rebellion against, or to resist with force of arms, the laws of the United States." Any person declining to take said oath shall be discharged by the court from serving on the grand or petit jury, or venire, to which he may have been summoned.

SEC. 2002. No military or naval officer, or other person engaged in the civil, military, or naval service of the United States, shall order, bring, keep, or have under his authority or control, any troops or armed men at the place where any general or special election is held in any State, unless it be necessary to repel the armed enemies of the United States, or to keep the peace at the polls.

SEC. 2016. The supervisors of election, so appointed, are authorized and required to attend at all times and places fixed for the registration of voters, who, being registered, would be entitled to vote for a Representative or Delegate in Congress, and to challenge any person offering to register; to attend at all times and places when the names of registered voters may be marked for challenge, and to cause such names registered as they may deem proper to be so marked; to make, when required, the lists, or either of them, provided for in section 2026, and verify the same; and upon any occasion, and at any time when in attendance upon the duty herein prescribed, to personally inspect and scrutinize such registry, and for purposes of identification to affix their signatures to each page of the original list, and of each copy of any such list of registered voters, at such times, upon each day when any name may be received, entered, or registered, and in such manner as will, in their judgment, detect and expose the improper or wrongful removal therefrom, or addition thereto, of any name.

SEC. 2018. To the end that each candidate for the office of Representative or Delegate in Congress may obtain the benefit of every vote for him cast, the supervisors of election are, and each of them is, required to personally scrutinize, count, and canvass each ballot in their election district or voting precinct cast, whatever may be the indorsement on the ballot, or in whatever box it may have been placed or be found; to make and forward to the officer who, in accordance with the provisions of section 2025, has been designated as the chief supervisor of the judicial district in which the city or town wherein they may serve, acts, such certificates and returns of all such ballots as such officer may direct and require, and to attach to the registry list, and any and all copies thereof and to any certificate, statement, or return, whether the same, or any part or portion thereof, be required by any law of the United States, or of any State, territorial, or municipal law, any statement touching the truth or accuracy of the registry, or the truth or fairness of the election and canvass, which the supervisors of the election, or either of them, may desire to make or attach, or which should properly and honestly be made or attached, in order that the facts may become known.

SEC. 2020. When in any election district or voting precinct in any city or town, for which there have been appointed supervisors of election for any election at which a Representative or Delegate in Congress is voted for, the supervisors of election are not allowed to exercise and discharge, fully and freely, and without bribery, solicitation, interference, hinderance, molestation, violence, or threats thereof, on the part of any person, all the duties, obligations, and powers conferred upon them by law, the supervisors of election shall make prompt report, under oath, within ten days after the day of election, to the officer who, in accordance with the provisions of section 2025, has been designated as the chief supervisor of the judicial district in which the city or town wherein they served, acts, of the manner and means by which they were not so allowed to fully and freely exercise and discharge the duties and obligations required and imposed herein. And upon receiving any such report, the chief supervisor, acting both in such capacity and officially as a commissioner of the circuit court, shall forthwith examine into all the facts; and he shall have power to subpœna and compel the attendance before him of any witness, and to administer oaths and take testimony in respect to the charges made; and, prior to the assembling of the Congress for which any such Representative or Delegate was voted for, he shall file with the Clerk of the House of Representatives all the evidence by him taken, all information by him obtained, and all reports to him made.

SEC. 2021. Whenever an election at which Representatives or Delegates in Congress are to be chosen is held in any city or town of twenty thousand inhabitants or upward, the marshal for the district in which the city or town is situated shall, on the application, in writing, of at least two citizens residing in such city or town, appoint special deputy marshals, whose duty it shall be, when required thereto, to aid and assist the supervisors of election in the verification of any list of persons who may have registered or voted; to attend in each election district or voting precinct at the times and places fixed for the registration of voters, and at all times and places when and where the registration may by law be scrutinized, and the names of registered voters be marked for challenge; and also to attend, at all times for holding elections, the polls in such district or precinct.

SEC. 2022. The marshal and his general deputies, and such special deputies, shall keep the peace, and support and protect the supervisors of election in the discharge of their duties, preserve order at such places of registration and at such polls, prevent fraudulent registration and fraudulent voting thereat, or fraudulent conduct on the part of any officer of election, and immediately, either at the place of registration or polling place, or elsewhere, and either before or after registering or voting, to arrest and take into custody, with or without process, any person who commits, or attempts or offers to commit, any of the acts or offenses prohibited herein, or who commits any offense against the laws of the United States; but no person shall be arrested without process for any offense not committed in the presence of the marshal or his general or special deputies, or either of them, or of the supervisors of election, or either of them, and, for the purposes of arrest or the preservation of the peace, the supervisors of election shall, in the absence of the marshal's deputies, or if required to assist such deputies, have the same duties and powers as deputy marshals; nor shall any person, on the day of such election, be arrested without process for any offense committed on the day of registration.

SEC. 2023. Whenever any arrest is made under any provision of this title, the person so arrested shall forthwith be brought before a commissioner, judge, or court of the United States for examination of the offenses alleged against him; and such commissioner, judge, or court shall proceed in respect thereto as authorized by law in case of crimes against the United States.

SEC. 2024. The marshal or his general deputies, or such special deputies as are thereto specially empowered by him, in writing, and under his hand and seal, whenever he or either or any of them is forcibly resisted in executing their duties under this title, or shall, by violence, threats, or menaces, be prevented from executing such duties, or from arresting any person who has committed any offense for which the marshal or his general or his special deputies are authorized to make such arrest, are, and each of them is, empowered to summon and call to his aid the by-standers or posse comitatus of his district.

SEC. 2025. The circuit courts of the United States for each judicial circuit shall name and appoint, on or before the 1st day of May, in the year 1871, and thereafter as vacancies may from any cause arise, from among the circuit-court commissioners for each judicial district in each judicial circuit, one of such officers, who shall be known for the duties required of him under this title as the chief supervisor of elections of the judicial district for which he is a commissioner, and shall, so long as faithful and capable, discharge the duties in this title imposed.

SEC. 2026. The chief supervisor shall prepare and furnish all necessary books, forms, blanks, and instructions for the use and direction of the supervisors of election in the several cities and towns in their respective districts; he shall receive the applications of all parties for appointment to such positions; upon the opening, as contemplated in section 2012, of the circuit court for the judicial circuit in which the commissioner so designated acts, he shall present such applications to the judge thereof, and furnish information to him in respect to the appointment by the court of such supervisors of election; he shall require of the supervisors of election, when necessary, lists of the persons who may register and vote, or either, in their respective election districts or voting precincts, and cause the names of those upon any such list whose right to register or vote is honestly doubted to be verified by proper inquiry and examination at the respective places by them assigned as their residences; and he shall receive, preserve, and file all oaths of office of supervisors of election, and of all special deputy marshals appointed under the provisions of this title, and all certificates, returns, reports, and records of every kind and nature contemplated or made requisite by the provisions hereof, save where otherwise herein specially directed.

SEC. 2027. All United States marshals and commissioners who in any judicial district perform any duties under the preceding provisions relating to, concerning, or affecting the election of Representatives or Delegates in the Congress of the United States, from time to time, and with all due diligence, shall forward to the chief supervisor in and for their judicial district, all complaints, examinations, and records pertaining thereto, and all oaths of office by them administered to any supervisor of election or special deputy marshal, in order that the same may be properly preserved and filed.

SEC. 2031. There shall be allowed and paid to the chief supervisor, for his services as such officer, the following compensation, apart from and in excess of all fees allowed by law for the performance of any duty as circuit-court commissioner: For filing and caring for every return, report, record, document, or other paper required to be filed by him under any of the preceding provisions, ten cents; for affixing a seal to any paper, record, report, or instrument, twenty cents; for entering and indexing the records of his office, fifteen cents per folio; and for arranging and transmitting to Congress, as provided for in section 2020, any report, statement, record, return, or examination, for each folio, fifteen cents; and for any copy thereof, or of any paper on file, a like sum. And there shall be allowed and paid to each supervisor of election, and each special deputy marshal who is appointed and performs his duty under the preceding provisions, compensation at the rate of $5 per day for each day he is actually on duty, not exceeding ten days; but no compensation shall be allowed, in any case, to supervisors of election, except to those appointed in cities or towns of twenty thousand or more inhabitants. And the fees of the chief supervisors shall be paid at the Treasury of the United States, such accounts to be made out, verified, examined, and certified as in the case of accounts of commissioners, save that the examination or certificate required may be made by either the circuit or district judge.

SEC. 5522. Every person, whether with or without any authority, power, or process, or pretended authority, power, or process, of any State, Territory, or municipality, who obstructs, hinders, assaults, or by bribery, solicitation, or otherwise, interferes with or prevents the supervisors of election, or either of them, or the marshal or his general or special deputies, or either of them, in the performance of any duty required of them, or either of them, or which he or they, or either of them, may be authorized to perform by any law of the United States, in the execution of process or otherwise, or who by any of the means before mentioned hinders or prevents the free attendance and presence at such places of registration or at such polls of election, or full and free access and egress to and from any such place of registration or poll of election, or in going to and from any such place of registration or poll of election, or to and from any room, where any such registration or election or canvass of votes, or of making any returns or certificates thereof, may be had, or who molests, interferes with, removes, or ejects from any such place of registration or poll of election, or of canvassing votes cast thereat, or of making returns or certificates thereof, any supervisor of election, the marshal, or his general or special deputies, or either of them; or who threatens, or attempts, or offers so to do, or refuses or neglects to aid and assist any supervisor of election, or the marshal or his general or special deputies, or either of them, in the performance of his or their duties, when required by him or them, or either of them, to give such aid and assistance, shall be liable to instant arrest without process, and shall be punished by imprisonment not more than two years, or by a fine of not more than $3,000, or by both such fine and imprisonment, and shall pay the costs of the prosecution.

Letter of Attorney-General Taft.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, September 4, 1876.

SIR: The laws of the United States having made it my duty to exercise general direction over marshals in the manner of discharging their offices, I have prepared for their use this circular-letter of instructions as to the coming election, intending the same also as a reply once for all to numerous applications in like connection from private citizens in various States.

In the present condition of legislation, the United States occupy a position toward voters and voting which varies according as the election is for State and other local officers only, or for members of Congress and presidential electors.

In elections at which members of the House of Representatives are chosen, which by law include also elections at which the electors for President and Vice-President are appointed, the United States secure voters against whatever in general hinders or prevents them from a free exercise of the elective franchise, extending that care alike to the registration lists, the act of voting, and the personal freedom and security of the voter at all times as well against violence on account of any vote that he may intend to give as against conspiracy because of any that he may already have given.

The peace of the United States, therefore, which you are to preserve and whose violation you are to suppress, precedes as well as follows such elections, and protects (among others) the rights specified in the last paragraph, so that any person who by force violates those rights breaks that peace and renders it your duty to arrest him, and to suppress any riots incident or that threaten the integrity of the registration or election, to the end that the will of the people in such election may be ascertained and take effect, and that offenders may be brought before the courts for punishment.

Notorious events in several States, which recently and in an unusual manner have been publicly reprobated, render it a grave duty of all marshals who have cause to apprehend a violation of the peace of the United States connected as above with the elections to be held upon the Tuesday after the first Monday in November next, to be prepared to preserve and to restore such peace.

As the chief executive officer of the United States in your district, you will be held responsible for all breaches of the peace of the United States which diligence on your part might have prevented, and for the arrest and securing of all persons who violate that peace in any of the points above enumerated.

Diligence in these matters requires, of course, that you be and continue present, in person or by deputy, at all places of registration or election at which you have reason to suspect that the peace is threatened; and that whenever an embodiment of the posse comitatus is required to enforce the law, such embodiment be effected.

You will observe that the "special" deputies mentioned in section 2021 of the Revised Statutes have peculiar duties assigned to them, duties which otherwise do not belong to deputy marshals. Such "special" deputies can be appointed only in cities of twenty thousand inhabitants or upward.

But the duties assigned to marshals and their deputies by section 2022, or other like statute, belong to all duly appointed deputies, whether they be general or be "special" within the meaning of that and the preceding section. Deputies to discharge this latter class of duties may be appointed to any number whatever, according to the discretion of the marshal, in all States in which sheriffs have a similar power. Section 2030 has no practical bearing upon this point in States where no limit is imposed upon the appointment of deputies by sheriffs, because in such States the laws of the United States "prior to the 10th of June, 1872," left marshals also unlimited as to the number of their deputies.

In discharging the duties above mentioned, you will doubtless receive the countenance and support of all the good citizens of the United States in your respective districts. It is not necessary to say that it is upon such countenance and support that the United States mainly rely in their endeavor to enforce the right to vote which they have given or have secured. The present instructions are intended only to counteract that partial malice, wrongheadedness, or inconsideration which sometimes triumphs at critical moments over the conservative and, in general, prevailing forces of society, and to which the present and passing condition of the country gives more than ordinary strength, and, therefore, requires the Government particularly to observe and provide against.

In this connection I advise that you and each of your deputies, general and "special," have a right to summon to your assistance, in preventing and quelling disorder, "every person in the district above fifteen years of age, whatever may be their occupation, whether civilian or not, and including the military of all denominations, militia, soldiers, marines, all of whom are alike bound to obey you. The fact that they are organized as military bodies, (whether of the State or of the United States,) under the immediate command of their own officers, does not in any wise affect their legal character. They are still the posse comitatus." I prefer to quote the above statement of the law upon this point from an opinion by my predecessor, Attorney-General Cushing, because it thus appears to have been well settled for many years. (6 Opinions, 466, May 27, 1854.)

I need hardly add that there can be no State law or State official in this country who has jurisdiction to oppose you in discharging your official duties under the laws of the United States. If such interference shall take place—a thing not anticipated—you are to disregard it entirely. The laws of the United States are supreme, and so, consequently, is the action of officials of the United States in enforcing them. There is, as virtually you have already been told, no officer of a State whom you may not by summons embody into your own posse; and any State posse already embodied by a sheriff will, with such sheriff, be obliged upon your summons to become part of a United States posse, and obey you or your deputy acting virtute officii.

The responsibility which devolves upon an officer clothed with such powers, and required to guard the highest rights of citizens, corresponds in degree with those powers and rights, and exacts of such officer consideration, intelligence, and courage.

It is proper to advise you that in preparing this circular I have considered recent important judgments given by the Supreme Court of the United States upon the acts of Congress which regulate this general topic.

I have founded the above instructions upon those acts as affected by such judgments, and I need in this place add no more than that these judgments do not concern elections for Federal officers.

You will find appended, in full or by reference, such statutory provisions as it seems important that you and your deputies shall in this connection read and consider.

In matters of doubt you are of course entitled to the advice of the United States attorneys for your district.

These instructions have been submitted to the President, and have his approval.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

——— ———,
Attorney-General.

To ——— ———, Esq.,
United States marshal for the district of ———.

[Special Order, No. 229.]

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF THE EAST,
New York City, November 5, 1870.

1. The available officers and two hundred non-commissioned officers and privates of the engineer troops at Willett's Point, New York Harbor will come to the head quarters building in this city on next Monday evening, November 7, so as to arrive by ten o'clock p. m., prepared for armed service, and to remain at least until Wednesday morning. They will come on a steamboat which the Quartermaster's Department will send for them and will be landed at the foot of Spring street, (pier No. 43, North River,) and march thence and take the station which may be shown them by the district quartermaster. They will bring a day's cooked rations. Facilities will be afforded in the building for making hot coffee.

2. All the available officers and men of the Eighth Infantry will be brought to the city on Monday, the 7th instant, to arrive about ten p. m. They will come prepared for armed service, with their overcoats and blankets, to remain at least until Wednesday morning, the 9th instant. The colonel, with five companies, will take post in building No. 161 Avenue B, near the southeast corner of Tompkins Square, and the lieutenant-colonel, with five companies, will take post in buildings Nos. 322, 324, and 326 East Forty-fifth street, between First and Second avenues.

3. The available officers and men of the companies of the First Artillery at Forts Hamilton, Wadsworth, and Ward, under Colonel Vogdes or the senior officer, will come to the city on Monday evening, the 7th instant, to arrive about 10 p. m., prepared for armed service, and to remain at least until Wednesday morning. They will take post in building No. 294 Broadway, near the corner of Reade street, and will land at the wharf most convenient for their reaching that point. They will bring with them a day's cooked rations and their camp kettles for making coffee. The district quartermaster will furnish drays to carry their effects from the steamboat.

4. The troops above indicated and the Fifth Artillery from Fort Trumbull and Fort Adams are to be brought here to aid the United States civil officers in the execution of their duty in enforcing the United States laws, and it cannot be too strongly impressed on them that the duty they have to perform is one of exceeding delicacy and of the highest importance, and that it may depend largely on their fidelity and good conduct that peace is maintained. They will be held in readiness for service at literally a moment's notice, and from the time of their arrival not a man will be allowed to leave the building on any account or for any purpose whatever unless under a commissioned officer.

5. Commanders of the stations above named will immediately on their arrival send a report of the fact to department headquarters.

By command of Brigadier-General McDowell.

ROB'T C. PERRY,
Acting Assistant Adjutant-General.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington City, October 27, 1870.

SIR: In view of the apprehension that there may be possible opposition made to the United States laws in connection with the coming election in the city of New York, November 8, 1870, the President directs that you instruct Brigadier-General McDowell, commanding the Department of the East, to hold the troops in that vicinity in readiness for service, during a week if necessary, to protect and assist the civil officers of the United States in their duty of enforcing the laws. The engineer troops and all others in the harbor of New York and vicinity will, for the occasion, be at his command. You will instruct General McDowell to confer fully beforehand with the United States marshal and the United States district attorney, to concert with them proper measures, and to promptly respond to any call made upon him for troops by the marshal during the week of the election. The President thinks that the use of the United States troops for the purpose indicated will never be required, but the law must be enforced, and he therefore expects General McDowell and the officers and troops under his command, while using the utmost discretion, to take care that the purpose of the Government to enforce the law is fully carried out. But in the performance of this duty they are only effectually to execute the measures indicated to them by the authorized civil officers of the United States.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

WM. W. BELKNAP,
Secretary of War.
CHAUNCEY McKEEVER,
Assistant Adjutant-General.

To General W. T. SHERMAN,
United States Army, Washington, D. C.

Mr. SPRINGER. It is impossible for me to discuss this question as I should like in the brief time allowed to me, and I shall postpone doing so till another day. I yield, therefore, to the gentleman from Indiana to finish his speech.

Mr. DE LA MATYR then concluded the speech which appears in full on page 816.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, much has been said during this debate against reviving the memories of the past and tearing open the wounds of war. Almost every speaker upon both sides has professed his unwillingness needlessly to refer to the sad and bloody scenes which attended the late civil war and which marked the period of reconstruction. It has been declared to be alike unstatesmanlike and unpatriotic to fan into flames again the expiring embers of sectional hatred. But almost every speaker has in a greater or less degree yielded to the temptation against which he has warned us. While I would gladly refrain from any reference to the past which can give offense, I must confess in the outstart that the subject presented for consideration is of such a nature as to make it impossible to wholly refrain from following the example of those who have preceded me. I shall, however, indulge in no unkind personal reference to any gentleman who has spoken or who may be a member of this House.

WHO IS RESPONSIBLE FOR BRINGING FORWARD THESE DANGEROUS SECTIONAL ISSUES?

Mr. Chairman, if any man or any party is responsible for awakening bitter memories at this time, that man is not a republican, nor is that party the republican party. We have not brought here or forced the political issues which now agitate Congress and the country. They are of necessity exciting issues. They connect themselves with the unhappy past; they come from and are a part of it. Gentlemen of the other side have brought these issues here, and have cast the defiant "gage of battle" at our feet and have bid us "lift it when we will." Their eloquent champion and leader threw down the challenge amid their tumultuous applause, and for his chivalrous action he received their warm congratulations. With their approval and as their appointed herald he warned all democrats of the dangers of straggling from his standard and leadership, and admonished all his democratic countrymen everywhere that "he who dallies is a dastard, and he who doubts is damned."

He notifies us that they "do not intend to stop until" they "have stricken the last vestiges of your" [republican] "war measures from the statute-book, which like these, were born of the passions incident to civil strife, and looked to the abridgment of the liberties of the citizen."

How much this "gage of battle" may portend we are not permitted to know. The extent to which the majority may intend to go is only known to themselves, if indeed it is known at all. The threat is broad enough to embrace all the great measures enacted from the time when Abraham Lincoln seized and upheld the tottering fabric of American liberty to this hour. Who can tell which of these measures may be regarded as born of the passions incident to civil strife, or which they shall think "looked to the abridgment of the liberties of the citizen," or whether all may not come under that condemnation.

This "gage of battle" may therefore portend the repeal of all the great enactments which bear the approval of Mr. Lincoln and his successors.

Knowing only that the threat portends danger to the country, its institutions, and laws, the gage has been "lifted" and accepted as promptly and as gallantly as it was delivered.

I give gentlemen on the other side credit for courage equal to their manifesto. I have no doubt some at least can contemplate the possible disruption of this Government and the destruction of this Union with undisturbed equanimity and with a fortitude akin to heroism. But I trust the history of the past, the recent past, has not all been forgotten, and that gentlemen will recall to memory the lesson which it cost so much to teach, that all the virtue and all the fortitude and all the valor and all the heroism are not to be found in one section or with one race. For myself and for my constituents and, I think, for all the loyal masses of this country, I may say to the gentlemen from the South we hoped for peace, for reconciliation, and for mutual good-will. We welcomed back the wayward sons of the Republic with joy. You are here clothed with all the power and endowed with all the rights possessed by those who offered their lives to save the nation's life. No penalty has been demanded and no privilege denied. I think I may with propriety and with no arrogance remind these our friends (if they will but have it so) that they are here not alone by their own volition, but by the generous permission and declared will of the loyal men of this country, before whose valor the confederacy fell and into whose hands they surrendered the weapons of rebellion which they had so long and so bravely wielded.

Without intending offense to any, I must be permitted to say that it seems to me that this challenge and this defiance come from the wrong source, considering all the past—the offense on the one hand and the generous forgiveness on the other. It would have come more appropriately, I think, from some other quarter. Out of a decent respect for modesty some man should have been found to hurl this challenge who was not loaded down with obligations for forbearance, generous pardon, and restoration to forfeited rights and privileges. It is not for me to complain of this, however. It is best that the will and purpose of the democratic party should find utterance on this floor through the lips of that man who most truly represents it. The body of the democratic party, if we look for majorities only, is at the South. One or two Northern States, or rather one or two great northern cities, uniting with the South may give promise of a national victory. It is, I confess, according to the eternal fitness of things that the leadership should be conferred upon the South, and entirely fit and most appropriate that that leader should have proved his fitness for such leadership by bravely and gallantly defending the cause of the South in the very front of battle. We are informed that you "will not stop until you have stricken from the statute-book the last vestige of your (our) war measures, which like these, were born of the passions incident to civil strife, and looked to the abridgment of the liberty of the citizen." This language is capable of two constructions, one of which conveys to our minds a clear idea of what war measures were intended, and the other of which leaves us in doubt and uncertainty. I understood at the time it was uttered, and as I read it now I understand it to mean that the majority mean to strike from the statute-book all the war measures passed during republican administration, and to characterize them all as "born of the passions incident to civil strife, and as looking to the abridgment of the liberty of the citizen." The frank and open nature of the gentleman leads me to adopt this construction. He is not in the habit of disguising his purpose or indulging in ambiguous language. To say that you mean to strike from the statute-book only such war measures as were born of the passions incident to civil strife, &c., is to tell us nothing except to be prepared for everything and anything. It may mean much, little, or nothing, and the threat may be executed by doing much, little, or nothing, as the courage and power of the party may be strong or weak when the time for execution arrives. Under it you may undo all that has been done during the last eighteen years having relation to the re-establishment of the Union, the freedom and purity of the ballot, and the liberty of the citizen; and you may declare that giving liberty and the ballot to the freedman is an abridgment of the liberties of the citizen, and may inaugurate measures for the removal of the constitutional amendments. Whatever the challenge is, and whatever it means, we have it; we must perforce accept it; we have accepted it. Every republican in the land has heard it. Every loyal citizen of the country has heard it. They are pondering over it, and when the day of trial comes—the day of danger to the Republic—they will answer it as only heroic lovers of liberty and country can answer it, with a crushing blow.

I have said, sir, that the issue presented has reference to the past and can only be debated in connection with the history of the past. It is idle for the men who forced this issue upon us to chide us for bringing to light the history which belongs to it. The men who raised the issue knew that it could only awaken unpleasant memories and rekindle the slumbering fires of sectional hostility and bitterness. They must have deliberately intended to rake over the dying embers of old hatreds and to blow them into a flame again. That was their purpose and they could have had no other. They wanted new issues, something to rally a party on. They thought they had found it, and were determined to bring it to the front. The manner in which they have chosen to present their new issue proves it. They have by choice and with deliberation and malicious calculation coupled it with the issue of the life or death of the Republic. They place their proposed amendments on an appropriation bill granting supplies to carry on the Government. They make the supplies depend upon repeal. Why do this before you have tried repeal, unless you are feeling for an issue or "spoiling for a fight?"

Do we not agree to these appropriations in every detail and to the last item? Have we not, Mr. Chairman, without one word of unkindness and with unusual unanimity already agreed upon every item of these appropriations? Are not the bills ready, so far as the appropriations are concerned, to be finally passed? Upon the appropriations, then, we are in perfect harmony. But the majority say we desire to repeal or modify the election laws. We answer, bring in your bill for repeal or modification and we will sit here with you now if you insist—as you may and have the power to insist—and discuss, amend, and perfect them so as to make them just and fair to all. If they are oppressive to the honest voter we will consent to their modification. If they are defective and do not secure the purity of the ballot and do permit the practice of fraud and injustice let us, in evidence of the professions of a desire for a free and pure ballot which we are on all hands making, sit down together like statesmen and patriots and amend these laws, perfect what is imperfect, remove what is oppressive and unjust, if anything there be; repeal what is useless, obsolete, or offensive, and make the laws such that in this free land in which Government is of, from, and by the people no man shall be deprived of his vote, and that no man who has not the right to vote shall be allowed to corrupt by his ballot the sacred ark of republican liberty. We invited you to meet us in this spirit, promising every concesssion consistent with the preservation of the freedom and purity of elections.

Let us meet on the high grounds of patriotism and statesmanship and discuss this subject of the repeal, modification, and improvement of the election laws disconnected from all other exciting subjects. Do this, and we may be friends forever, and the bitter taunt and defiant threat will die upon our lips and be unheard. But this the majority decline to do while admitting it to be the usual and proper course to pursue. They give us to understand that they have made up their minds unalterably to a different mode of legislation; they propose to repeal or modify to suit themselves, taking no advice and listening to no suggestions from the minority, all the laws which now stand upon the statute-book, having relation to elections, which displease them. They say, "We cannot proceed in the ordinary way, for if we do the republicans may offer amendments which may be acceptable and desirable to some of us, and we may become demoralized and divided, and the President may not be willing to approve our measure, and may use his constitutional prerogative and veto it, and therefore we have agreed outside of this Chamber upon the precise form of words which we will make use of, and to permit no amendment whatever, not even the crossing of a t or the dotting of an i;" and they give notice that this bill, just as they have presented it, must become a law or they will make no appropriations.

This, then, gentlemen of the majority, is your plan of action, and these your motives. You propose to effect this repeal at all hazards when you see that by usual and constitutional methods you may not be able to accomplish it. You threaten danger to the country in the hope and belief that the President perhaps may take counsel of his fears, or, moved by motives of patriotism and to save the country from dire calamity, may sign a measure which his judgment disapproves and his conscience condemns. You demand of us and of the President that we shall be patriotic and for the sake of the country shall yield to what we believe to be unjust and dangerous legislation, while you, forgetful of patriotism, of all duty and love of country, will see the Government die and crumble into ruins if we do not surrender at your demand. It is the highwayman's method, "Your money or your life!" To yield to it were cowardly. Truly, in the presence of such a threat, to use the forcible and expressive, if not elegant, language of the distinguished gentleman from Kentucky, "He who dallies is a dastard and he who doubts is damned."

Mr. Chairman, the issue here presented reopens, and must have been expected and intended by its authors to reopen, the book of our past history and to revive unpleasant and bitter memories. In this they have not been disappointed. In this debate we have heard crimination and recrimination; bitter taunt and bold defiance hurled in vindictive wrath from side to side in this Chamber. Was this necessary at this time? For what reason was the dangerous issue made in this manner and at this time? Is there any public demand for this repeal? Is there such pressing and overmastering necessity for it, that it must be done now, this week, this month, or this year? Is the necessity so pressing and urgent that it will be better to let the Government languish and die of starvation, rather than not secure it? No general election for members of Congress will take place until November, 1880. There will be almost a year of legislative time between the assembling of Congress in the next regular session and that time. In the mean time the laws will be quite harmless.

Mr. Chairman, the motives which precipitated this contest at this time do not find justification in the laws sought to be repealed, for they have now no operation and lie dormant and harmless. There must be found some other motive for this action. I think that motive is well understood by the people of the country.

This quarrel was neither invited nor provoked by the minority. The majority must be held responsible for the consequences which may flow from it. We have nothing to do but to stand to our defense, holding our ground, strengthening our position, and waiting the final assault. We believe we are defending the freedom and purity of the ballot-box, and preserving the bulwarks of republican liberty, and we must not, therefore, surrender.

It has been asserted in this debate that these laws are unconstitutional. To this we have only to reply that the courts have not so declared, and the courts have stood open to all since their enactment. If the laws are unconstitutional they need not be repealed, for the courts will declare them null and void whenever you choose to make the appeal. There is no occasion to shake the country from center to circumference by an exciting and bitter political struggle over an unconstitutional law.

We have been so often alarmed at the false cry of "unconstitutionality" that we cease to believe it at the first sound. Under the shelter of that word great crimes have been committed in this country. Nullification shouted it in South Carolina in 1832. Andrew Jackson, who has been suspected of democratic tendencies, put his heel upon that monster and crushed it. The spirit of nullification has, however, unhappily survived to annoy and distress us and endanger the perpetuity of our Union. That doctrine declared that the Constitution of the United States "is a compact between sovereign States;" that "the States are its authors, their power created it, and their voices clothed it with authority; the Government it formed is in reality their government, and the Union of which it is the bond is a union of States and not of individuals;" that "as the States conferred so States can take away its powers." Nullification died at the hands of Andrew Jackson, the democrat; but its spirit survived and took the name of States rights. In its name have been perpetrated innumerable crimes against the State. It was all-powerful in behalf of slavery, but had no voice in favor of liberty.

In 1861 State rights assumed the new name of secession. That fatal Will-o-the-wisp led the Southern States out of the Union, to desert them at last after the sacrifice of the lives of a million of brave and heroic men and untold wealth in the slough of Appomattox. We had hoped that it had lost all power in this country and would never reappear to afflict and mislead us. It has served no good purpose, voluntarily or intentionally. It has arrayed section against section and done much to prevent this country from becoming a homogeneous and harmonious nation. In the providence of God this foul spirit has been made to render a great service to mankind. It provoked the occasion and provided the opportunity for the abolition of human slavery on this continent, which otherwise might have been perpetuated for centuries. In its insane efforts to make slavery national, which was before only a State crime, it invoked the demon of war in its aid, staked and imperiled all upon the issue of battle. Appomattox was reached, and secession and slavery died together.

On that field the decree went forth that this is a nation deriving all its powers from the people and none from States; possessed of the rights to defend itself against its enemies, foreign and domestic; to compel obedience to its laws constitutionally enacted. It was there decreed that the States were supreme only in subordination to the greater power of the nation and in matters over which the nation had been given no jurisdiction; that nullification and secession were simple rebellion and to be put down as such, even to the dismemberment and annihilation of States if need be, to save the nation's life.

But it seems that that fell spirit still survives. We hear its voice once more in this Hall denying that this great nation has the right to protect the ballot from contamination in national elections. It again raises the cry of "unconstitutionality" when striving to tear away the defenses provided to secure free and pure elections. It again endangers the nation's life. It claims for the States the sole right to regulate elections. It would again dwarf the great Union into the creature and servant of States, obedient to their will and dependent upon them for life.

In face of the facts, not to be denied except by the most brazen effrontery and an utter disregard of truth, that in many States the ballot-box has been almost wholly unprotected against fraud; that ballot-stuffing, kiss-joking, bulldozing, and murder have been wholly unrestrained and unpunished; that great cities, congressional districts, and even States themselves have been captured at the ballot by the means of force, violence, and wrong, the cry of State rights still comes up, that States alone have the right and the power to guard the purity of elections and protect the ballot-box.

We hear it announced that even at a bulldozers' riot at the polls, where men are shot and killed and the ballot-box captured or destroyed, it is only the peace of the State which is broken; that there is no such thing as the peace of the United States, even though upon that peace at the polls the nation's destiny may hang, or its life depend.

Would to God that this fell spirit of discord and sectional strife might cease from troubling us. It is the source of weakness to the nation and poverty and distress to the people of the South. I pray that that day may soon come. Then we may have peace and order and national and individual prosperity. Then will this grand Union of States—each separate State revolving in its appointed orbit, and all moving together in that sublime harmony designed by the fathers, many in one—shine forth as the brightest and grandest constellation that ever adorned the political heavens. All mankind will admire its beauty and harmony.

It can but have been noticed that the advocacy of the repeal of the election laws has come largely if not mainly from gentlemen who represent Southern constituencies, and these gentlemen dwell mainly upon the tyranny and injustice of those sections of the law relating to marshals and deputy marshals. They denounce in unsparing terms the oppression of these marshals. It is said that they dictate to the voters and are electioneering officers for the republican party; that they were created to enable the republican party to carry elections; that they oppress and terrify democratic voters and by their very presence deter honest democrats from voting. I invite the attention of this House while I present a few facts and figures, taken from reliable sources, showing how little real reason these gentlemen have for their bitter complaints and severe denunciations. It is only in cities having 20,000 inhabitants or more where marshals and deputy marshals have been or can be appointed or have jurisdiction.

I turn first to the State of Kentucky, in part so ably represented by the honorable chairman of this committee, [Mr. BLACKBURN.]

The only cities in that State which by the census of 1870 had 20,000 inhabitants are Louisville and Covington. Possibly Lexington, which then had 14,801 inhabitants, and Newport, which then had 15,087 inhabitants, may now have reached the prescribed limit of 20,000.

The gentleman represents the Lexington district. I think I am safe in assuming that in his district there has never been such an officer at an election as a deputy marshal acting under this law. I see that he was elected in 1878 by a vote of 8,632 against 3,548 for a national, and that no republican candidate was in the field. So I infer that marshals and supervisors did not deter many democrats in his district or protect any republican.

In the Louisville district the democratic member [Mr. WILLIS] had to compete with a democrat, a greenbacker, and a republican. He received 9,115 votes; his democratic opponent received 7,492; his greenback opponent received 383; his republican opponent received only 5,500. In this district the democrats got into the ballot-box, in spite of deputy marshals and supervisors, 16,607 votes, while with their aid the republicans only had 5,500. The "God-given democratic liberty to vote early and vote often" was not much abridged here I ween.

The district which includes Covington is represented by the distinguished gentleman [Mr. CARLISLE] who so ably, clearly, and fairly argued the legal and constitutional questions raised in this controversy the other day. He received the whole vote of his city, 949, and in his district 5,901 against 1,877 for a greenbacker.

Here we have displayed the hardships of Kentucky. I do not believe the evidence can be found to show that one man has been deprived of his just rights at the polls by any United States officer. Why, then, this appeal from Kentucky? Why this "gage of battle?" Why this threat of no appropriations?

I do not see the evidence that the gentleman [Mr. BLACKBURN] has borne from this Government an unjust burden of a feather's weight since the war. I hope not. I believe not.

There comes up from Mississippi a cry of oppression. The republican party is denounced in unmeasured terms by gentlemen from that State. And yet in all that State there is not one town or city having a population of twenty thousand; and the law authorizing the use of deputy marshals was never in force within its borders. Mississippi has no republican on this floor. In the last election the republican vote was almost silent in that State. What has become of the former republican voters and republican majorities in that State? A comparison of the congressional vote of Mississippi for the years 1876 and 1878 is worthy of the attention of the House and the country, and may answer the question. It demonstrates, I think, that no law of the United States, no law human or divine, has prevented the democrats in that State from executing their own sweet will. It proves unmistakably that no law of the United States has been sufficient to protect the ballot from race domination, and that the Mississippi plan has held free and undisputed sway.

Upon this showing may we not well inquire what interest have the democrats of Mississippi in repeal? Why this cry of oppression? That republicans have not been converted to the democratic faith, these figures prove; that they have become nationals is not shown; that they have become "scattering," is certain. What voter of the democratic faith has been intimidated or prevented from executing the freeman's will in that State by any United States officer? What republican voter has been so protected while voting unlawfully or, what is more and worse, while voting lawfully?

Gentlemen from Mississippi cannot make this demand for repeal because of any wrong done them or their party in Mississippi, and they must have turned their eyes to the northern cities, to New York, to Chicago, to Cincinnati, and the rest, to States where great cities may overcome the vote of the country districts.

Has Mississippi so conquered the freedom of the ballot in her own borders that her democrats have no occupation at home and seek occupation in other States? Do her shot-guns rust in idleness, and is it proposed to polish them in the service of forcing the Mississippi plan of carrying elections in the northern cities—a few of them—just enough to enable the solid South to declare itself to be the nation?

Mr. Chairman, the language of denunciation which has been uttered upon this floor is without excuse or justification.

Virginia has but three cities within her wide domain which have sufficient population to entitle them to the protection of the marshals and deputy marshals of the United States provided for in the sections proposed to be repealed. They are Richmond, Petersburgh, and Norfolk. Richmond and Norfolk are represented by democrats, and Petersburgh at the last election for Representative in Congress cast 1,571 democratic votes to 1,097 republican votes.

Georgia has possibly three municipalities to which these sections can apply, namely, Savannah, Atlanta, and Augusta. These cities are represented by democrats in this House, and on looking at the Directory the only district in the whole State in which there seems to have been a republican candidate for Congress is the second district, and he received 3,643 votes to 8,116 for the democratic candidate. It does not appear that Georgia has felt the hand of the oppressor, unless indeed the oppression has fallen upon republicans.

Louisiana has one city, New Orleans, where the law was in force, and that city is represented here by two democrats by overwhelming majorities. And yet there comes up from Louisiana the cry of oppression by marshals.

South Carolina has one city which is large enough in population to be entitled to the benefits of these sections—Charleston. The Charleston district in 1876 cast for a republican 18,180 votes, for a democrat 16,661 votes. In 1878 it cast for a democrat, if we may believe the Directory, 22,707 votes, kiss-joker and all, and for a republican 14,096. In the last Congress Mr. Rainey and Mr. Smalls, republicans, represented districts in Congress from that State. The one had a majority of 1,519, and the other a majority of 1,438. In the present Congress these majorities are not only wiped out, but in the former district the democratic majority is 8,611, and in the latter 15,745. The home of nullification and secession, the State where of all places on this continent the United States authority might justly be felt, has been able in spite of this pretended tyranny to elect democrats to this House by majorities startling in magnitude and suggestive of tissue-ballots and all manner of fraud. The history of that State during the election of 1878 is known to the people of this country. It furnishes abundant and overwhelming proof of the necessity of laws to protect the ballot-box and the freedom of the ballot. That the State does not protect its voters is certain, and that the United States should do so is most manifest.

The remaining cities of the South to which the sections under consideration can by any possibility apply are: Mobile, Alabama; Wheeling, West Virginia; Wilmington, North Carolina; Memphis, Tennessee; Nashville, Tennessee; Galveston, Texas; Houston, Texas; Saint Louis, Missouri; Saint Joseph, Missouri; and Baltimore, Maryland. Every southern city, twenty in number, to which these laws can apply is a democratic city. All but one is represented on this floor by a democrat.

Mississippi, Florida, Texas, and Arkansas have neither of them, so far as I know, known the presence of a deputy marshal acting under this law at any election.

I think I need add no further proof that the laws sought to be repealed and so bitterly denounced by southern men have not operated to repress the democratic party in that section of the Union, and that under them no man who has possessed the right to vote has been unlawfully deprived of his right.

Let us for a moment look upon another picture. Possibly we may be convinced that more marshals, deputy marshals, and supervisors, and even a little military power, would be useful. In Caddo Parish, Louisiana, the registered vote was as follows: white voters, 1,496; colored voters, 3,732. At the election in 1878 the democrats cast for member of Congress 1,815 votes, and the republicans cast only 279. At that election voters were made to travel by a change of polling place twenty miles. Three hundred men made that march through swamps and across bayous and back, camping nights and marching days. Two hundred and seventy of these cast their ballots lawfully and peacefully. But at the close of the day "armed white men took possession of the ballot-box, broke it up, and destroyed the ballots, so no return was ever made from that voting place." In the Shreveport district of the same parish the republicans fearing an outbreak largely refrained from voting. At Caledonia two negroes were killed and two whites wounded. In the Natchitoches Parish the population by the State census of 1875 was—whites, 5,907; colored, 15,504. At the election for member of Congress the democrats cast 2,819 votes, and the republicans none. The violence of the whites before the election exiled republican leaders and terrified the voters so that no ticket was placed in nomination. In Tensas Parish the population by the State census of 1875 was—whites, 1,417; colored, 17,100. The vote for member of Congress in 1878 was—democratic, 2,795; republican, 90. In that parish fifteen murders were committed and some died of exposure in the swamps. It is claimed, and there is evidence to prove, that many more, seventy or eighty in all, lost their lives. The treatment of the colored men by white armed desperadoes, if the evidence before the country is half true, was barbarous to the last degree, and in any half-civilized community some punishment would be meted out to the criminals; but it seems that in that community it is crime only in a negro to kill, even if he kill in defense of his own life, while white men who ride twenty miles to kill escape all punishment, and are even lauded for their bravery if they shoot the defenseless and unarmed. Such a civilization would be a disgrace to an Indian tribe. It is brutal and cowardly in all its purposes and methods. No wonder the negro again looks toward the north star as his only hope.

In Concordia Parish the population by the State census of 1875 was: whites, 673; colored, 10,955. The vote for Congressman was: democratic, 1,037; republican, 955. Seven or eight men were killed by white raiders, ballot-boxes were broken up, and violence and crime prevailed. That any republican vote was cast is evidence that the colored men have courage in defense of their opinions. The committee of the Senate who lately investigated these crimes make the following summary. (Senate Report No. 855, Forty-fifth Congress, third session, page 24:)

SUMMARY OF MURDERS AND VIOLENCE.

The examination of the committee, it will be seen, was confined to but seven of the fifty-two parishes of Louisiana. In these seven parishes the evidence shows there were murdered "for political purposes," during the campaign of 1878, John Williams, (page 45;) Robert Williams, (44, 57, 186, 192, 236, 347, 470;) Luke Wiggins, (44, 48;) Lot Clarke, (46, 58, 62;) Billy White, (46, 48, 62;) Greene Abrams, (49;) Josiah Thomas, (58;) Charles Bethel, (192, 236, 337, 347, 561;) William Singleton, (178, 191, 348;) Monday Hill, (186, 192, 236, 347, 469;) Louis Posthelwaite, (186, 347;) Richard Miller, (192, 236, 347;) James Starver, (192, 347, 473;) Commodore Smallwood, (236, 348, 355;) Charlie Carroll, (236, 355;) John Higgins, (278, 348;) "Doc." Smith, (347, 355, 359;) William Hunter, (348;) Hyams Wilson, (348, 355;) Wash Ellis, (348;) Asbury Epps, (244, 348;) John Robinson, (355;) Rufus Mills, (416.) Besides these there were fully as many others murdered whose names the committee were unable to ascertain, whose corpses were seen, by witnesses who testified before the committee, hanging on trees or lying dead in the streets or fields. Dozens more were wounded from shots fired at them with murderous intent, some of whom were present as witnesses before the committee exhibiting their scars; others were whipped or beaten and mutilated; wives were tied up by the thumbs and whipped for refusing to tell where their husbands were secreted; scores of leaders in politics among the colored men were driven from their homes, leaving their crops in the fields and their families unprovided for. In brief, a literal "reign of terror" existed, and in fact still exists, over a considerable portion of Louisiana, as the result of the policy adopted by the democracy for perpetuating its rule in that State.

In view of these facts, the following language employed in his speech in this House on the 3d of the present month by the honorable gentleman who represents a district which includes the parishes of Caddo and Natchitoches seems, to say the least of it, rather remarkable:

Mr. Speaker, this Congress has no power to pass a law regulating any feature of the election laws of the States until it shall be demonstrated that the State or States have failed to provide for elections in the form necessary to secure the perpetuity of our Government. But I assert that no such contingency exists now or did exist when these laws were passed. There is not a State in this Union which does not provide for the holding of free and fair elections for Senators and Representatives in Congress in accordance with the spirit of the Constitution; and if Mr. Madison could behold the spectacle of to-day he would regret the short-sightedness which induced him to say, "the congressional control will very probably never be exercised. The power appears to me satisfactory, and as unlikely to be abused as any part of the Constitution."

I defy the gentlemen on the other side of this House to point me to a State whose system of laws does not provide for the "times, places, and manner" of holding elections for Senators and Representatives. If this cannot be done these laws which we are endeavoring to repeal are usurpations of power.

The presence at the polls in the States of these marshals, supervisors, and troops is in violation of the spirit, if not of the letter, of the Constitution. It is a denial of the ability of the States to maintain the purity and freedom of elections.

The grand jury of a United States court which frames an indictment against an individual for violations of an election law, as well as the district attorney who procures his conviction and the judge who wantonly assumes jurisdiction to which he has no claim, are equally conspirators against the individual and the whole people.

Two separate penal statutes for violation of election laws, two distinct judicial bodies, the one claiming jurisdiction over violations of a Federal statute and the other over violation of the statute of a State, both referring to the same subject-matter, and only the distinction existing that the statute of the State is in harmony with the Constitution, and the Federal statute is a violation of the Constitution, the bastard semblance of a law! This is the picture.

The men who have been arrested without affidavit or warrant for violations of Federal election laws were so arrested and convicted in the face of the very letter of the Constitution; and where they have been convicted and compelled to languish within the walls of a prison, it has been a violation of that liberty of the American citizen which is guaranteed to him under our institutions.

To the States is confided the regulation of elections, and if their laws provide for holding such elections in conformity with the Constitution, Federal statutes could not be passed regulating the same matter. But they have been; and the question is asked, there being a conflict, which must control? Unquestionably that one which is constitutional. Unless the emergency has arisen calling for the exercise of the "ultimate" power of Congress over this matter, laws passed by the latter are mere works of supererogation, and the constitutional statutes of the State must prevail and the jurisdiction of the State courts of offenses against those statutes must be maintained.

It seems that Louisiana will not protect the ballot-box, nor punish men who commit crimes against it and the United States cannot and shall not. This is the end of all elections and of all government by the people. No more dangerous, fatal doctrine was announced even in nullification or secession times. Turning now to South Carolina, let us take a few examples from the pages of her radiant history. The same committee inform us how free and pure the ballot was in the election of 1878 in Charleston and South Carolina:

CHARLESTON CITY, WASHINGTON ENGINE-HOUSE PRECINCT

At Washington engine-house precinct, in ward 6, Charleston City, the voting proceeded quietly all day. Walter Elfe was the republican supervisor and R. M. Wilson the democratic. At this polling place there is every reason to believe that there was a large republican majority. The count was commenced, there being in the room three republicans and from thirty to forty democrats. After a short time the gas went out. Candles were obtained and the count continued a short time longer, when the candles were put out. In the darkness that followed the ballot-box was broken up and the ballots destroyed. The number of votes cast was 865. No return was ever made from this box.

PALMETTO ENGINE-HOUSE PRECINCT.

At the Palmetto engine-house precinct, in ward 3, voting proceeded quietly until about half past three o'clock in the afternoon, when the supervisors called on the deputy marshal to arrest a man who had attempted to vote the second time. At this an attack was made on the supervisor, and his poll list destroyed. Up to that time his poll list showed that there had been 915 votes cast, and his poll list tallied with the poll list of the managers. From that time until six o'clock the supervisor did not keep any poll list. When the vote was canvassed at that poll, it was claimed that there had been 3,569 votes cast. If this number was cast, there must have been cast in two and a half hours 2,654 votes, or at the rate of 17 votes a minute. When the box was opened all agree that there were a great number of tissue tickets in it. These tickets were of very thin paper—so thin that print can be read through the paper; and only $3\frac{5}{8}$ inches in length and $1\frac{3}{4}$ inches wide, while an ordinary ticket is from $7\frac{1}{2}$ inches to $8\frac{1}{2}$ inches in length and from 2 to $2\frac{1}{2}$ inches wide. Just how many tissue tickets were in the box cannot now be exactly determined, because when the committee examined the boxes there were no tickets in this box, although tickets were found in the boxes used at all the other polling places except one. The supervisor swears that just before the poll closed the president of the democratic ward club came to the polls, and the witness says that he distinctly saw him put tissue tickets into the box in packages. The witness protested against this, but the managers said, if there are too many in the box we will not count them. When the box was opened, the witness says that he saw half a dozen packages of those tissue tickets that had never been folded, and they were all counted. The returns gave the democratic candidate for Congress 3,143 votes, and the republican candidate 416.

There was one other polling place in this ward—the Market Hall—at which the republicans are reported as having 121, and the Democrats 1,866; making the total vote of the ward 5,556. The highest vote ever cast in this ward was in 1876, when it cast 1,886.

That it is physically impossible in two and one-half hours to cast over 2,600 votes all must admit; and it becomes the more apparent when it is understood that, by the laws of South Carolina, every voter must be sworn to the effect that he is a voter, that he has not voted elsewhere at that election, &c. The evidence shows that during the day the voters at that poll were sworn, one by one, as they voted; and if from six o'clock in the forenoon to half past three in the afternoon only 915 persons voted, the increase from that time to six o'clock in the evening is more than remarkable.

HOPE ENGINE-HOUSE.

The United States supervisor testified that he did not reach the polling place until the polls had been open twenty minutes; the managers called it thirty, but witness said it was only twenty minutes. The supervisor kept a poll list after he arrived. When the count was made it was found that there were 1,286 names on the manager's list, and but 1,238 votes in the box. The supervisor had on his list (which contained the names of all who voted after half past six o'clock a. m.) 838 names. The poll lists of the republican and the democratic supervisors agreed. When the count was made at the close of voting, there were found in the box 323 tissue democratic tickets; and this number was found remaining in the box when examined by the committee. The tissue tickets were all counted as if honestly cast, and the return was, democratic tickets, 716; republican, 522. It is quite apparent that the difference between the supervisors' lists and the manager's arose from additions being made to the latter to cover the number of tissue tickets fraudulently placed in the box.

SUMTER COUNTY.

In Sumter County tissue tickets were also used; but it appears either that the leaders did not determine to use the tickets in the commencement of the campaign, or that they did not have confidence in their ability to carry the election by their use alone; for the most strenuous efforts were made to frighten the republican leaders from their attempted organization of the republican party. Republican speakers were threatened and maltreated, and republican meetings disturbed and broken up. Whenever and wherever the republicans attempted to hold meetings, the democracy attended in numbers, armed, and insisted on participating in the meeting, and, if refused, were threatening in their manner.

On the 12th of October the republicans attempted to hold a meeting at Sumter, the county seat. The democrats also called a meeting at the same time and place. The call for the democratic meeting was not issued until after that of the republican meeting. On the day of the meeting the democrats appeared in great numbers on horseback and on foot, armed and accompanied by an artillery company with two field-pieces. The democrats presented a programme to the republicans for division of time, but the republicans declined, and held their meeting some distance from where the democratic meeting was held. The republican meeting was not well attended, as many had feared to attend on account of the presence of the mounted and armed democrats.

Mr. Moise, a democratic witness, introduced by the minority of the committee, testified that the number at the republican meeting was about five hundred; that there were present in the town about two thousand white democrats, and among them between five and eight hundred armed cavalrymen. He said as the republicans were returning to the town after the meeting adjourned, with a band of music, and the national flag flying as they passed, about sixty of the red-shirt democracy in attendance became excited, and, leaving the democratic meeting, went after the republican procession. At once the cry was raised that there was to be a riot. The democrats loaded the cannon with nails, and ran it out for action. It does not appear that the colored republicans had in any manner interfered with the democrats. Mr. Moise says that the young men in the democratic party were excited at the sight of the American flag, which, he declared, was an unpopular emblem in that part of the country. He said the republicans carried the American flag at their meetings, and the democrats did not. Speaking of the national flag, he said: "When they see it at a republican meeting, where it is an emblem of oppression, it excites them. I hope it will be otherwise some time." He also testified that the colored people became very much excited; they were unarmed and did not appear to know what to do. The American flag was pulled down, but it is not clear whether it was taken down by the whites or the colored people.

It was under difficulties of this character that the republicans carried on the campaign. One witness says that every man who took a prominent part was menaced.

Tissue tickets appear to have been used in much the same way they were in Charleston County.

It is not strange that, with intimidation and threats, and the use of tissue tickets, the democrats were able to secure the returns in their favor, although the colored people are more than twice as numerous in Sumter County as the whites.

These crimes against the freedom and purity of the ballot not only find no punishment under the laws of South Carolina, but it seems that the majority of this House have determined that they shall be in no danger of punishment under any law of the United States. The laws of that State permitting votes to be thrown out to make the ballots and names on the lists agree seems to have invited if it was not intended to promote the tissue-ballot system. The small, delicate tissue ballots would never be thrown out by a blindfolded democrat intent on his business of securing a democratic majority, so long as his fingers could detect the difference between the ordinary large ballot such as must be used in voting and the tissue ballot. Are these villainies to find no condemnation in Congress, and shall all laws for their prevention be wiped from the statute-book?

The people of this country understand that this Congress is held here by no dire pressing public necessity, that these election laws are now merely silent and inoperative and cannot be called into exercise again until November, 1880, and that there is ample time for their modification and repeal before that period arrives, and that they hurt nobody and help nobody. They also see that the democratic party has not been repressed or hindered by these laws. They see that the South is a solid unit of democratic power. They see also that republican majorities at the South have fallen before violence, fraud, and crime. They also see that all this excitement and ill-temper has a political motive and origin, and that it finds its spring and fountain in the determination to secure a national democratic victory in 1880. They understand figures and statistics. They will turn to the election records and find that in 1876 the State of New York was carried for Tilden by a majority of only 32,742 in a vote of 1,011,156, and that the city of New York gave Tilden a majority of 53,979, and that the majority for Hayes in the State outside of New York City was 21,237. And they will know what these figures mean—which is that in order to carry the Empire State in 1880, and to be sure of it, the majority in the city must be increased, and that this cannot be done unless the laws preserving purity at elections in that great and corrupt city are wiped away that Tammany and some new Tweed may have undisputed sway.

They will look at Ohio and find that the majority for Mr. Hayes was only 2,747. They will find that the combined vote of the two counties, which include the cities of Cincinnati and Cleveland, was for Hayes 47,067 and for Tilden 43,876, giving a majority for Hayes of 3,191. They will see that this great quarrel about the election laws comes from these merest mathematical calculations. How to wipe out this majority of less than three thousand will be seen to be the question. The democratic eye is on Ohio and that small republican majority, and upon the cities of Cincinnati and Cleveland. If they can carry New York and wipe out the republican majority in Cleveland or increase the democratic majority in Cincinnati, they feel sure of a democratic majority and a southern victory. Philadelphia and Chicago are not overlooked. No city is overlooked by them which contains the materials of which repeaters and fraudulent voters are made.

Repeal the election laws and let loose the hordes of unnaturalized aliens and the criminal classes who congregate in great cities, and with some Tilden to organize a campaign and some Tweed to execute the plan, fraud and a solid South might bid high on a victory in 1880. That such is the true and real issue of this hour the people see and know full well, and no professions of zeal for a free and pure ballot from a party whose hope lies so largely in unrestrained fraud will deceive them.

This contest, this challenge, and this defiance, and these vindictive threats so out of season and so uncalled-for by any great public exigency or demand are not the offspring of a desire for a free and a pure election. They mean democratic domination in the nation at all and every hazard, southern domination in democratic councils, and so southern supremacy as of old.

To secure this end it is proposed to introduce southern tactics in elections into Northern States. In other words, State rights is about to be made to mean what it did of old, namely, that the Southern States shall force their laws, customs, and habits upon all the States. This is no new crusade. Slavery, a creature of State law, was safe under State constitutions, was protected also by the Constitution of the United States, and was possessed of an empire far beyond its wants or its capacity to people or develop. But it was not content with that; it demanded that other States and other people should respect and obey its laws and recognize the right of property in man, and that the spirit of liberty should be obedient to its will. The South demanded the right to capture fugitive slaves under the shadow of Fanuiel Hall and Bunker Hill and return them to bondage, and the demand was complied with, in shame be it said. Boston, Massachusetts, out of regard to the Constitution of the United States, allowed the crime to be committed and submitted to indignity and studied insult for the sake of peace and Union from a people who have since shown that neither Constitution nor Union were second in their love to slavery. The South claimed the right to plant the accursed thing upon the virgin soil of the Republic everywhere and to extend their laws and civilization to the remotest limits of national jurisdiction.

The attempt to rule all failed and drew after it sorrow and ruin. The attempt to transplant the southern system of carrying elections to northern soil will fail also and bring disaster to those who attempt it. There is at the North no feeble race—children of oppression and wrong—who have learned to tremble and crouch when a master frowns, who can be disfranchised and beaten and driven from the polls. All are freemen and "know their rights, and knowing dare maintain." It cannot be done. The liberty-loving people of the North and the West, from Atlantic to Pacific, will insist that the ballot shall be pure and that it shall be free, and to secure these they hold that all the power of the State and nation is pledged forever.

Again, I say to gentlemen on the other side who profess such zeal in behalf of the freedom of elections and the purity of the ballot, we are no less earnest than you and we will meet you in a friendly spirit, and will sit down with you to improve these laws where they are imperfect; we will repeal what is obsolete and useless; we will modify what is offensive or oppressive; we will strengthen what is weak or ineffectual; and we will provide swift and adequate punishment for all who may infringe upon the right of the citizen or corrupt the ballot-box, be he marshal, deputy marshal, or supervisor, or be he bulldozer, white-leaguer, ballot-stuffer, or tissue-ballot monger, and be he black or white, republican or democrat. To secure the peace, order, freedom, and purity of the ballot we will act with you and vote with you. But if the opposite is your purpose we must continue sternly and firmly to oppose you and resist you. The choice is yours, and the responsibility must be yours also.

Before taking my seat I desire again to remind gentlemen on the other side of this Chamber that if hard language has been made use of in this debate toward them, and if unkind references to the past have been indulged in by gentlemen on this side of the House, the occasion was sought and the provocation given by the majority and not by us. Gentlemen on the other side who, since they laid down their arms at the close of the war and gave over their effort to destroy this Union, have received nothing from the republican Administration and the republican party but forbearance, forgiveness, and restoration to forfeited rights, have risen in their places and with studied vindictiveness have denounced the men who saved the nation from overthrow and the laws enacted and the measures adopted by them for the purpose of restoring peace and prosperity and securing liberty to all the people. One gentleman has gone so far as to suggest that the crime was not in secession but in saving the Union.

Do gentlemen, after seeking and forcing the occasion for sectional controversy and pouring upon our heads the vials of their sectional wrath, expect us to remain silent and make no reply? It is not in human nature, nor does it comport with a manly self-respect. The republicans have, no doubt, made some errors in their efforts to save and restore the Union. They dealt with great problems and had no precedents for their guidance, for the history of the world has furnished none. But when taunted and denounced for such errors, or pretended errors, by the men who engaged and persisted to the end in the work of national destruction, we can but retort that the errors of the republican party were committed in the effort to prevent the consummation of your crime. We have shown our willingness to pardon and forgive you, and your presence here is evidence overwhelming that that pardon and forgiveness have been complete and unreserved. Can you not find it in your hearts to pardon real or fancied errors committed in the great and unexampled work of saving and restoring? If not, a sad mistake has been made and the doors of this Capitol have been opened to you all too soon. As illustrative of what I am saying I desire to quote a few words from the speech made on the Army bill on the 1st instant by the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. CHALMERS.] In speaking of this Government he said that—

> To us who know it as it is, as it has been consolidated by republican usurpation, as it has been administered by republican despots, it is the strongest and the mightiest government on earth. A British ministry would have been driven from power, a British king might have been decapitated for far less usurpations than have been made by the republican party during the last eighteen years.

Again, he says:

> This Government for the last eighteen years has been reeling like a drunken man. It has rocked like a ship at sea without chart, compass, or rudder. The unbridled will of a mere despotic majority has bid defiance to law and Constitution. Bribery and corruption have held high carnival in the Halls of Congress, and reckless and criminal extravagance have permeated every branch of the Government. It is time that the old ship was righted up; that the officers and crew, drunk with power, debauched by the continuance of licentious indulgences, should be driven out and replaced by purer and better men.

He also used this most remarkable language:

> But the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] indulged in another historical reference to which I propose briefly to reply. After telling us there were two methods of destroying this Government without firing a hostile gun—one by the refusal to elect Representatives and Senators, and the other by the refusal of those Representatives to pass appropriation bills when they were elected—he said that the first method had been honorably attempted by the southern democrats in 1861, and that the other was now being dishonorably attempted by the united democracy in 1879. He said that because the republican party saw fit to elect a President of its own choice the southern democrats threatened to shoot the Union to death. Sir, we made no such threats, and the gentleman is as far from the truth of history when he makes this statement as he was when he charged that the democracy in 1864 advocated the clause in the law which we now seek to repeal. We claimed the right of peaceable secession, and for causes deemed sufficient to us we attempted peaceably to secede. Every son of the South who held a position here or in the Army or in the Navy gave it up. They turned over their commands to the United States Government. They settled their accounts to the uttermost farthing peaceably and honorably. We not only made no threats "to shoot the Union to death," but we said to you as the patriarch Abram said to Lot, let there be no strife between thee and me, you may go to the North and we will go to the South. But it was you who said to us you shall not go. You sent grand armies after us. You hemmed us in by land and by sea. You not only threatened to shoot, but you shot us to death. With the battle-cry upon your lips of "The Constitution as it is and the Union as it was," you rallied the whole North without regard to party in defense of the old flag, and when the battle was won you tore off the veil that covered your hideous deformity; you dissolved the Union that you had saved; you changed the Constitution of our fathers for which you had pretended to fight; you changed State sovereignties into military provinces; you converted the constitutional Union by usurpation into almost a military despotism presided over by a successful military chieftain. You organized returning boards that stole State governments and ended in stealing the Presidency itself.

Who are the republican despots here intended, who the usurper? Has any republican President filled that high office who was not first declared entitled to it by the sanctions of law? Abraham Lincoln is the man at whose memory the gentleman's poisoned shafts are aimed. He was the great representative republican leader of his time. As the head of this nation, he reflected the sentiments and executed the will of the loyal people of this country. He signed the great proclamation which gave freedom to four millions of bondmen—not hastily and in wrath, but only after all hope and the dream of saving the Union as it was had fled forever, and the slave-masters had forfeited by their treason not only their right to property in man but to property in anything, and even to life and liberty. He carried the war to a successful and glorious conclusion, and was permitted to see the day of final victory. His was the purest life, his is the fairest fame of modern times, and no accusations now of despotism, usurpation, or tyranny from that gentleman can sully either.

He wore no veil to cover any hideous deformity of aim or purpose. He did not dissolve the Union or permit it to be dissolved; and if he permitted, caused, or aided in the change of the Constitution, it was that liberty should be established forever. He was the great republican leader, and the gentleman cannot denounce the acts and measures of the republican party without reflecting upon him. Every great act of the party during his life bears the stamp and impress of his authority. He was the embodiment at once of august power and angelic gentleness, of unconquerable will and unswerving justice. He let fall no blow upon the heads of the rebellious children of the Republic without a pang of sorrow and regret. He never failed to hold high and far-extended the olive branch of peace. The promise of forgiveness, pardon, and restoration, on condition of submission to law and return to duty, was forever on his lips. When he died the world wept. His goodness and his greatness are universally acknowledged. His fame is safe in the keeping of impartial history. To call him a despot, a tyrant, or a usurper, or to impute to him deception or treachery is to shock the moral sense of all honest men. The witness is discredited; for being false in this thing, the greatest of all his accusations, we cannot accept his statements in anything.

Mr. HAZELTON obtained the floor.

Mr. YOUNG, of Ohio. I ask the gentleman whether he has any objection to allowing me to offer an amendment to the bill now being discussed in the Committee of the Whole?

Mr. HAZELTON. I cannot yield for any such purpose.

Mr. YOUNG, of Ohio. It will take but a moment.

Mr. HAZELTON. You can attend to this greenback mattter on another occasion.

Mr. YOUNG, of Ohio. I give notice, then, that I shall offer the amendment when I have the opportunity to do so.

Mr. HAZELTON. Mr. Chairman, this debate will be long memorable in the history of this country for its peculiar characteristics and for the wide range which it has taken, for its bold and manly assertion of constitutional rights, for the conflict of opinion over the nature and powers of the Government itself, which it shows still exists, which we supposed had been settled and settled forever by a hundred years of adjudications by the courts, by national debate, by the standard authorities upon constitutional law, and, more than all, by the victories of our armies on a hundred battle-fields. But we have seen during the progress of the debate over the Army appropriation bill, and the one under immediate discussion, here and there a flash from the smoldering fires of the rebellion; we have heard here and there an utterance in justification of secession, here and there the old assumption of State rights renewed; and we have heard, sir, during this debate, and outside of all questions involved in it, and neither germane nor profitable, and forced upon it without excuse or justification, the utterances of a little band of so-called "nationals" upon questions of financial policy. To me they seem to stand here, sir, in this hour of public peril with the drawn dagger of repudiation in their hands attempting to stab the nation's credit and the nation's honor—apparently they have no higher mission to perform. If they have a cause which will bear investigation; if they have a cause which can go before the country on its merits, let them bring it here on its merits and not undertake to thrust it into the solemnities of this debate, where it is as much out of place as the idle chatterings of some maudlin individual at a funeral ceremony. Why, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GILLETTE] comes here and tells us that we want a billion of greenbacks issued because ten heifers in his district were sold a week ago for $2 apiece. [Laughter.] Let me tell the gentleman from Iowa that perhaps he does not want so much a greater issue of greenbacks as he does a less issue of heifers in his district. [Laughter.]

Mr. PRICE. Name the gentleman from Iowa to whom you refer.

Mr. HAZELTON. I refer to Mr. GILLETTE, of Iowa.

Mr. GILLETTE. Will the gentleman allow Mr. GILLETTE to make one correction?

Mr. HAZELTON. Certainly. If I have made any misstatement, I would be glad to be corrected.

Mr. GILLETTE. I made no such proposition as the gentleman states.

Mr. HAZELTON. I beg the gentleman's pardon, Mr. Chairman. I supposed he was of that little band here who are knotted together in one great purpose and who, so far as the philosophy of finance is concerned, as against Hamilton and the great men of this nation, would not be able to run a peanut-stand one week without bankruptcy.

I do not wish to misrepresent the gentlemen under any circumstances; but when they drag into this debate subjects so foreign to it—a debate that involves the life as we claim of the Government, a debate that involves a free and an honest ballot for all time, upon which the liberties of this country must rest or fall—I cannot refrain from reminding them of the position of John Hancock in the continental congress on the question as to whether his property with that of other citizens should be burned in order to prevent the British army from occupying the city of Boston. He said:

> If it be necessary to save the liberties of this country; if it will subserve the cause of the colonies, then burn Boston and make John Hancock a beggar.

Go and learn from him what there is involved in this great question. Learn that there are sometimes in the history of nations questions of higher importance to be considered and determined than those of dollars and cents or the price of heifers in Iowa.

STATE RIGHTS AND NATIONAL RIGHTS—A "FREE BALLOT" OR AN HONEST BALLOT.

Now, Mr. Chairman, so far as this debate is concerned, I look upon it as resting in just this class of issues: an issue between State rights and a so-called "free ballot," and national rights and an honest ballot. The question is whether a State shall control the ballot-boxes of this nation in national elections at all times and under all circumstances, or whether the nation itself, when the States prove incompetent or unfaithful, can reach down to the ballot-box and protect it as a means of preserving its own life and perpetuating its power—whether legitimate Federal authority shall be subverted and driven from the States forever; and beyond that comes the great question of fact, whether in all parts of this land we are capable of self-government to such an extent that we can leave the ballot-boxes of the country without any guardianship, without any supervision by the Federal Government. If we can, that is the end of this question; if we cannot, then I insist that the necessities of the case warrant the exercise of that power, and warrant the maintenance of all the safeguards which now surround the ballot-box, and which were created by the legislation of the General Government.

POLITICAL JURIES.

Now, before I proceed to consider the questions of the power of the Government and the necessity of exercising it, I desire to call the attention of the House and the country to one provision of this proposed legislation, and to enter my most solemn protest against its enactment as a law of the land. I know that it cannot be successfully vindicated and defended before the people of the North, however it may be regarded in other parts of the country; and that it may be seen and read of all men I give it in the language of the bill under consideration:

> And that all such jurors, grand and petit, including those summoned during the session of the court, shall be publicly drawn from a box containing the names of not less than three hundred persons possessing the qualifications prescribed in section 800 of the Revised Statutes, which names shall have been placed therein by the clerk of such court and a commissioner, to be appointed by the judge thereof, which commissioner shall be a citizen residing in the district in which such court is held, of good standing and a well-known member of the principal political party opposing that to which the clerk may belong, the clerk and said commissioner each to place one name in said box alternately until the whole number required shall be placed therein.

This is the way juries are to be made up in the Federal courts in the future if this shall become a law. This scheme is a wanton innovation upon the practice and the law governing the jury-box since courts began or civilization has been known among men. This scheme places down in the jury-box, which should be unbiased and free from prejudice for or against either party to a suit, the conflicts, the contentions, the uncertainties, and prejudices engendered by political strife. It makes every jury-box in the United States courts a political jury-box, nothing more and nothing less; and in that shape, and constructed as contemplated by this bill, must undermine and finally destroy a judicial system which has stood the test of a hundred years. I challenge you to find—and you are able men—a precedent for this pernicious scheme, this innovation upon well-established law and usage, in the history of this Government from its organization down to this hour, or in the common or statute law of England. I regard it as a blow at the dearest liberties we enjoy, and such a law if carried fully into effect will destroy the efficiency and the purity of American jurisprudence. Stand upon it if you will, and go to the people of this country upon the position that in the jury-boxes of our Federal courts shall be placed the political contentions that have almost rent the Government itself asunder.

Mr. TALBOTT. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him one question?

Mr. HAZELTON. Yes, sir; I yield for a question.

Mr. TALBOTT. Would it not be better to have on a panel six of each side than to have all on one side?

Mr. HAZELTON. How can they agree in that case? If you want a jury not to agree that is a mighty good jury for you; if you want a jury to agree upon a question of title to property, upon a question of personal liberty, upon a question of personal rights, then you have no jury at all. It is something unknown to the jurisdiction of any country on earth to have a jury of six of one political party and six of another political party selected, not by accident, but selected for the very purpose of defeating justice; selected to render the entire jurisprudence of that court an absolute uncertainty.

Suppose you put two judges on the bench, one democratic and the other republican; one chosen because he is a democrat and the other because he is a republican, and then bring a question before them with the understanding that the democrat is to stand by his side and the republican by his, and you have undermined the whole power of your courts.

CONSTITUTIONAL POWER OF THE GENERAL GOVERNMENT TO CONTROL NATIONAL ELECTIONS.

Now I return, Mr. Chairman, to the question of the power of this Government under article 1, section 4, of the Constitution, which is as follows:

> The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators—to control the national elections whenever a necessity shall arise for so doing. And in this debate we on this side of the Chamber ought to show the necessity to a reasonable extent to vindicate the position we have assumed on the merits of this proposed legislation. Saying nothing about the revolutionary question that has arisen—the question of method—it is fair for us to show that there are places in this country where it is not safe to-day to leave the ballot-box to the exclusive control of local authority, for that authority either can not or will not protect and maintain the rights of all the citizens and the purity and fairness of the elections.

The fathers, when they framed and adopted that section of the Constitution which provides for the times, places, and manner of electing Representatives and Senators, understood and foresaw that in the future of this country might arise a necessity for the exercise of this very power by the nation, and they provided that wherever an exigency should occur; whenever a State should prove unfaithful to the trust they gave it; whenever a State should be guilty of bad faith in the execution of this power and in the conduct of elections for the officers therein mentioned, then it should be the province of the General Government to assume and exercise that power at her own will and for her own benefit.

There is no power clearer in the Constitution of the United States than the right of this Government to control the election of its national officers, of its national representatives. There is no power given, from the preamble to the end, more distinct, more complete, and more unlimited than that which vests this nation with the authority of controlling and protecting the sources of its own life by prescribing, if need be, the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Representatives and Senators and the enforcement of its conditions by the constitutional power of the Government—always by the civil arm if adequate, but when not, by the military arm.

The district judge of Western Virginia, a democrat, when one of these questions came before him, I am reliably informed, decided that the General Government could furnish the ballot-boxes, if need be, for such elections, and could control them absolutely.

Mr. THOMAS TURNER. Will the gentleman inform us where that decision is to be found?

Mr. HAZELTON. Yes, on Judge Jackson's record.

Mr. THOMAS TURNER. No, tell us where it is to be found.

Mr. HAZELTON. In Judge Jackson's decisions. If you want it you can go down there and get it.

THIS QUESTION NOT A NEW ONE—IT WAS FULLY CONSIDERED IN THE CONVENTION THAT FRAMED OUR CONSTITUTION AND IN THE STATE CONVENTIONS THAT VOTED ON ITS ADOPTION.

But I have an authority at hand as high as any known to our judicial writings, commenting on and giving construction to the power in question. I will read from Story on the Constitution, first volume, page 566, but before I read let me say that in the convention of 1787 for the formation of the Constitution, and in the conventions of the States considering the question of its adoption, a debate arose upon this very question. It resolved itself into this shape: first, whether this power should be vested in the State Legislature; second whether it should be vested in the National Legislature; and third, whether it should be primarily in the State Legislature and ultimately in the National Legislature; and never in the debates in the States upon the adoption of the Constitution, never in a single debate in the national convention or in any State convention adopting this Constitution, was it denied that if this article as it now is should be adopted that it carried unlimited power over the elections for Representatives and Senators to the hands of Congress.

The question under consideration and debate there was whether they should adopt the first, second, or third proposition; and adopting the third they conceded that Congress could at its discretion make regulations of its own or alter those prescribed by the Legislature of the State as to the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives. What other language could be employed by man to extend this power? What other word could be added to make it more absolute? What is left after conferring this power as to "times, places, and manner of holding elections?" These words comprise and comprehend it all. Under this power "the Congress" can by law prescribe when the election shall be held; it does so now. It can prescribe how registrations shall be made, what kind of ballot-boxes shall be used, how inspectors of the election shall be appointed, their duties and their oath, how returns of elections shall be made.

JUDGE STORY'S OPINION.

Mr. Justice Story points out the danger of lodging this power wholly within a State Legislature as follows:

> In answer to all such reasoning it was argued that there was not a single article in the whole system more completely defensible. Its propriety rested upon this plain proposition, that every government ought to contain in itself the means of its own preservation. If in the Constitution there were some departures from this principle (as it might be admitted there were) they were matters of regret, and dictated by a controlling moral or political necessity, and they ought not to be extended. It was obviously impracticable to frame and insert in the Constitution an election law which would be applicable to all possible changes in the situation of the country and convenient for all the States. A discretionary power over elections must be vested somewhere; there seemed but three ways in which it could be reasonably organized. It might be lodged either wholly in the National Legislature; or wholly in the State Legislatures; or primarily in the latter and ultimately in the former. The last was the mode adopted by the convention. The regulation of elections is submitted in the first instance to the local governments, which in ordinary cases, and when no improper views prevail, may both conveniently and satisfactorily be by them exercised. But in extraordinary circumstances the power is reserved to the National Government, so that it may not be abused, and thus hazard the safety and permanence of the Union. Nor let it be thought that such an occurrence is wholly imaginary. It is a known fact that under the Confederation Rhode Island, at a very critical period, withdrew her delegates from Congress and thus prevented some important measures from being carried.

Again he says:

Nothing can be more evident than that an exclusive power in the State Legislatures to regulate elections for the National Government would leave the existence of the Union entirely at their mercy. They could at any time annihilate it by neglecting to provide for the choice of persons to administer its affairs.

And again:

Besides there will be occasions in which the people will be excited to undue resentments against the National Government. With so effectual a weapon in their hands as exclusive power of regulating elections for the National Government, the combination of a few men in some of the large States might by seizing the opportunity of some casual disaffection among the people accomplish the destruction of the Union.

ALEXANDER HAMILTON'S OPINION.

Mr. Hamilton, in No. 49 of the Federalist, which paper is referred to in this volume from which I have read, takes the same position and declares that the propriety of this plan rests upon the evidence of this plain proposition: that "every government ought to contain in itself the means of its own preservation;" and adds "nothing can be more evident than that an exclusive power of regulating elections for the National Government in the hands of the State Legislatures would leave the existence of the Union entirely at their mercy."

Now that power being lodged in the Constitution, how shall it be exercised as a question of power? There is a wide difference between the exercise of a power and the power itself. Can there be any question about the power of this Government to execute its own laws? If it makes a law under that power which shall be met by any kind of force that will overthrow the civil power of the Government employed to carry it into effect, overpowering completely the civil machinery of the Government, can there be any doubt then about the power of this Government to employ the military arm to carry its laws into effect? Is there any spot, I ask you, under the flag or under the jurisdiction of our laws, where fraud can set itself up, where riot and insurrection and violence can defy the power of the Government? Yet you have taken that position here to-day and throughout this long debate. On the other side of the Chamber the whole weight of the argument is that at the polls threatened riot, actual riot, insurrection, invasion may occur, and the General Government shall have no power to meet them. Everywhere but at the polls, every day but election day, the strong arm of the nation's power can confront and move upon riot and disorder and reduce it to submission, but you propose to legislate that at the polls the Government shall not be permitted to suppress riot or keep the peace.

RELATION OF THE MILITARY TO THE CIVIL POWER.

We obtain the principle of law from the English government that whenever our civil power is overwhelmed, whenever it becomes paralyzed, whenever it is overcome by riot, by invasion, by insurrection, by any combination of wrong stronger than the civil power, then the civil power may use the posse comitatus, and that posse comitatus may be the Army itself as much as the citizen.

During the riots at Westminster and Guildhall, at the time that the dwelling of Lord Mansfield was burned, at the time that riot held possession of the city and the civil power was prostrate before it, the question came up in the House of Lords as to the use of the army as a posse comitatus to put down that riot, insurrection, or whatever it might be called. Lord Mansfield laid down this principle, which is the law of America to-day:

LORD MANSFIELD ON THE USE OF MILITARY TO SUPPRESS RIOTS AND KEEP THE PEACE.

These several positions I take to be incontrovertible. A private man, if he sees a person committing an unlawful act, more particularly an act amounting to a violent breach of the peace, felony, or treason, may apprehend the offender, and in his attempt to apprehend him may use force to compel him, not to submit to him but to the law. What a private man may do a magistrate or peace-officer may clearly undertake, and, according to the necessity of the case arising from the danger to be apprehended, any number of men assembled or called together for the purpose are justified to perform. This doctrine I take to be clear and indisputable, with all the possible consequences which can flow from it, and to be the true foundation for calling in of the military power to assist in quelling the late riots.

The persons who assisted in the suppression of these riots and tumults in contemplation of law, are to be considered as mere private individuals, acting according to law, and upon any abuse of the legal power with which they were invested are amenable to the laws of their country. For instance, supposing a soldier, or any other military person, who acted in the course of the late riots had exceeded the powers with which he was invested, I have not a single doubt but he is liable to be tried and punished, not by martial law, but by the common and statute law of the realm; consequently the false idea that we are living under a military government, or that the military have any more power or other power since the commencement of the riots, is the point which I rose to refute, and on that ground to remove those idle and ill-founded apprehensions that any part of the laws or the constitution are either suspended or have been dispensed with.

* * * * * * *

On the whole, my lords, while I deprecate and sincerely lament the cause which rendered it indespensably necessary to call out the military to assist in the suppression of the late disturbances, I am clearly of opinion that no steps have been taken which were not strictly legal as well as fully justifiable in point of policy. Certainly the civil powers, whether through native imbecility, through neglect, or the very formidable force they would have been obliged to contend with, were unequal to the task of suppressing the riots and putting an end to the insurrection. The rabble had augmented their numbers by setting the felons at liberty. If the military had not been called in none of your lordships can hesitate to agree with me that within a very few hours the capitol would have been in flames, and shortly reduced to a heap of rubbish. The king's prerogative is clearly out of the question. His majesty and those who have advised him have acted strictly conformable to law. The military have been called in, and very wisely called in, not as soldiers but as citizens, no matter whether their coats be red or brown; they have been called in aid of the laws, not to subvert them or overturn the constitution, but to preserve both.—Hansard's Parliamentory History, column 695.

A DEMOCRATIC AUTHORITY—JAMES BUCHANAN.

And now, turning from this authority—these pages that contain the thoughts and sentiments of the greatest of all English jurists, I call the attention of the democracy to an authority which I hold in my hand. It is an authority which to them ought to be conclusive upon the question of the power of the General Government to use the Army, if necessary, at the polls. My own position is this: that while I believe this Government has the authority to use the Army when the civil power is insufficient for the execution of the law as against violence, still I do not believe in ballot-boxes that shall for any long period of time rest upon the power of bayonets. But I maintain that there is no spot in this Republic, either at the polls or elsewhere, where a riot, invasion, or insurrection exists, overpowering civil authority, that the Government may not interfere, if necessary, by the military power and suppress it.

You Representatives remember the old Kansas times; you remember James Buchanan. He is a household god with many of you. He was a good lawyer, if he was not a patriot. He understood in some respects the power and the necessity for the power of the Government to execute its laws, at least at the ballot-box in Kansas. In reply to the Silliman letter, written from Connecticut away back in Kansas times, Buchanan lays down this as his sworn and imperative duty:

The convention [in Kansas] will soon assemble to perform the solemn duty of framing a constitution for themselves and their posterity. And in the state of incipient rebellion which still exists in Kansas, it is my imperative duty to employ the troops of the United States should it become necessary in defending the convention against violence while framing the constitution, and in protecting the bona fide inhabitants qualified to vote under the provisions of that instrument in the free exercise of the right of suffrage when it shall be submitted to them for their approbation or rejection.

That is the doctrine of James Buchanan.

STATE LAWS ON THE SUBJECT.

Again, there is not a State in this Union where its commander-in-chief cannot approach the polls by military force to put down any insurrection or riot that may exist there. The law of my State makes this very exception, which was referred to the other day by my colleague, Mr. BRAGG, in reply to my colleague, Mr. CASWELL. Our law contains this very exception with reference to insurrection or riot; and in such cases the military power of the State may be used even at the polls for the purpose of putting down such unlawful opposition and in maintaining the supremacy of the law. Virginia has substantially the same law; Kentucky also; all the States of the Union have provisions of this kind, so far as I can learn, and may exercise the power whenever the emergency arises. Now, why shall not this Government of our fathers, why shall not the national sovereignty have the same power, the same right to compel the enforcement of its laws for national purposes that the State has within State jurisdiction for State purposes?

ENGLISH LAWS.

But it has been claimed, sir, on the other side of this Chamber, during the debate on the Army bill, at least by indirection, that riot and insurrection and unlawful combinations of bad men taking the civil law into their own hands can bear sway with impunity at the polls, overwhelming the civil power and trampling it under foot, and that the military forces of England, under the restraining power of a statute one hundred years old, dare not approach the scene of violence, but must remain four miles away. The proposition is a monstrosity. No such law ever existed or could exist in any government upon any other theory than that peace was to exist as a matter of fact at the polls without the intervention of the military. That law must have presupposed a condition of peace and tranquillity at the polls—a full, free, fair, and safe opportunity for every qualified elector of the borough to express his political sentiments and execute his will by his ballot. It presupposed an honest ballot, an honest count, and an honest return—all this—but it never contemplated that when the English army should move out from the polling precincts, rifle clubs, white-liners, red-shirts and white-shirts, bulldozers and defrauders, armed to the teeth, should move in. There is no spot on English territory where armed violence can take undisputed possession, can take the civil law into its own hands, and not invite and receive the whole military and civil power of that government, if necessary, to quell and suppress it. All the world knows that within the limits of her home government, and wherever you find an English colony, on continent or on the islands of the sea; wherever she erects an altar or unfurls the flag of her empire, she asserts and maintains the supremacy of her civil law, and always by the aid of the military power, whenever that law is prostrated by rebellion, by insurrection, by domestic violence, or by any combination of bad men.

KINGS AND COMMONS.

My friend from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] claims that he has found a justification in English history for the position now assumed by the other side of this Chamber in withholding supplies from our Army and the legislative, judicial, and executive departments of the Government. He goes back to the great contest between the Stuarts and the Commons in Parliament assembled, and claims that he and his associates are the Commons and we the King. The distinguished gentleman must not forget his origin. The cavaliers landed at Jamestown and not at Plymouth Rock. The Commons resisted a royal prerogative, claimed as a "divine right;" the distinguished gentleman from Virginia threatens the constitutional prerogative of the President conferred by a free people. The Commons registered a protest, in which "they asserted that the enactment of laws, the assent to taxes, and the rights and privileges of Parliament were inherent rights of every Englishman." This they asked and no more. The Congress of this nation having all these rights secured and unimpaired, the gentleman would convert it into a legislative despotism more intolerable even than the encroachments of the King. The Commons withheld supplies from the army of a tyrant; he withholds sustenance from the army of the people—freedom's army. They withheld supplies that they might compel the surrender of certain rights and privileges which the King arrogated to himself alone. In this contest the Executive usurps no right, nor exercises any that is not vested in him by the Constitution which he has taken an oath to support, and which has been exercised by every President of the Republic from the days of Washington. They would destroy a king that they might destroy his unnatural prerogative; you would destroy a government rather than not repeal a law that you as a party helped create.

NECESSITY OF NATIONAL SUPERVISION OF NATIONAL ELECTIONS—STATES DO NOT ALWAYS ESTABLISH AND MAINTAIN JUSTICE.

Now, sir, I desire to show the necessity of maintaining these laws enacted for the protection of the national elections. Have all the States performed their duty in the exercise of this power which is intrusted to them? Have their Legislatures all prescribed in good faith the "places and manner" of holding such elections? Have there been no wrongs committed by the people of the States, or some of them, by which the American freeman has been deprived of his just rights at the polls? Take up the law of South Carolina as to polling "places," and you find a proscription of voters instead of a prescription of the "places" contemplated by the Constitution for the convenience of voters. It is not in my power to give a more wanton and flagrant violation of this power over elections by a State than that which can be found from the pen of one of the members of the South Carolina Legislature, and one of the most distinguished democrats of that State. In his letter of November 1, 1878, addressed to the democratic voters of Charleston County, he says:

As to my opinions upon public affairs generally, and especially as to the policy of the party with respect to the colored vote, they were also well known, and for that reason I suppose I was not asked to make any pledges. They were open to be expressed to the convention, to its committee, or to individuals, high or low, that should ask. There never was a more pronounced independent candidate than I was when the convention adopted me. Its members knew it perfectly well. There could not be a representative more thoroughly independent of the open dictation or the true inwardness of the close corporation which at this day governs the democracy with a political tyranny unsurpassed and never before attempted in this State. I was elected without opposition. During the last session of the Legislature a bill came from the house reducing the number of voting precincts in this county. It came without any notice to me from its promoters. During its reading my attention was called to so much of it as applied to our county.

The number of precincts was reduced about one-third in the city and about two-thirds in the country, compelling the voter in some instances to make a round journey of even forty miles, others of twenty, twenty-five, and thirty miles, and in the greater number of cases from five, ten, and fifteen miles. Most of the voters are laboring-men, poor, and without means of transportation.

In Saint Andrew's Parish, consisting of James Island and the main territory, the poll on the main was abolished, and that on the island only retained, with a navigable stream to cross, and no bridge nor regularly kept ferry. I called the attention of the senate to these omissions, and moved their restoration.

It was done, and the amendments made without objection or a dissenting voice.

Upon further investigation I found that the time for keeping the polls, compared with the number of voters, made it next to impossible to receive all the votes, and quite easy for partisan managers to defeat the largest part of the votes.

Thus the time allowed is seven hundred and twenty minutes. On John's Island the number of voters is not less than one thousand. There is now but one precinct, two having been abolished. The time therefore allowed to each voter for the required oath, statement of name, residence, registration, and for such questions as any one or all of the managers may please to ask, is less than forty-five seconds, less than three-quarters of a minute.

Is any further explanation necessary? For the honor of Charleston I hope not. Subsequently the bill came back from the house with the amendments disagreed to. Then it was that General Gary appeared as the representative of the Charleston democracy, appointed by the chairman of your executive committee.

He announced that your chairman had instructed him to say that your committee wished the bill to pass without the amendments, and had asked him to so inform the Senate.

I then denounced the measure as a barefaced violation of the pledges made, and repeated again and again, not only to the colored people, but to the whole country.

I was not measured in the terms I used; they need not be repeated; each one of you, according to his value of fair play, justice, and good faith, will fancy what I said. What do you say to such legislation or the wish for it? I now say it is disgraceful to the State and a blot on its good name.

The senate went with General Gary and the committee. Then it was that I pledged myself to make the question before you if the time should come, and ask whether you approve and stand on such legislation or reject it. It is simply this and nothing else: Does the democracy of Charleston mean to disregard and break its plighted faith made before the whole country?

Now, suppose that in my colleague's district, in Dodge County, Wisconsin, voters were required to go forty miles to cast their ballots; suppose you were to strike out one-third, one-half, or two-thirds of their polling places, so that poor laboring-men would have to travel forty, fifty, or sixty miles to deposit their ballots; and suppose, when the attention of the Legislature is called to the matter, it would refuse to put the law in such form that voters would have the proper conveniences for voting—what do you suppose the people in Dodge County, Wisconsin, would do in such a case? Such a deprivation of their rights would produce revolution there. My colleague dare not go there and advocate that their polling places shall be forty miles apart, and claim that such a system is just or constitutional under our Government or an act of good faith on the part of a State Legislature.

Mr. BRAGG. Will my colleague allow a question? What does he think of a congressional district so arranged, in order to make it a republican district, that the voters must travel through three or four other congressional districts, some of them in other States?

Mr. HAZELTON. I think that is a mighty narrow district in parts. [Laughter.] I do not know what there is beyond the question—what is its bearing; but——

Mr. BRAGG. I refer to a congressional district in the State of Wisconsin, the north end of which is at Bayfield, its corner, like a sheep's leg, away down three hundred miles distant, where I live, and its other end on Green Bay.

INTERFERENCE WITH THE RIGHTS OF ANY CITIZEN IN ANY PART OF THE COUNTRY IS A WRONG DONE TO EVERY CITIZEN AND TO ALL PARTS OF THE COUNTRY.

Mr. HAZELTON. Well, I will tell you what I think about that. If there is nothing but the shape of a sheep's leg and a sheep's head to make a district of, it cannot be in any other shape. But suppose now a district has been gerrymandered; is that any justification for us here? Are we standing as American citizens, as Representatives of the American people, merely to play tricks, merely to fix up elections so we may carry our purposes a year from now? Or are we legislating for permanency, that the Government may live, that there may be an honest expression of the public will? Because Ohio and Indiana were gerrymandered and cut up to make democratic Representatives neither party is justified in striking at the public will anywhere; neither party is justified on that account in cutting off the opportunity of the legal voter to express his will at the polls. I tell you, sir, that the noblest heritage and the most sacred right that the poor man ever held or exercised in a free government has been and is and must always be his right of suffrage. It is his title to his freedom; it is his individual, sovereign will, reaching the remotest limits of political power, giving him a freeman's voice in the legislative, judicial, and executive power under which he lives and by which he is governed. If he cannot have it he is robbed of his most sacred right. And any man or combination of men who will rob him of this right in South Carolina or Louisiana or in Massachusetts, on every national question robs me and my constituents of their rights. You cannot strike down a ballot-box in South Carolina, in a national point of view, but it affects this whole country from the Atlantic to the Pacific and enters the volume of just political power, the just expression of the popular will, and corrupts it from top to bottom and from bottom to top. [Applause.] "We are all members of one body, and if one member suffers all the members suffer with it."

EVIDENCE OF SUCH INTERFERENCE IN THE SOUTHERN STATES.

And now, sir, further to maintain the necessity for national control of elections under existing laws, I refer to the condition of society itself in that State, and I make no charges except from the record. I am not here for crimination or recrimination; I am not here to say anything on this point except what the records and authorities recognize and sustain me in saying, and I appeal to the testimony taken by the Senate committee of which Senator CAMERON of my own State was chairman, and touching the national election of 1876 in South Carolina, upon the sworn testimony of republicans, democrats, black men and white men, showing that during the campaign of 1876 in South Carolina a large number of American citizens were assassinated for opinion's sake. Their names, in many cases, and their residences are given; their identity fully established, so that if the charges made in the testimony are not true the honor of that State demands that she should show it.

A "DEAD LIST."

I give here a few of the names of the persons which the testimony shows were thus assassinated in that campaign: James Cook, Moses Parks, Lieutenant Attaway, David Phillips, Hampden Stevens, Albert Minyard, Peter Williams, Henry Campbell, Basil Bush, John Williams, Kit Fennessey, John Kelsey, David Bush, Warren Kelsey, Samuel Brown, Wilkins Hamilton, Simon Coker, Abram Blake, Edward W. Bush, William Goodwin, George Turner, William Tutt, Zed. Golfin, Archie Burnett, Azariah Butler, Milo Robinson, Silas Goodwin, Perry Childers—thirty men who were assassinated at their own houses or in the fields at work, besides all who were killed at Hamburgh, Ellenton, and other general massacres. Some of these men had families, wives and children and aged parents, wholly dependent on them, and the circumstances of many of their murders are fiendishly cruel—almost beyond conception. There is no pretense that these men had committed any crime. On the contrary, the evidence clearly shows that they were deliberately murdered because they were supposed to be republicans, and for no other reason. Remember this is but a part of the murders in one State during one political campaign, and that in several other States during all the years since the war similar outrages have been systematically committed.

Can you group a picture like that in the Northern States of this Union. Will you place your national elections under the absolute control of a State power that enforces no law for the protection of these citizens thus murdered and that redresses none of these wrongs upon her own people? In a contest between democrats only for an office in such a state of society the colored voter may be treated with fair consideration, but between the colored republican and a democrat in a contest for office the former invites not success but annihilation. It is hard for all the people of the South to learn this lesson, and it would be hard for all the people of the North to learn it, I presume, under the same circumstances, that he who was a slave, an absolute chattel, is to-day in the eye of this Government and before the law the political equal of the white race.

It is but a little while since the colored man was your slave and you his master; but a little while since the whole labor system of the Southern States was servile instead of free; but a little while since revolution, by yourselves invited, lifted a race from abject slavery to the level of constitutional liberty. It is hard for the dominant race to realize this great fact, and so long as a political party in the South shall deny him his just rights in his new relation to the Government and society, so long as the Legislatures and courts of the Southern States shall discriminate against him, and unkind prejudices growing out of his former relations to the white race shall be cherished, you must not find fault if the great Government that gave him his freedom shall protect his ballot.

CORRUPTION IN OUR LARGE CITIES.

But, sir, it is not in the South alone, where the old relations of master and slave have been rent asunder, that this necessity of which I speak exists. The laws which you seek to repeal as a condition of granting supplies to the Government authorize national supervisors in the cities of the Union, from the most populous down to cities of twenty thousand inhabitants, and these laws apply not to one section of the Union alone, but to all sections. Many of these cities are constantly absorbing the most vicious as well as the best elements of the Old World. Vice grows with their growth and strengthens with their strength, and the peace of society depends alone upon the strong arm of the law. Your objective point in the repeal of these laws is the great city of New York; not that you may secure thereby an honest expression of the popular will, but that you may secure a victory in the great campaign of 1880 without regard to an honest expression of the popular will. You seek to emancipate fraud by the repeal of these statutory laws that she may be free to bring you the trophies of the days of Tweed. The great city of New York is the democratic political maelstrom of fraud, in which, left to itself, the popular will of the Empire State is ever swallowed up and destroyed. Without Federal supervision under existing laws, anything but a dishonest expression of the people's will at the ballot-box is impossible. Thrice, and more, before these laws were enacted was the real majority of the vote in that great State defeated by corruption, fraud, false votes, and false counts in that city. Hordes of bad men—cut-throats, thieves, and villains—reigned supreme at the polls, and shaped by fraud the power of party and the destiny of men. These vicious elements of society still exist. You can no more trust the integrity of the elective franchise in their hands, unrestrained by a supervising power, than you could trust your property in the hands of Greek bandits, the commerce of the seas with pirates, or a child for safety and protection in the coils and fangs of rattlesnakes. I do not seek or want their votes, but I insist that the honest vote of honest men shall be guarded and protected against their frauds.

Cicero well describes the contest that exists between the forces of law and order and such elements as these:

> On the one side chastity contends, on the other wantonness; here purity, there pollution; here integrity, there treachery; here piety, there profaneness; here constancy, there rage; here honesty, there baseness; here continence, there lust.
> * * * * * * * *
> In such a conflict were human aid to fail, would not the immortal gods empower such conspicuous virtue to trample over such complicated vice?

Mr. STEELE. Is not that a translation you are reading from?

Mr. HAZELTON. It is. Perhaps the gentleman thought it was the original Latin.

Mr. DEUSTER. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. HAZELTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. DEUSTER. Will the gentleman say that those men who were arrested in New York by Davenport belonged to the class he has just described?

Mr. HAZELTON. Some of them did I have no doubt.

Mr. DEUSTER. He has arrested eight thousand and more, mostly naturalized citizens, men who held their naturalization papers in their hands, with the seal of the court attached.

Mr. HAZELTON. Do you claim that those naturalization papers were all originally right when they got them?

Mr. DEUSTER. That is not the question. You must know that as regards any naturalization paper or any other paper, even your marriage certificate, if it is issued and signed, nobody can go behind it, unless a court decides it is not legal. Will you classify those men who were arrested by Davenport in New York among those "hordes of bad men" that you have described?

Mr. HAZELTON. Hordes?

Mr. DEUSTER. I mean those men of whom you said that you would not have their votes. I tell you, sir, that there were honest men among them whose votes you would be glad to receive.

Mr. HAZELTON. That may be. There may be some honest men among them. But you cannot deny, nor can anybody else deny, that New York City has had and has exercised the power by just that class of men to reverse the entire vote of the State by 40,000 corrupt, fraudulent votes. The record shows it and Tilden admits it. Greeley charged it and Tweed admitted it. And it is written all over that State that this class of men were the men who did that foul business. And now, my dear sir, do you stand here and say that a corrupt court can give a corrupt certificate of citizenship and that this person can go and vote at the polls and be justified all the way through? Answer, yes or no.

Mr. DEUSTER. You say a corrupt court?

Mr. HAZELTON. Yes; a corrupt court, a corrupt voter, and a corrupt certificate.

Mr. DEUSTER. Mr. Chairman, we have no reason to believe there is a corrupt court.

Mr. HAZELTON. I do not yield unless you answer my question. My question is this: Will you sustain a vote where a corrupt court gives the certificate and a corrupt voter casts the vote and where in reality that man is not a legal voter or real voter? Will you sustain that?

Mr. DEUSTER. I will tell you what I sustain. I sustain a naturalization certificate.

Mr. HAZELTON. Whether it is fraudulent or not?

Mr. DEUSTER. I sustain a naturalization certificate issued by any court of record.

Mr. HAZELTON. Whether the man swore to a lie or not? Will you, if you know the man who swore it swore to a lie, will you sustain it? Will you do so if you know he lied when he asked for a certificate?

Mr. DEUSTER. Certainly I will not.

Mr. HAZELTON. That is all right. I am glad of it. And now I will ask the gentleman another question: Did you not say here, in your speech the other day, that Milwaukee did not want these laws?

Mr. DEUSTER. We do not want these laws?

Mr. HAZELTON. That you did not want these marshals or supervisors laws?

Mr. DEUSTER. Yes, sir; and I have found this, that they have never been employed in any State where the republicans had a majority, but only where democratic majorities existed.

Mr. HAZELTON. Do you claim there were any corrupt votes in Milwaukee when you were elected? Do you claim that any part of the vote of Milwaukee was corrupt or fraudulent on the last occasion when you were elected?

Mr. DEUSTER. Any part of the vote?

Mr. HAZELTON. Was any part of the vote fraudulent in the city where you live, in the city of Milwaukee?

Mr. DEUSTER. I do not know; but if any fraudulent votes were cast there, they were upon the republican side. [Laughter.] I know this, that in Milwaukee money was used by the republicans.

Mr. HAZELTON. You say that money was used at the election in the city of Milwaukee. The rich men like Mr. Mitchell there, who own the banks and the railroads, the men who constitute the money power there, are the men who sent you here.

Mr. DEUSTER. The gentleman has mentioned Mr. Mitchell. I state that Mr. Mitchell did not contribute one red penny to our electioneering fund.

Mr. HAZELTON. You are using my time, and I have but one minute left. [Laughter.] You and I can fight this out some other time.

Mr. DEUSTER. I only wanted to tell you that——

Mr. HAZELTON. Wait till I get through.

Mr. DEUSTER. The name of Mr. Mitchell has been mentioned, and I desire only to say that neither Mr. Mitchell nor any banks or railroads contributed money toward any election.

Mr. HAZELTON. I do not say that he has, but I say that your party had the money and the republicans were poor.

Mr. DEUSTER. I tell you that some republicans will get poorer now. [Laughter.]

Mr. HAZELTON. They have always been poor.

Mr. DEUSTER. It was the policy of the republican party that made them poor. [Laughter.]

Mr. HAZELTON. And the Government, too, if you get it.

THE LAW CAN DO NO HARM TO THE LAW ABIDING.

And now, sir, the Constitution provides that no money shall be drawn from the Treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law, and you insist that no appropriations shall be made at all except upon the conditions of this section of the law of 1865, which is as follows:

> No military or naval officer, or other person engaged in the civil, military, or naval service of the United States, shall order, bring, keep, or have under his authority or control, any troops or armed men at the place where any general or special election is held in any State, unless it be necessary to repel the armed enemies of the United States, or to keep the peace at the polls—shall be not repealed, but so changed by striking out the last eight words as to destroy the power which the section as it now stands only restricts. Adopt this modification and what power have marshals, and supervisors even, to successfully resist violence at the polls of a national election? Certainly, under this modification if a riot should happen at a national election it could not be suppressed by national power. Such legislation should come in here, sir, if at all, in a separate bill entitled "A bill to confer certain powers and special privileges upon riots, fraud, and armed violence at the polls of the national elections." You can repeal the section if you will, but you cannot change it as proposed.

Repeal this section and the authority to use the troops for the enforcement of the laws will stand where it did from Washington to Lincoln. If you are patriotic, if you concede the right of all men to enjoy the liberty to which they are entitled, you need not fear the power of this Government thus placed where the fathers placed it.

For rulers are not a terror to good works, but to the evil. Wilt thou then not be afraid of the power? Do that which is good, and thou shall have praise of the same.

You long since said like Richelieu, "Take away the sword, States can be saved without it," and the President withdrew the troops from the South, and the little remnant that remains of freedom's army is engaged not at the polls but upon the forts, and in the defense of the frontiers of the nation.

THE THREAT TO WIPE OUT "THE LAST VESTIGE OF WAR MEASURES"—WHAT IT INCLUDES.

And now you demand that all the safeguards which the civil law employs for the protection of the citizen at the polls and to secure an honest expression of the popular will shall be wiped from the statute-books forever. I say all, for you have scaled them down to nothing; you have left the Government a supervisor, but he is not required to act. Nor do you pause here. "We do not intend to stop until we have stricken the last vestige of your war measures from the statute-books, which like these were born of the passions incident to civil strife and looked alone to the abridgment of the liberty of the citizen," is the recorded manifesto, sir, in your speech delivered before this House on the Army bill. I thank God "That murderous shaft that's shot has not yet lighted." You say, sir, that you do not include the question of pensions in this threat, nor the amendments to the Constitution. But this sentiment is not universal among the democracy of the South, as I learn from the tone of the public press. I find the following pertinent paragraph in the Jackson (Mississippi) Clarion, (democratic:)

If bygones are to be bygones let them be so in fact as well as pretension; but this system of pensioning the soldiers who fought on the winning side of the war at the expense of the side that lost (because of the overwhelming odds against them) is not only a disagreeable reminder of bygones but a most unfair and iniquitous proceeding. While large numbers of the soldiers on the side of the North honestly believed they were fighting to save their Government and were impelled by patriotic motives, others were mere soldiers of fortune from abroad who enlisted for pay regardless of the cause involved. On the side of the South, the struggle was for home, altar, and the right of self-government.

But your field of glory is not yet exhausted. The great laws by which the nation obtained means to suppress the rebellion, and many other laws of vital importance, form a part of the war legislation which you threaten to destroy.

THE VETO POWER—PRESIDENT JAMES K. POLK'S DEFINITION OF IT.

I cannot close, sir, without a reference to the constitutional right of the President to veto bills that do not meet his approval—a subject which has been so often referred to during this debate—and I find this right and power so clearly and tersely defined by a high democratic authority that I prefer adopting his language to attempting a definition of my own. President James K. Polk, of Tennessee, in his fourth annual message, December 5, 1848, says:

The Constitution provides that "every bill which shall have passed the House of Representatives and the Senate shall, before it becomes a law, be presented to the President of the United States; if he approve he shall sign it, but if not, he shall return it, with his objections, to that House in which it shall have originated, who shall enter the objections at large on their Journal, and proceed to reconsider it."

The preservation of the Constitution from infraction is the President's highest duty. He is bound to discharge that duty at whatever hazard of incurring the displeasure of those who may differ with him in opinion. He is bound to discharge it as well by his obligations to the people who have clothed him with his exalted trust as by his oath of office, which he may not disregard. Nor are the obligations of the President in any degree lessened by the prevalence of views different from his own in one or both Houses of Congress. It is not alone hasty and inconsiderate legislation that he is required to check, but if at any time Congress shall, after apparently full deliberation, resolve on measures which he believes subversive of the Constitution or of the vital interests of the country, it is his solemn duty to stand in the breach and resist them. The President is bound to approve or disapprove every bill which passes Congress and is presented to him for his signature. The Constitution makes this his duty, and he cannot escape it if he would. * * * Any attempt to coerce the President to yield his sanction to measures which he cannot approve would be a violation of the spirit of the Constitution, palpable and flagrant, and if successful would break down the independence of the executive department and make the President, elected by the people, and clothed by the Constitution with power to defend their rights, the mere instrument of a majority of Congress. * * * That the majority should govern is a general principle controverted by none, but they must govern according to the Constitution and not according to an undefined and unrestrained discretion whereby they may oppress the minority. * * * The people, by the Constitution, have commanded the President as much as they have commanded the legislative branch of the Government to execute their will. They have said to him in the Constitution which they require he shall take a solemn oath to support, that if Congress pass any bill which he cannot approve "he shall return it to the House in which it originated with his objections." In withholding from it his approval and signature he is exercising the will of the people constitutionally expressed as much as the Congress that passed it. * * * To deny to the President the exercise of this power would be to repeal that provision of the Constitution which confers it upon him. To charge that its exercise unduly controls legislation is to complain of the Constitution itself.

The veto power, sir, is not a new principle in governments. It existed as far back in history as when the tribunes of the Roman people exercised it against the decrees of the senate and the proceedings of courts, and since that time it has continued as a distinct and independent branch of governmental power, and to-day exists not only as a distinct and necessary function of the law-making power of this nation, but has passed into the constitutions of nearly if not all the States of the American Union. The governor of every State has the right to veto the bills which he does not approve. This power is one of the most valuable safeguards against hasty and injudicious legislation, and it is as essential that the Executive be respected and protected in the exercise of this power as that the Legislature be respected in the exercise of its constitutional powers. I shall await the action of the Executive of this great nation upon these bills which have engaged our attention and that of the American people throughout this entire session of Congress confident that he will perform his duty with prudence and with strict fidelity to the Constitution and the best interests of the country, and confident also that the American people will not sustain the policy now inaugurated by the democratic party in this Capitol, that the life and existence of the Government shall depend upon the modification or repeal of a law.

Mr. BRAGG proceeded to address the committee.

Mr. STEELE. My friend from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] will understand that it is necessary that the committee should now rise, and I make that motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The House has ordered that to-day at half past four o'clock a recess shall be taken until half past seven o'clock. The question is upon the motion that the committee now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BLACKBURN reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 2) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. STEPHENS. I ask unanimous consent that the time for closing general debate be extended from two o'clock to-morrow, as now fixed by order of the House, until five o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. BUCKNER. I object.

Mr. HAYES. If we can have some sort of understanding by which a final vote can be taken on this bill Saturday, I will not object. We ought certainly to have a vote on this bill Saturday.

Mr. BUCKNER. I withdraw my objection.

There being no further objection, the time for general debate was extended until five o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. STEPHENS. I also further ask consent that the order be now made that at the end of the session to-night a recess be taken until to-morrow morning at ten o'clock.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The SPEAKER. The hour of half past four o'clock having arrived, in pursuance of previous order of the House, a recess will now be taken until half past seven o'clock this evening.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House reassembled at half past seven o'clock p. m.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole, to resume the consideration of the legislative appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. SPRINGER in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. BRAGG,] who had not concluded his remarks when the committee rose this afternoon, is still entitled to the floor.

Mr. BRAGG. Mr. Chairman, the debate upon the present bill, together with that on the bill which preceded it, has been so able and exhaustive upon all the legal questions involved in either of them that a man who at this late hour would essay to give any new light upon the subject must indeed deem himself possessed of rare genius and logical powers. I have no such expectation; but the range of this debate has been such that I trust it will be my excuse for trespassing upon the time of the committee. From the beginning to the end of the debate there has scarcely been any allusion made to the merits of the real question involved, but on the contrary the effort has been studiously to avoid that question and substitute false issues as to the method and purposes of the amendments under consideration.

Most of the time has been occupied in proclamations of a new revolution just commenced, a revolution which is to be the counterpart of the revolution of 1861, and many men who have never heard a hostile shot, who in case of actual danger would have joined the horse marines, one would think, have arrayed themselves in caps and feathers and have unsheathed their swords and avowed their purpose to lead on to victory in another great battle which is to come.

Whenever they have been arraigned for any abuse of power or malfeasance of their party their answer has been not a defense or justification, nor even yet an explanation, but instead of it they raise their voices and shout with one accord, "You are confederates," as if that at this hour would blind the people to their excesses. They do not justify themselves, for they have no reason for their opposition to these bills, and, devoid of argument, they indulge in flings at the former condition or political action of some of the gentlemen upon this side of the Chamber in an endeavor to arouse the sectional prejudices of the people and through passion escape popular condemnation.

Mr. Chairman, the State which I have the honor in part to represent has no taint of slavery in her lineage. She had no suspicion of disloyalty in her record. When in 1861 she was called upon for aid to the General Government there was no State that responded more promptly than she did, and the common soldiers whom she sent to the war love the national emblems with as stout hearts and as steady nerves as any of that grand citizen Army. Where the fight was hottest there were they, and where the dead lay thickest there might their bodies be found, with their backs to the field and their feet to the foe.

The democracy of my State was ever true to the Union. She ever entertained respect and honor for those who went down to the hot field of battle. And in testimonial of it she sends two of her citizen soldiers to represent her upon the floor of this House; and voting as they do and saying what they may say, I trust their motives will not be impugned nor the charge of disloyalty laid at their door.

I stand here to-day to defend the measures contained in the bill which has already passed this House, as well as the measures which are now under consideration by this House. I feel that it is my duty to speak, not for the South. My interests are with the West; my interests are with the North; my interests are with the men who manned the ships, with the men who went forth and did battle, with the men who came from their work-shops, from their fields, with the men who earn honest bread by their daily labor, with the men both native-born and foreign who claim the right to exercise the right of suffrage without being interfered with by national troops at the polls or by national marshals, the representatives of the thug interest, to scare them away with threats that their papers of naturalization are irregular or illegal and that they will be snatched up and carried off to foreign prisons if they see fit to exercise the franchises of the American citizen. It is for them that I speak and not for the South.

When these gentlemen propose to make this a southern battle they forget the communities in which they live. When they propose to stir up again the sentiment of discord, when they declare upon this floor that a new rebellion has been inaugurated, what sounds have responded? Instead of the cry coming back "To arms!" and the North being united to sustain them upon this sectional issue, there is coming back the taunting, derisive laugh of mockery from the people they seek to arouse and whose evil passions they endeavor to stir up in order to bring on a new conflict that they may profit by it.

While you stand here declaiming against southern outrages; while you are reading your Teller reports; while you are vouching for the testimony of witnesses who have shown themselves to be the disgrace of any civilized nation and of any age in the history of any government; while you come here vaunting the evidence of your Pinkstons and your Jenkses for the purpose of arousing northern sentiment, you forget that you are indebted for even the appearance, the semblance of honesty and decency that you wear as a party to the simple fact that the kind of witnesses whose testimony you are now seeking to use was so foul, rotten, and disreputable that when they confessed their misdeeds, by which you still have a branch of the Government, and pointed to you as the principals in crime, the northern judgment revolted at conviction upon the evidence of men and women whose character was so damnable; and you forget, too, that you appealed to that judgment not to condemn upon such evidence. And so the verdict upon the charges made against you was "not proven," though in the mind of every fair man in the country your guilt was scarcely the subject of a doubt.

But your failure to obtain the applauding response you desired and sought must teach you that the people of the North know that the men of the South who were brave enough to fight the battles they fought, when they laid down their arms laid them down as brave men always do, accepting the consequences of their defeat, and that you sound your "tom-toms and blow your horns" in vain. [Applause on the democratic side.]

You have paraded here the Goddess of Liberty mangled and torn and bleeding, brought from the battle-field on broken arms and bleeding breasts. You have shown her again to the country, and you have asked this country again to kindle anew the fires of conflict. Had the gentleman who portrayed that figure remained long enough in the military service of the United States, giving earnest of the brave words which he now utters by the actions that he then took, he might have had a far different vision present itself to his view. For in looking back through time he might have seen that Goddess first mourning over the evil spirit of discord which separated her children; he might have seen her again standing weeping over the graves of her brave dead; and he might have again seen her radiant in her majestic beauty, crowned with the chaplets of victory, when the boys in gray escorted by the boys in blue knelt at her altar and took anew the oath of allegiance and heard her say, "Rise, erring children, and be again American citizens." Ay, sir, he would then have known that the "blue and the gray" had formed an abiding compact to uphold and defend the institutions of this country and the liberties of this people against all foes, foreign and domestic. [Applause on the democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, we are accused of starving the Army to death. Horrible sight! Think of an army of skeletons parading before us. We are charged with starving the nation to death. Are we? By what authority do you say we are starving the Army to death? When the appropriation bill for the support of the Army was put upon its final passage, so that that Army might be supported for the ensuing fiscal year; when provision was made in that bill to clothe it and feed it and to supply it with the arms and munitions of war; when we provided for the protection of our defenseless frontiers, the democratic and national vote on this side of the House was solid in favor of supplying that Army with all its needs and providing for all its wants. Where were the men who loved the Army so much then? Every mother's son of them voted "no." [Laughter.]

We are starving the Army to death, are we? When by our affirmative vote we proposed to feed and clothe it, and you, the minority, are interposing your "no" against that Army being fed and clothed, you denounce us with starving it to death. That gushing sentiment of love for the Army coming from the republican party was like the gushing love and feelings of sentiments it had toward the boys in blue when they came back from the late war. It hath this extent—no more: "So long as you serve our purposes and do our bidding, all hail; but when you refuse to wear our livery and vote us into power, the sooner you starve to death the better; for you will become full-fledged confederates and tear down the Government you shed your blood and risked your lives to maintain."

Actuated by just this sentiment so soon as the majority of this House, in obedience to the doctrines of our fathers, said that the money which we appropriate for the support and maintenance of the Army must be supplied for its support as an Army, and shall be no longer used to make that Army a political machine, the fountains of your sympathy all dried up; and being unable longer to use the Army, you had no hesitation in voting to "starve it to death." [Applause.] Having voted to "starve it to death" and failed, what next do you do? You call upon your union leagues, you call upon your ward clubs, you call upon your newspapers to stiffen the backbone of the President so that he too shall be disposed to do what?—to "starve the Army to death!" [Applause.] It is a fitting act for a party that has just lost its control of the Government. It will be a fitting close to the power of the republican party in every branch of this Government if at the dictation of partisan politicians, for mere party ends, a veto shall be interposed to thwart the will of the people expressed through the legislative branches of the Government.

I do not deny, Mr. Chairman, the right to use the veto power; but, sir, when the veto power is used it must be used for cause; it must be used for reasons; there must be something upon which to found it more than the dictates of a congressional caucus or of any ward club in this country. It must be founded upon reasons of State. Now, what reasons are there upon which to base the claims that this bill is to be vetoed? I say to the gentlemen upon the other side of this Chamber your commander-in-chief upon this floor surrendered the question and capitulated you with him when he said that were this presented in an independent measure he would vote for it. That capitulation commits you to the fact that the principle in the bill is not wrong. Then, if there is nothing wrong in principle, where is there anything upon which to found the presidential veto? The President cannot interpose his veto upon form, for form is nothing so that the substance is there. The question is, is the legislation wise? Is it in the interest of the American people? Does it conform to the sentiment of American institutions? If so, and the people demand it, it makes no difference whether it be engrossed upon white paper or black, upon blue paper or brown, upon a legislative appropriation bill or a deficiency bill; and if it is a measure of good and not of evil import and be passed by the representatives of the people in the proper exercise of the law-making power, and is presented to the Executive for his signature, it is his duty to sign it, and I verily believe he will sign it.

Now, I propose to show that there is nothing here requiring the interposition of any veto; I propose to show that there has been a complete surrender and capitulation of the republican party on this question, not only here but elsewhere, and that you are simply urging the Executive to do what you yourselves would not dare to do. You assume now to be the friends of him with whom you have been struggling and contending ever since he came into possession of the power which he now holds. You who have fought him, you who have compelled him to appeal to the democratic Representatives in Congress to aid and sustain him in the exercise of the powers conferred upon him by the Constitution of the United States to break down an oligarchy that had sought to absorb to itself all the powers of the Government and dictate and control the prerogatives of the Executive—you, forsooth, are now become the peculiar friends of the President and ask him to veto these bills, and threaten him with your displeasure if he exercises his own judgment and resists your coercion. I read, Mr. Chairman, from the remarks of a man whose name parliamentary courtesy forbids me to mention, sufficient to show that the surrender has been made, not only here but elsewhere, and that there is nothing in the Army bill except that by our votes we have declared the law to be in conformity with what the republican leaders say their construction of it and practice under it always has been:

The object of the proposed section, which has just been read at the Clerk's desk, is to get rid of the eight closing words, namely, "or to keep the peace at the polls," and therefore the mode of legislation proposed in the Army bill now before the Senate is an unusual mode; it is an extraordinary mode. If you want to take off a single sentence at the end of a section in the Revised Statutes the ordinary way is to strike off those words; but the mode chosen in this bill is to repeat and re-enact the whole section, leaving those few words out. While I do not wish to be needlessly suspicious on a small point, I am quite persuaded that this did not happen by accident, but that it came by design. If I may so speak, it came of cunning, the intent being to create the impression that whereas the republicans in the administration of the General Government had been using troops right and left, hither and thither, in every direction, as soon as the democrats got power they enacted this section. I can imagine democratic candidates for Congress all over the country reading this section to gaping and listening audiences as one of the first offsprings of democratic reform, whereas every word of it, every syllable of it from its first to its last, is the enactment of a republican Congress.

* * * * * * *

The alleged object is to strike out the few words that authorize the use of troops to keep peace at the polls. This country has been alarmed, I rather think indeed amused, at the great effort made to create a widespread impression that the republican party relies for its popular strength upon the use of the bayonet. This democratic Congress has attempted to give a bad name to this country throughout the civilized world, and to give it on a false issue. They have raised an issue that has no foundation in fact—that is false in whole and detail; false in the charge; false in all the specifications.

There is the language of a great republican leader in reference to this same Army bill that is to be vetoed, in which he declares the Army has never been used at the polls; in fact that they never intend so to use it; that the allegation or insinuation that there is any necessity for this clause to be stricken out of that statute is false in specification and false in detail.

I said I had no right to give the name of the author of those sentiments which I have just read, but I may say he is the man whom the great Illinois humanitarian, who, after having captured the devil and knocked off his horns and cut off his tail, and found him an agreeable gentleman, [laughter,] and abolished hell and substituted in its stead green fields and pleasant places, once distinguished by calling him the "plumed knight." [Laughter.] This is all I desire to say in reference to the Army bill.

Mr. Chairman, the first proposition which meets us in the present bill under consideration relates to the reorganization of the jury system which has just been so severely denounced by my colleague, [Mr. HAZELTON,] and who is the first man who has paid his respects to it upon the floor of the House. We insist that there must be a change in the method of providing jurors in the courts of the United States. The method which has always obtained has been the selection of jurors in most of the States at the whim of the marshal and the clerk, no one knowing but themselves how the panel was to be made up; no selection from the body of the district at large from which the panel was to be drawn, but they were chosen just as the marshal saw fit to designate them; giving him the power in the North as well as the South to pack any jury on any given case he may see proper. Now, the question arises shall we see the source of justice corrupted without raising our voices to stay that tide of corruption? Shall we see the jury-boxes, the very fountain of justice, packed for mercenary or for political ends, or in the interest of any particular person?

There was a time when the question of jurors for United States courts was not nearly of the consequence it is now, but by virtue of the laws passed within the last few years, not only to enforce the constitutional amendments but those which have given additional and increased jurisdiction to the court, that court, which was formerly unknown to the country towns in the different States at the North, now has its process running everywhere, so that no poor man whose dwelling-house is burned and who attempts to collect the money from the insurance company to which he has paid the premium is obliged to travel from sixty to one hundred miles to attend the court. That court is brought home now to all our citizens in every branch and class of business and of society.

So that the question of the jury-box in that court has now become a momentous one. The only difference between us and the South is that there is an additional power, which we propose to repeal here, which renders the packing of the jury more effective than it is with us. And while gentlemen may say there is no evidence of packing juries in the North, I state, from the testimony taken in the Blodgett investigation, that it appears in the city of Chicago men who expected to be indicted by the next grand jury were given, by permission of the marshal, the power to name five or six men to go upon that grand jury to take care of their cases. That is what was developed in the northern city of Chicago; and the report of the Attorney-General, Mr. Pierrepoint, calls the attention of Congress to the fact that great corruption exists in the drawing of jurors and asks that Congress may take some action to relieve us from that evil. We have taken action. We have provided for the appointment of a commissioner the same as when juries are drawn in the State courts. The authority to make up the panel from which the jury is drawn is given to the supervisor. We propose to have a Federal commissioner appointed. We propose to have a panel, not for a particular jury, but a panel drawn from the whole body of the district at large; and to prevent political trials, to prevent political discriminations, the provision is that the commissioner who is appointed and puts in one-half of the names to make up the three hundred, and the clerk who puts in the other half, shall be of different political parties, so that there can be no star-chamber practice in political cases.

In the South, sir, as the late trials have shown, this discretionary power which is given to the judges to apply the test oath has been brought in aid of the power given the marshal to pack the jury, and that power to administer the test oath is certainly an anomaly. A judge on the bench disqualified to sit as a juror, and the district attorney prosecuting a criminal and drawing the jury also disqualified to sit as a juror, those two men suffering under the same disqualification with the men of mind, men representing the talent, the property, the brains of the southern country—those two men by combination can keep men off the jury so as to accomplish their ends.

And in the late case in Charleston the record shows that the test oath was only applied to confederates where those confederates were democrats. Wherever the confederate was a republican he was deemed a fit and proper person to serve upon the jury.

How long shall such means to gratify malice or corruption continue in this country? How long should we be entitled to the name of a free people? How long ought we to boast of our institutions as more glorious than are possessed by any other nation on the face of the globe, of our freedom, of our happiness, of all of our institutions, when we leave that one upon which property, character, liberty, and life depends in the absolute control of political partisanship, combined sometimes with personal malice and too often with individual venality. If you gentlemen on the other side propose to adhere to this system of administering justice I pray you take down from the court-rooms the statue of justice, standing blindfold, holding in even poise the scales; the place is unworthy of it; and place in her stead a painted harlot, vending her wares unblushingly to the highest bidder, and there let her stand, the true type of any party that prostitutes the temple of justice for the advancement of partisan ends.

Mr. GARFIELD. Will it interrupt the gentleman if I ask him to allow me to correct something which I understand he has said as to my position. It will take less than half a minute?

Mr. BRAGG. I must decline to yield, as my time is so limited.

The next question involved is the interference by supervisors and Federal marshals in the execution of the election laws by the States. A great deal has been said upon the Constitution; a great deal has been said upon the powers of the General Government; and one thing of all others most noticeable in the debate is that the great constitutional lawyer who represents that side of the House has found it a fit and proper time to make the bold, broad, manly declaration of his views, and to urge and argue as the result of the war federalism has regained power in this Government, and federalism, with absolutism attending it, is the condition in which this country now finds itself. I thank him for that admission, because it shows what we claim and believe, and what I feared none upon the other side would be bold enough to announce, that this, instead of being a battle of democrats against republicans, or of confederate brigadiers against the Union, is the old fight of federalism against democracy and an effort to wipe out the power of the masses and to substitute in place of it the powers of a special class.

The Constitution does give, first, the right to fix the times and places and prescribe the manner of holding the election of members of Congress and persons who shall represent States in the United States Senate to the States. It gives it secondarily to the General Government. I have always understood, and so read the Federalist and the debates upon that subject, that there is, first, a positive direct, affirmative power in the State; secondly, a reserve power vested in the General Government to protect its own life and preserve its existence in case the State should fail to exercise the power which was conferred upon it. That is the doctrine which the men who drew the Constitution and prepared the arguments that induced the States to ratify it maintained.

And I cite from the Federalist to show how foreign it was from the purpose of the framers or advocates of the Constitution to interfere or give the right of interference in elections in the States to the Federal Government. Madison says:

Suppose an article had been introduced into the Constitution empowering the United States to regulate the elections for the particular States, would any man have hesitated to condemn it both as an unwarrantable transposition of power and as a premeditated engine for the destruction of State governments?

But now, Mr. Chairman, we find a party more wise than the old statesmen, and knowing better what they meant than they themselves did, asserting precisely the power by indirection which Madison in his support of the Constitution asserts "no man would hesitate to condemn both as an unwarrantable transposition of power and as a premeditated engine for the destruction of State governments." I have said this is proposed by indirection and will now explain how the end is reached. In many of the States, and at the will of Congress it may be in all, members of Congress are elected at a general election, when State, county, and legislative offices are filled and the candidates are voted for upon one ballot. Now while federalism is not yet strong enough to claim supervision of the election of all the local officers, it does claim the right to supervise registration and to manage and control the election for member of Congress, and if it control it as to him, why it logically follows it controls all the rest, as there is but one registration, one box, one poll-list, and one ticket, and a challenge by the Federal officer goes to the whole ticket. So that by virtue of this power which they claim under the Constitution they exercise functions which of necessity absorb all the power and right in the people of the vicinage to regulate and control local elections. And one distinguished gentleman has said "this was settled by the war." That is a cheap way to bid the question down, but it will not down at the bidding. The people of this country will exercise their right of ballot and their right to manage their local government without interference from the Federal power; and when that right is refused them they will have changed their own instincts and forgotten the traditions of the fathers, or they will compel a recognition of their right.

Mr. Chairman, I cannot leave this question of the relation and powers of the State and Federal governments without a reference to the beautiful figure illustrative of the mutuality and dependence of that relation used by the distinguished gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROBESON] in the discussion upon the Army bill, in which he formulated an idea which I had often tried to do myself, and did it in a manner so much better than I may hope to do that I beg his pardon if I use it here for the purpose of expressing my ideas:

> Now, Mr. Chairman, we belong to a system of government with co-ordinate and limited powers, all bearing relation to each other, each having its appropriate sphere, each clothed with its actual duty, each having under the Constitution its proper scope, power, and restraint. It is like the solar system in the heavens, each member of it dependent upon the other, each held in its place, each governed in its motions, each restrained in its orbit by the power and the attractions of the other members of that system. Let one of those spheres invade the orbit of the others, let it break loose from the influence of the laws of gravitation which move and direct it and from the centripetal and centrifugal forces which hold and control it, what becomes of it and of the system of which it is a member? It wanders abroad not only to the destruction of its co-ordinate spheres, but an object of terror to the universe and of destruction to itself.
> Now, we are here co-ordinate members of this Government, all held in harmonious accord by rights, privileges, powers, and restrictions of the Constitution of the United States; and when one member of that system breaks loose from that attraction which holds and restrains it in its true relations to the other members, its old landmarks all swept away, its old traditions all forgotten, its old and safe attractions all gone, it will riot through the system an object of terror and dismay, a mighty instrument of evil.
> Mr. Chairman, it is on the ruins of disrupted systems of government that military power arises. It is in the confusion, the disorder, arising from the loss of civil rights to be guaranteed and executed by the civil officers of the law, it is with the overthrow of constitutional law and amid the smoke of such a conflict which this occasions, that the "man on horseback" rises and liberty is sacrificed to order.

A magnificent idea most beautifully and clearly expressed. But, alas! that man should be so prone to forget his own teachings. Yesterday we had the same distinguished gentleman, with all the power and subtlety of his intellect, struggling against this bill and sustaining the legality and propriety of the supervisor and marshal laws—laws which cannot be exercised without a direct interference by one jurisdiction with another, by the Federal with the State, and the result of which must inevitably bring conflict, confusion, and disorder.

The supervisor and deputy marshal, clothed with the Federal authority, invade the orbit of the State officer in the administration of the State and local law regulating elections. Their presence at the polls and at the registration places is not in the execution and enforcement of any law of Congress providing "the time, place, or manner" of holding elections, for Congress has not provided any law fixing either "the place at or the manner" in which an election shall be conducted. Their presence and purpose, then, can only be to control, supervise, manage, direct, or interfere with the officers of the State in the execution of the laws of the State to which the supervisors and the marshals as officers are alien. Must not the direct result be the destruction of harmony arising out of the conflict of power and allegiance? And is it not amid the smoke of such a conflict that "the man on horseback" is expected to ride into power?

When the distinguished friend of "the silent man" of 1868 and 1872, one of his chosen privy councilors, argued so stoutly for the laws out of which this confusion may arise, it is not to be wondered that "the man on horseback" presented himself to his mind's eye in looking forward to 1880 as the means of restoring order at the sacrifice of liberty. Let us hope that "the wish was not father to the thought," but the logical effect of his argument tends strongly in that direction.

But, Mr. Chairman, there is still another view in which this question of the power of Congress to make these laws may be considered in reference to the general condition of the Federal laws as they now stand respecting the exercise of the constitutional power claimed for Congress under section 4 of article 1 of the Constitution.

Has Congress ever exercised the power claimed, admitting it to exist to the full extent claimed for the purpose of the argument?

The distinguished gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. ROBESON,] in his argument, (I quote his exact language, wishing to do him full justice, for I admire his frankness and respect his ability,) speaking of the extent of the powers of the Federal Government and their nature and manner of execution, says:

> It is a government whose powers are limited to certain subjects and acts on certain specific objects with which it deals, but whenever it does deal with a subject, whenever it does act upon an object, there it is a government of sovereign and supreme power. * * * Let it be admitted or denied. This is a limited government, but limited only in the number of its powers, and unlimited in its governmental power over the subjects to which it is legitimately directed. As it is then a sovereignty with sovereign powers upon these subjects, let me make another proposition which cannot be denied; it is this, that whenever it does act upon those subjects, its sovereignty is not only unlimited but exclusive.

I do not care to combat this doctrine, while I do not say that in all its bearings I admit its full correctness. But apply the principle laid down to the question under consideration—"whenever it does act upon those subjects its sovereignty is not only unlimited but exclusive," hence it must logically follow that it has not properly acted upon the subject of election of members of Congress, or else its sovereignty is unlimited and exclusive.

It is well settled that the Federal Government executes its laws through its own agencies, its own officers; it may, it is conceded, confer power upon a State official; if he voluntarily executes it, well and good, but he cannot be compelled to execute it. Now, with this state of the premises, where do we find ourselves? If we have a Federal election law, it must be exclusively under the control and management of Federal agencies, or its execution may be devolved upon State officers, if they choose to execute it. These are the only methods of execution. Let us now look at the state of the law. No lawyer, nor even layman, would claim that we have any election law under which an election for a member of Congress could be held, votes canvassed and certificate of election be made. There is no Federal machinery devised for the holding an election; the whole system is governed and regulated by State law. And the certificate of election to a member of Congress is issued upon a canvass by a board of State officers of the votes cast, and it is signed by the executive of the State, who causes the writ for election to issue, not supervised nor controlled by any superior power.

If the States were to-day to refuse to order elections, there is no way under any Federal law now in existence whereby they could be conducted. Hence I argue, and it seems to me to be conclusive, that the present law is not in execution of the power claimed, and there is no other provision cited in its support, and none other under which the power can be claimed. What, then, should be done with the statute we seek to repeal? The distinguished constitutional lawyer [Mr. ROBESON] has furnished the answer. I give it in his own language:

> And if there be any power in these laws which cannot be rationally, legitimately, and logically inferred from the provisions and powers of this written Constitution of the country, it should be swept from the statute-book in disdain and dishonor.

To all which I say ay—

> If it were done, when 'tis done, then 'twere well
> It were done quickly.

Mr. Chairman, I have no desire to say more in reference to the law itself; but a few suggestions may not be amiss relative to the necessity for it, the practice under it, and the practical working of it.

You men on the other side who talk about using these officials as a means of preserving the purity of elections, ought you not really when you go home to look in your mirrors and see if the idea of your being in favor of the purity of elections does not make you blush? Purity of elections, and boasting "thank God" that we have not the President yet. Can you do that without reviving in your minds that contest which, in the words of one of your own partisans, a member of the Potter committee, was decided by adroit knavery? Can you do that without remembering that you have a representative in the White House, not so much the result of the ballot-box as the result of the practice of that adroit knavery in robbing the ballot-box, so that if the doctrine of respondeat superior obtains in politics the responsibility that may rest on the nominal head of your party may not be to a people who elected him through the ballot-box, but to the adroit knavery which cheated that ballot-box out of the fruits of victory?

Still you have the face to come here and talk to us about the purity of elections. An ordinary man would be ashamed. But a republican politician, bred up to the highest type of his class, a pharisee of the first order, who thanks God that he is not as other men are, can put on cheek enough not only to steal the Government itself, but to thank God for it, because the ends justify the means, and it is better to steal it than to let the "rascally democrats" get it. [Laughter.]

I was delighted with my colleague who last addressed this committee, [Mr. HAZELTON,] because he was frank enough and bold enough to openly avow on this floor that the people were not capable of self-government, and the ballot-boxes could not safely be intrusted to their control. The Federal seed cast by New Jersey yesterday has sprouted already in Wisconsin. Federalism is on the rise. My colleague openly avows that the people are not capable of self-government. I suppose he will qualify it in a Pinafore sort of way by saying "some people."

Not competent to govern themselves! The people, who are the source of all power; the people, who are the Government; the people, who make the Government, who sustain the Government, who pay the taxes and bear the burdens of government, are they not to be trusted with the ballot-box? Why? The reason is that the republicans are afraid of the people, and they have good right to be afraid of them. Year after year you have cajoled them with promises; year after year you have legislated for class; year after year you have built up capital at the expense of the people. You have paid no heed or warning to their call. You think now that you are strong enough with your millions and tens of millions in the hands of capitalists and the patronage of the Federal Government to back you to defy them, and so you speak out boldly in the legislative halls and declare that the people cannot be trusted with a free ballot. When the ides of November come, he who entertains such sentiments will find, notwithstanding a caucus nomination, "that many are called but few are chosen."

Mr. Chairman, during this debate this Hall has resounded with the cry of fraudulent voting on the part of the democrats. Every man of the opposition has shouted fraud and charged us with intended perpetration of frauds in the future as the incentive for repeal of this law. Let us for a moment stop and inquire when this era of fraud commenced. Under what dynasty, under the operation of what laws, did this fraud upon the ballot-box commence, and when did we first hear of it, and who originated it, and for what purpose? All the cries of fraud that have been heard from the other side of the Chamber point to the fraudulent management and conduct of the ballot-boxes when they have been in charge of supervisors, and have been surrounded by a cordon of deputy marshals under these offensive laws. Now, if the argument in defense of the maintenance of this class of officers is that their purpose is to prevent fraud, while the result is that by their creation we have induced and fostered fraud, then certainly these officers have outlived their usefulness, and the sooner we dispose of them the better. We claim, Mr. Chairman, that they are the agents of fraud; that the purpose of their appointment is fraud; that they are appointed to surround the ballot-box for the purpose of deterring those among the laboring classes of foreign birth who may choose to vote the democratic ticket, and to secure safe entrance into the ballot-box of just so many ballots as may be offered by any person, no matter what his character or how often he may have voted, provided he be "one of the elect" and vote the republican ticket. They surround the box; they stand as a protection to the box against our votes; but they stand so that they may guard all those who come to that box desiring to vote their ticket, whether they be qualified or not. And the fearful democratic frauds are devices of these republican officials, who, under the hue and cry of "stop thief," hope to divert attention from themselves while they intimidate the honest laborer from voting by fear of arrest on false charge, and stuff the ballot-box, and profit by crumbs of Federal patronage dealt out with lavish hand.

Radicals sneer when we talk of an honest voter being intimidated or deterred from voting. They say, "show us your intimidated man." Arrest and imprisonment are not essential to intimidation. It exists in its most effective form without actual arrest and seizure. It is the presence of the official coupled with the power to do wrong and with the well-understood feeling in the community that it is their disposition to carry out that power whenever it becomes necessary for the accomplishment of their purpose that forms the strongest element of intimidation. The deputy marshals may be convicts, as the testimony shows they have been in many instances; they may be murderers, pickpockets, thieves, frequenters of houses of ill-fame—men of the very lowest grade of society, men whose touch is an abomination, yet they are clothed with the badge of the Federal Government, and they stand there representing the Federal power in all its majesty. They have no scruples of conscience, and the people know that their presence there if it be obnoxious to them means arrest, confinement the taking them away from their families and children who are dependent upon them for daily bread. This is the intimidation that is wrought by these people, and the number of men who are so deterred from voting is legion in every municipality where the marshals are put in requisition.

It is said there is only one case shown. Let me take two cities, one in the North and one in the South. In 1876 there were issued within two days previous to the election eighty-one hundred warrants in the city of New Orleans for alleged violations of the registration laws, the purpose being to arrest so great a number of persons that it would be impossible for them to have a hearing, and the fact that they stood charged by the arrest with improper registration furnished the excuse for the supervisors of election to strike them from the lists and prevent them from voting. Among those who were thus seized and arrested for being improperly registered was a respectable member of this House from the State of Louisiana, then a candidate for Representative in Congress, a man who was speaking in public day by day; yet he was arrested with others, showing the purpose to be not the protection of the ballot-box from fraudulent votes, but to use the power of the Federal Government for the purpose of keeping legal voters from the polls.

Now turn to the city of New York. Nine thousand warrants issued; nine thousand affidavits made upon the direction of the supervisor, he having no knowledge of the men against whom they were made, knowing nothing except as he said that he had made up his mind that naturalizations which took place in 1868 were necessarily fraudulent and illegal, although in precisely the same form and with precisely the same entries as had been had in the same courts from the year 1854—although many of these naturalizations were made in a court where the present Federal circuit judge of New York presided as one of the judges. In spite of all this, the supervisor procured to be made nine thousand warrants; and when the issuing and service of the warrant did not deter the voter from expressing a desire and determination to vote, he was locked up in the cage of the supervisor and held till the poll was closed, or until he promised to abandon the idea of voting, when he was permitted to go free. And this radicals call preserving free and pure elections. Oh, yes, it made it free for a republican to vote, and made it pure by scaring away or keeping away the voters of foreign birth, whose ballots in the same box would contaminate the ballot of the shoddy aristocracy who had grown rich under radical misrule.

These are two instances of the abuse of power, and I cite them because they are the most pronounced that have yet been developed. There was no waiting for any fraudulent attempt to vote; but upon the mere direction of the supervisor alone, warrants were issued against persons unknown, to the number of eighty-one hundred in the city of New Orleans (enough to have prevented the democrats from carrying that city) and over nine thousand in the city of New York—showing the purpose to be the same—the two cities remote, but each of the supervisors acting under the same general rule.

Look at it in another view. There are in this Government at least one hundred thousand Federal office-holders, exclusive of men engaged in the navy-yards and upon public buildings, with an aggregate of yearly compensation of $31,252,107.26. What percentage of tax upon this sum is required to raise a million of money for the purpose of corrupting the sources of liberty, the freedom of the ballot-box? But this large number of office-holders is not enough to satisfy the demands of the dominant party. By the act now under consideration they give the marshal of the district authority to appoint just as many special deputy marshals as he sees proper. Thus he may add to the one hundred thousand men who furnish the means to carry on the campaign just so many thousand Federal marshals as he may see proper, who, armed with the power of the Government and paid at the rate of $5 per day out of the Federal Treasury, may surround every ballot-box in the United States, peddling republican tickets. It is time there was end of this. Let politicians use their own funds, and not tax the people to pay the expenses of the men who are struggling to defeat and thwart the will of the people!

You may say this is not a fair statement of the case. I speak of it as the existence of a power. While you give the power to the marshal, it depends upon his discretion how he will exercise it; and if the emergency of the case demands, he will exercise it so as to meet the emergency, and his power is unlimited. It is a power I would be unwilling to see my own party possessed of; and while I would resist it in its exercise, I must be permitted to make a vigorous protest against intrusting its use to the opposition. Let us now look at it in an economical view. In 1876 we paid out of the Federal Treasury for these republican ticket peddlers over a quarter of a million of dollars. In the last congressional campaign we paid over $200,000. If you examine the districts in which that money was expended you will find it was expended in the close election districts, where the use of money and the appliances of the Federal Government "would do the most good." It will not do for people to go upon the theory or for any party or any set of men to plant themselves upon the ground that all honesty, all intelligence, all respect for the law rests with them, and that all crime and all fraudulent intent and purpose rests with the other party. But such is the key-note of the republican canvass. This expenditure of money is always put, not in republican districts, but in democratic districts which are close. We say there ought to be an end to this. This thing has gone on long enough. And when we point to all these sources of fraud of which you speak, and show that that fraud took place under the immediate inspection and eye of these men, we have answered all objections you make to our repeal of this law.

But it was said by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. McKINLEY] that when we consent to allow the supervisors to remain as the witnesses of the canvass we have confessed judgment against the constitutional view we have urged. Not so. This House is judge of the qualifications of its own members. This House is to determine the legality of the election of any of its members. So this House or this Congress may, if it see fit for the purpose of securing information for itself to control its action in determining contested seats, appoint, designate by law, or authorize the appointment of two men, who may be present at every poll, having no power to interrupt or to interfere with the State law, but who stand there simply as witnesses, so that in the event of a contest arising upon the legality of the election of any member of this body we have two chosen witnesses of opposite political faith upon whom we can call, and upon whose testimony we can rely. Their standing there as witnesses in no wise interferes with the question we make as to the constitutionality and propriety of the law which clothes persons not with the function of witnesses, but with Federal authority to interrupt and to interfere with the elections going on in the States; and that is the distinction we make. We consent to give you the witnesses, that the last pretense on your part, that we intend fraud, may be done away with, for by this act we provide for the evidence to secure its detection and punishment.

Mr. Chairman, there has been much said upon this question of the method of legislation adopted by the majority in reference to the Army bill and this bill. It was declared at the outset upon the one side to be revolutionary. Five days afterward, after that declaration had been spread broadcast over the land and the telegraph had carried it to every section of the country, we find coming into this House the same gentleman, [Mr. GARFIELD,] who is charged with having uttered those declarations, and announcing that he never made any such statement. Now I submit, Mr. Chairman, in all frankness, and I desire to treat him with all candor, that he is mistaken in his declaration that he had never made any such utterance, and in order to sustain myself I desire to read the statements from his own carefully prepared speech made in this House March 29, 1879, as it appears in the RECORD of Tuesday, April 1:

> I have no hope,
> Said he—
> of being able to convey to the members of this House my own conviction of the very great gravity and solemnity of the crisis which this decision of the Chair and of the Committee of the Whole has brought upon this country.

What was that decision, Mr. Chairman? It was that the section which authorizes the repeal of so much of the statute as directed troops to keep peace at the polls was germane to the pending bill.

> I wish I could be proved a false prophet in reference to the result of this action. I wish I could be overwhelmed with the proof that I am utterly mistaken in my views. But no view I have ever taken has entered more deeply and more seriously into my convictions than this: that this House has to-day resolved to enter upon a revolution against the Constitution and Government of the United States.

What language can be more explicit than that the ruling of the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole that this provision was germane to the pending bill was the entering upon a revolution against the Constitution and Government of the United States. But he says again:

Let it be understood that I am not arguing the merits of any one of the three amendments. I am discussing the proposed method of legislation, and I declare that it is against the Constitution of our country. It is revolutionary to the core, and is destructive of the fundamental element of American liberty, the free consent of all the powers that unite to make laws.

What was revolutionary to the core? The admitting this amendment to go upon the Army appropriation bill.

Again he says:

Let it be understood that I am not discussing the merits of this law. I have merely turned aside from the line of my argument to show the inconsistency of the other side in proposing to stop the Government if they cannot force the repeal of a law which they themselves made. I am discussing a method of revolution against the Constitution now proposed by this House, and to that issue I hold gentlemen in this debate, and challenge them to reply.

That went broadcast over the country, and, as I said this afternoon, instead of meeting the response which it was supposed it would meet from the country there came back a derisive laugh of mockery; and while that revolution was going on, and while the Constitution of this country was being undermined and the confederates were alleged to have seized the Capitol and set about the destruction of the Government, for the first time in its history Government 4 per cent. bonds were offered at a premium and one hundred and ninety millions were taken in a single day at a premium, and the capital of the country licked its chops for more; a fit comment that upon the idea that the people of this country supposed for a moment we were entering upon any revolution. Revolution, forsooth! It is a word of fearful meaning and import, that makes every true American heart shudder, but it was made and used as a catch-word to stand as the war-cry of radicalism—1861 was to be fought over again. But this congressional revolution was short-lived, and on the 5th day of April I find in the RECORD, uttered by the same gentleman:

I never claimed that it was either revolutionary or unconstitutional for this House to put a rider on an appropriation bill. No man on this side of the House has claimed that. The most that has been said is that it is considered a bad parliamentary practice; and all parties in this country have said that repeatedly.

I give the distinguished gentleman the benefit of his denial; but the RECORD requires great ingenuity to reconcile the different statements.

Mr. Chairman, from whence comes the charge of revolution? Any one familiar with the history of the country will see tacked on the Post-Office appropriation bill in the Forty-fifth Congress what was known as the Brazilian subsidy, and when that piece of legislation came to this House, any one who will examine the record will find that the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] voted "ay," and so he has voted in every single Congress of which he has been a member for legislation on appropriation bills in one form or another. He was present in this House and he participated in the debate with the present Chief Executive of this nation when a rider was put upon an appropriation bill which robbed the President of his constitutional power, and not only robbed him of his constitutional power as Commander-in-Chief of the Army of the United States, but it did more: it made it a penal offense for an officer of the United States Army to bear, receive, or execute an order from the constitutional Commander-in-Chief, punishable by not less than two years and not more than twenty years' imprisonment. You made an article of impeachment against the President of the United States, who sought to exercise his power and communicate with his subordinates.

Where, where was Roderick then?
One blast upon his bugle-horn
Were worth a thousand men.

His bugle being silent like the harp of the Jews upon the willows; no fingers to sweep the chords, no breath to blow the blast. The present Chief Magistrate of the nation then honored the House by the occupancy of a seat therein and he, too, was silent!

These articles of impeachment passed this House, and both of these distinguished gentlemen were present and neither of them then raised his voice in behalf of the Constitution and against the assault made upon it. Another appropriation bill I think the distinguished gentleman from Ohio, who was a member of this House at that time, voted for, a bill taking away the effect of a pardon, and declaring by legislation after pardon was granted what should be its effect. And it will be marked, too, that it struck alike at the pardons granted by the lamented Lincoln and President Johnson.

Ohio had her Representative here then, but again his voice was silent. It will occupy too much time to single out these bills, but it will suffice to say that you will find almost continuously each year from 1793 down to the present legislation upon appropriation bills. And although it has been the invariable rule for the minority to complain, the complaint as a general rule (some exception, it is true, exists thereto) proceeds from a disposition to antagonize and defeat the majority without any other substantial reason therefor.

I contend, in the very reason of the thing and from the necessities arising from press of business, that legislation on an appropriation bill is not per se exceptionable. Why? First, it is very proper when you make a grant to affix such terms to it as you may desire, and the party making the grant has the right to judge of the terms; second, after the first few weeks of a session it is in the power of a factious minority to defeat important legislation by keeping bills either unreported or tied up by some parliamentary device. The Appropriations Committee can get the floor at any time, and thus if you can attach your measure to it you may save the life of most important legislation that would otherwise die for want of being reached in its regular order.

But, sir, I am trespassing too long upon the time of the committee; but before concluding I must again deny that the democratic party is of revolutionary tendency. It has at heart the well-being, the prosperity, and happiness of this country. And why should it not have? It is a child of its own creation. It sprang into life upon the principles which underlie the democratic party. It grew and strengthened, and was prosperous to a degree such as no nation ever witnessed, under the control of the democratic party. It is its own offspring, its own child. And when the democratic party was severed asunder the country was for the first time in danger. Churches had divided; the "Federal convention" had been held; secession had shown its head in the North at Hartford, it had shown its head at the South in South Carolina; but while the old democratic party stood solid together secession was as the wave that strikes the rock of Gibraltar and is broken asunder and scattered in harmless drops at the base of that impregnable fortress.

When the cloud of war hung over us we joined with all classes and creeds to strike down armed opposition to the Government. And now when peace reigns within our borders, the democracy, true to the teachings of the fathers, joins hands with every creed and race in securing to them and to us and to generations yet to come the blessings of civil liberty under the form handed down to us from our ancestry—a simple Republic, trusting for its strength upon the love of its citizens and the wisdom of its laws.

Sir, if it be true that our party is revolutionary and that we have not the good of the country at heart, but will sacrifice all for mere party advancement, as the radicals claim to believe, what better proof to give the lie to the assertion than its quiet submission to the count in 1876, when a majority of more than a quarter of a million of freemen lost the fruit of their suffrage and for the sake of order and the prosperity and happiness of the country quietly bided the time when again through the medium of the ballot-box the wrong could be undone. Sir, when the historian shall write the history of this decade he will point to that submission by the majority to the minority. Considering the elements of which the majority was composed, with the country just emerged from war, times depressed, the poor clamoring for labor or bread, and hundreds of thousands of trained soldiers in idleness and with scarcely the means of support, he will mark that event as the eighth wonder of the world, possible only in free America!

Sir, if we desired revolution there has not been a day since the sitting of this Congress that the majority could not have by its vote declared Mr. Tilden President and refused to recognize the authority of the present Chief Executive. What stronger proof is necessary to repel the charge of revolutionary purpose?

Mr. Chairman, we seek no revolution but a revolution of public sentiment which shall wipe out the extraordinary legislation, the natural concomitant of war. The union of the "blue and the gray" upon this side of the Chamber means a desire to bring this Government to the scale of constitutional law, and no more. The success of the democratic party means an economical administration of the restored Government; it means the cutting off of swarms of office-holders who waste the substances of the people; it means no more subsidies, no more class legislation; it means the subordination of the military to the civil power; it means a free, pure ballot-box and an honest count of the ballot cast, whether it be for or against us; it means, in fine, a return to the Jeffersonian doctrine—equal rights for all, but favors to none! If this be what you term revolution, then from city, hamlet, and prairie there are millions of voices shouting: "God speed such a revolution!"

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I shall not attempt in the remarks I propose to submit to the committee to argue at any length the legal or constitutional questions involved, but shall address myself more particularly to the practical workings of the system of Federal interference in elections which has been inaugurated by the statutes we are now asking this House to repeal. In my humble judgment the enactment of this law was a step toward centralization never contemplated by the Constitution, and no student of the history of either our State or National Government can come to any other conclusion than that this enactment was a bold innovation on the laws and customs of our ancestors to get possession of the election machinery of the States for the basest of partisan purposes. And I assert now that it was originally intended and has been solely exercised in the interest and for the triumph of the republican party. Under this statute they have supplied themselves with money from the Treasury of the United States to bribe and corrupt the elective franchise, which is the foundation of all good government.

If the Government is to be pure and the people are to be free, the election of all officers must be free and unobstructed by Federal interference. This law gives the monstrous power to a partisan President of appointing a partisan marshal, and to that marshal the authority to appoint innumerable deputy marshals, the political existence of all depending on the success of a certain political organization. Who will be bold enough to say that this force thus officered will not use every power conferred upon them by the law to give success to that political party to which they belong? These marshals are invested with dangerous and arbitrary powers—the power of arresting on the day of election thousands of voters without warrant and due process of law, to be dismissed after the voting is over without being heard and without a trial.

It is conceded on all sides that the State, and the State only, has the right to invest the citizen with the sacred right of suffrage—to make him a voter. The United States has no voters, and under the Constitution has only the authority to regulate the time and manner of holding elections. It has no power under the Constitution to say that a voter shall have certain qualifications; but that is left to the State, and the Federal authority must accept the voter as the State has created him.

We have, under the authority conferred by this statute, a marshal surrounded by an indefinite number of deputy marshals, all appointed by the chief marshal, and under the pay of the administration in power, ready to do any act of despotism necessary to defeat one candidate and elect another. They are stationed around the polls on election day and protected by statute from all State interference. They are above State authority, and the voter who owes his existence to the State can be forced away from the voting place, arrested, dragged to prison, and the State cannot lift its finger to either protect its voter or punish the marshal.

But let us here inquire what these Federal guardians of this most sacred of all the privileges of an American freeman can do on election day under this statute. It provides most amply and fully for its agent to literally take possession of the elective franchise by declaring that any person who refuses or neglects to aid and assist any supervisor of election, or marshal or his general or special deputies, or either of them, in the performance of his or their duties when required by him or them, or either of them, to give such aid and assistance, shall be liable to instant arrest without process, and shall be punished by imprisonment not more than two years, or by fine not more than $3,000, or by both such fine and imprisonment, and shall pay the costs of prosecution. The arbitrary power conferred is enough to condemn this law with all lovers of free government. It has been in operation only a few years, but even at this early day of its enforcement it is marked by the most shameful outrages against the liberty of the peaceful and law-abiding citizen.

They have been arrested without process, without being informed of the cause of arrest, incarcerated in prison with common malefactors, and then, when the time for voting had passed, discharged without being brought to trial. Those outraged citizens thus deprived of their liberty, robbed of the elective franchise, and humiliated with the disgrace of arrest have thus far, I am told, appealed in vain for redress. Could despotism do more to humiliate the citizen? Could it do more to arm dangerous, unprincipled, and corrupt partisans with arbitrary power? Could a more cunning machinery be invented to poison the true source of power, a free and fair election? If you arm the corrupt partisan with power to do as he pleases with the voter, it is the same thing as giving the elective franchise to the party in power.

I insist that the experience we have had in the execution of this statute has more than developed that it will always be used as a mere party machine, and in this connection I call attention to the following facts: The republican party has had the appointing of supervisors and marshals, and almost without exception they have been republicans. The deputy marshals have not been selected from that class called reputable citizens, but rather from that irresponsible class commonly called ward politicians, who live by doing the dirty work of a partisan campaign. They are known in many cases to be men of vicious habits and associations; men who for the per diem will do the despotic behests of a partisan leader; care, as a general rule, for no party, and are destitute of all the qualities of good citizens. They have been rarely employed in cities where there was a large republican majority, but always in those cities where a small number of votes would turn the scale of fortune in their favor; and their use has generally been followed by republican success.

In the entire history of the execution of this statute I do not believe there is a single instance of the arrest of a citizen who intended to vote the republican ticket, but with marked fatality the citizen interfered with has been a democrat. This proves one of two things, either that the republican party has all the good citizens in its organization and the democratic party all the bad, or that the republican party has been guilty of great abuse and has trampled under its feet for party success a most sacred constitutional right. That it is not the pure party the first proposition would indicate we have only to call before us in mournful retrospect its individual and public history. Many of its great leaders who would scorn to wear the badge of a deputy marshal have felt the withering blight of public scorn for official misdeeds. Those who have studied the history of the last few years will be very slow to believe that the purity of the republican party is such that elections are always fair in cities where they are in an overwhelming majority, and that fraud and corruption has only invaded the ballot-box in those where the democrats are in the majority.

It is just as singular that no republican voter is ever arrested by supervisor, marshal, or deputy marshal, or either of them; and when you take this fact in connection with their use in democratic districts only, it is plain that the statute is made an instrument by which to get rid of democratic votes. And then another fact which will, I think, strike the critical and candid observer of political events is that hundreds of arrests have been made by these officers and the citizen deprived of his vote, yet they have never been convicted of the offense for which they were arrested.

I now wish, Mr. Chairman, to call more particular attention to the phraseology of the statute in regard to the appointment of marshals and deputy marshals. Upon the application of two citizens in any city having a population of twenty thousand at the last Federal census the marshal of the district in which the city is situated shall appoint special deputy marshals for the purpose of "keeping the peace, preserving order, preventing fraudulent registration and voting, or fraudulent conduct on the part of any officer of election." The number of such deputy marshals is entirely in the power of the marshal, the law leaving the number indefinite.

This would be considered a dangerous power to grant to any two men in any city, however honest, reputable, intelligent, and patriotic they might be. But when this power is granted to any two citizens, without regard to character, it can but stagger and appall the well-informed citizen, who knows that our large cities are full of men of the most unworthy and disreputable character who would not hesitate for a small consideration to "petition in writing" for the appointment of these officers. These worthy or unworthy citizens are not required to make oath to the petition, but it is necessary to make the application in writing only. Thus, Mr. Chairman, two citizens who reside in such city may make the application, which the marshal must obey, and compel, as it were, the organization of a force, which may comprehend an indefinite number of men, to swarm around the polls, thus holding in their irresponsible hands every attribute of despotic authority to do what they please in carrying out this law. They or either of them can summon every other citizen or soldier to their assistance. If they refuse they do so with a penalty staring them in the face of "imprisonment for not more than two years, or a fine of not more than $3,000, or by both such fine and imprisonment, and shall pay the cost of prosecution."

These officers or either of them can arrest with or without process any citizen whom they suppose to have "committed, or attempted or offered to commit, any of the acts prohibited in this law," thus giving them the power to arrest as many voters as they see proper. The election is for one day only, and before the party can free himself from arrest by the embarrassing mode prescribed by the law the day is gone and the voter has lost his franchise. Two citizens are all that is necessary to start this machinery in motion which can take from any citizen his vote, subject him to arbitrary arrest and loss of personal liberty, while he is left utterly powerless to redress his wrongs or punish the officer who has ruthlessly invaded his rights. This machinery when put in motion by these two citizens, who in a majority of cases would be unable to give a bond to keep the peace, entails a cost upon the general tax-payer of thousands upon thousands of dollars. This machinery, Mr. Chairman, costing the Government many hundred thousand dollars, will never in the nature of things be invoked except for the very meanest of partisan ends.

It is bad and demoralizing enough that the office-holders of an administration should be taxed, from the highest to the lowest, to furnish a corruption fund to keep an unworthy party in power; but how infinitely worse that the Treasury of the United States should be used to pay a horde of hireling partisans to infest the polls and compel a majority by the intimidation and browbeating of honest citizens! These deputy marshals are so completely protected from responsibility for their own acts that we cannot resist the inference that the inventors of this infamous law intended that they should be impressed with their irresponsibility, so that they might feel a perfect freedom from interference in the discharge of orders received from political headquarters. The deputy marshal is only required to be a citizen, without regard to character; he may be a drunkard, pimp, or even an ex-convict; while every other officer under our laws who has the power of arrest cannot assume the duties of his office without first giving a bond that he will faithfully discharge the duties of his office. This is true in regard to all officers of this character, with the exception of the police in our cities, and in that case the city treasury is responsible for all illegal acts resulting in the distress and damage of the citizen.

The deputy marshal, without giving a bond, can do all acts of arbitrary arrest, and the outraged citizen has nowhere to look for redress when wrongfully and arbitrarily arrested. I presume, Mr. Chairman, if the entire list of deputy marshals in all the cities where they have been employed were critically investigated we would not find one in twenty responsible in damages for false arrest. This was true in the election of 1876 in the third district of Saint Louis, now represented by my colleague, [Mr. FROST.]

The gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. MCKINLEY,] a few days ago, said:

> What will the democratic party say of the grave accusation from one of the party leaders, that for a consideration, and that too for an appointment as deputy marshal for a single day, democrats will break away from their party affiliations, surrender their convictions, and vote the republican ticket?

It seems to me the gentleman has extraordinary faith to believe that among all the members of any political organization none can be found in its ranks who could be seduced from his party fealty by the consideration of an appointment, with its per diem, which is not, as the gentleman says, for a single day, but may be for ten days. In the election in Saint Louis in 1876 the term of service was, 1 for one-half day, 139 for one day, 435 for two days, 138 for three days, 89 for four days, 63 for five days, 68 for six days, 18 for seven days, 4 for nine days, and 55 for ten days. Mr. Chairman, it is the misfortune of our times, and perhaps it has always been so, that men can be found in all political organizations who will sell the elective franchise for a very small consideration. In the election just alluded to it was proven by sworn testimony that men received commissions as deputy marshals in consideration that they would vote for the republican candidate for Congress.

The gentleman's confidence is remarkable when we must believe that instances of official corruption in high and low places in his own party are fresh in his memory. The dignity of the Cabinet was not sufficient to restrain a distinguished leader in his party, supposed to be of lofty character, from soiling his official hands with the corrupt use of his position for money.

It must be in the memory of all, the saddest memory in official life of the present generation, that the men who manipulated the vote in the last presidential election have each and all been rewarded with the best offices in the gift of the President.

But the same gentleman also says:

Again, it is urged that the presence of supervisors and deputy marshals intimidates the democratic voter. Who ever heard of an officer of the law deterring anybody from doing what he had a legal right to do? Their presence is a restraint upon no honest voter. They prevent no citizen who is a legal voter by the laws of his State or the United States from freely and peaceably exercising that right.

This is a most remarkable declaration for the intelligent gentleman from Ohio to make, and we can only account for it by supposing that he has not read the evidence taken by the sub-committee of the Judiciary Committee of the last Congress in regard to the intimidation of voters at the last election in New York City. There was a wholesale arrest of naturalized citizens on the pretense that their papers were irregular, and many of them prevented from exercising their legal right to vote. I want no better illustration, Mr. Chairman, of the abuse of power, to insult and intimidate the voter by supervisors and marshals, than was exercised at this election. That the country may understand how the republican party will use the powers conferred by this law in the future, if it is suffered to remain on the statute-book, I will read a portion of the evidence of the first witness sworn by this committee:

Edwin J. Denning sworn and examined.

By Mr. WINGATE:

Question. What is your business?
Answer. Dry goods.
Q. You are superintendent of the uptown store of A. T. Stewart & Co.?
A. Yes, sir; superintendent of the retail store.
Q. How many men have you under your charge as superintendent of that store?
A. It ranges from five hundred to one thousand people.
Q. When did you come to America?
A. In 1860.
Q. When were you naturalized?
A. In November, 1868.
Q. Who was your witness?
A. Alfred M. Weeks.
Q. Where is he employed?
A. In our store.
Q. Before what judge were you naturalized in 1868?
A. I declared it my intention some three years previously.
Q. Were you naturalized in the regular way?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. After you were naturalized, did you vote?
A. Yes, sir; right straight along.
Q. Until 1878?
A. Yes, sir; until that time.
Q. Tell the committee what happened when you went to register.
A. I registered in the same house that I always did, in Fourth avenue, near Tenth; I had been registered there all along. I have lived at No. 84 East Ninth street between six and seven years. The last week of October, I think about the 25th, I went to this same place that I had always been registered and offered my name and address, &c., which was taken. As I was on the point of leaving the gentleman there said he would like to see my papers, and I gave them to him and waited for him to return them. He said he would not give them back. I told him at once, says I, "That is a little bit singular; won't you give me some receipt for it?" "No," says he; "I do not want to do anything whatever."
Q. On that occasion were you informed that your papers were illegal in any way?
A. No. I tried to find out as to that, but I did not get any positive information.
Q. What steps did you take after that to find out if there was anything the matter with the papers?
A. I referred the matter to the lawyer of the house of A. T. Stewart & Co., Mr. H. H. Rice. I requested him to get me a duplicate, telling him that if there was anything wrong about it I would like to know it; and I believe he wrote to Mr. O'Brien, the chief clerk of elections in the city of New York, in regard to it. Mr. Rice received an answer from him, stating that he had no doubt it would be all right, and at the same time I received the duplicate of my papers.
Q. On election day you went to vote?
A. I went to vote. I walked out of the store without any overcoat on, the polling place being right next door. I went in and offered my vote. The gentleman there called to another person, who came up and told me that I was arrested.
Q. Did you have an opportunity to vote?
A. Oh, no. They would not let me vote. I had my ballot all ready, and presented it, but they would not allow it.
Q. Were you taken away?
A. Yes, sir; right off.
Q. Where?
A. First of all down to Clinton place.
Q. From there where were you taken?
A. Down to the city hall.
Q. You mean the post-office building, do you not?
A. Yes, sir; the United States court-house and post-office building.
Q. Please state what took place when you came down here.
A. The place was all in confusion. There was an immense number of men around. There was no getting at anything or anybody. I was running around from one room to another, first one way and then another; up-stairs to the third floor, down to the second floor, up to the fourth floor, and in three or four places.
Q. Mr. Rice was present?
A. Yes, sir; he was present, and offered to bail me.
Q. You were taken before Commissioner Davenport?
A. Yes. Finally I was taken to one of the gentlemen.
Q. Which of the commissioners?
A. I think it was Commissioner Deuel.
Q. What took place before him?
A. He wanted me to give bond for my appearance, which I rather demurred to.
Q. Did Commissioner Deuel say anything to you as to whether you had voted or not?
A. He asked me whether I had voted.
Q. Was there anything said as to whether you would or would not vote?
A. That was afterward. Commissioner Davenport allowed me to go, with the understanding that I would not vote.
Q. Then you went before Commissioner Davenport?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. State what took place before him.
A. Commissioner Davenport was very courteous in his manner. I told him that I would like to be allowed to go to vote, and he said that I could not vote; that I would not be allowed to go if I did not promise not to vote, and sooner than stay there all day I said that I would not vote.
Q. Were you here in the back part of the court-room?
A. Yes, sir; I was hustled all around everywhere.
Q. By this time there was quite a little bit of a crowd in the court-room, wasn't there?
A. Yes, sir; I almost had my coat dragged off of me getting through the doors.
Q. You remarked that you had no overcoat on when you came out; was it a cold day?
A. Yes, sir; I expected to be gone from the store but a few moments, and therefore I did not take my overcoat.
Q. Of course you suffered?
A. Of course I did. The whole thing was the greatest outrage I ever saw perpetrated; I positively would not have believed it unless I had experienced it myself.
Q. Was it suggested to Commissioner Davenport that the business of your house was suffering from your absence?
A. I believe Mr. Rice remarked something in that way to him.
Q. What time was it that you were finally released?
A. It must have been on towards two o'clock.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Did you promise Mr. Davenport that you would not vote?
A. Yes, sir; that was the only way in which I was allowed to go.

This is only one from several hundred who were arrested on that day. In this city the attempt was made by a Mr. Davenport, who is said to have been the author of the election law we now desire to repeal, to strike from the list of voters of the city of New York four or five thousand naturalized citizens, who had been voting uninterruptedly without challenge since 1868. To give this House and the country some idea of the despotic power assumed by this individual, the intimidation, the insult, and the humiliation offered to naturalized citizens, I will now read an extract from the remarks of one of the counsel for one of the arrested men:

Such a scene as the room of the court presented on that election day has never before been witnessed in this city, or in this country, and it is to be hoped never will again. From early morning until after the polls were closed these rooms were packed and jammed with a mass of prisoners and deputy marshals. Not only were they crowded beyond their capacity, but the halls and corridors were thronged with those who were unable to obtain admission, so that the counsel representing the prisoners and the bondsmen who were to be offered to secure their release had the greatest difficulty and were frequently unsuccessful in obtaining entrance. In addition to all this, was this delectable iron pen on the upper floor in which men were crowded until it resembled the black hole of Calcutta, and where they were kept for hours, hungry, thirsty, suffering in every way until their cases could be reached. With scarcely an exception these men had gone to the polls expecting to be absent but a short time. Many of them were thinly clad. Numbers had sick wives or children. Some were sick themselves. There were carmen who had left their horses standing in the public streets; men whose situations depended upon their speedy return; men who wished to leave the city on certain trains. Every imaginable vexation, inconvenience, injury, and wrong which the mind can conceive, existed in their cases, so that it was painful for the counsel who were endeavoring to secure their release to approach sufficiently near the railing to hear their piteous appeals and witness the distress which they had no power to alleviate. And over all this pushing, struggling, complaining crowd Mr. Commissioner John I. Davenport sat supreme, with a sort of oriental magnificence—calmly indifferent to everything but the single fact that no man who was arrested was allowed to vote.

But, Mr. Chairman, the great objection to this law, as it has been interpreted by the highest law-officers of the Government, is that it places in the hands of those supervisors and marshals not only the power of summoning every citizen to assist in the arrest of any other citizen who may have offered to disregard the law, but they may also call to their aid so much of the Army of the United States as may be in the neighborhood of any city where the powers of this law have been invoked under the pretense of giving a free election. In this connection I desire to have read a portion of the instructions given to these officers in the elections of 1876 by the highest law-officer of the Government, the Attorney-General under President Grant. I allude to Mr. Taft, of Ohio, a State which seems to have a contract at present for carrying on the Government in the interest of the republican party. In his instructions from the Department of Justice, Washington, September 9, 1876, he says:

In discharging the duties above mentioned you will doubtless receive the countenance and support of all the good citizens of the United States in your respective districts. It is not necessary to say that it is upon such countenance and support that the United States mainly rely in their endeavor to enforce the right to vote which they have given or have secured. The present instructions are intended only to counteract that partial malice, wrongheadedness, or inconsideration which sometimes triumphs at critical moments over the conservative and, in general, prevailing forces of society, and to which the present and passing condition of the country gives more than ordinary strength, and, therefore, requires the Government particularly to observe and provide against.

In this connection I advise that you and each of your deputies, general and "special," have a right to summon to your assistance, in preventing and quelling disorder, "every person in the district above fifteen years of age, whatever may be their occupation, whether civilians or not, and including the military of all denominations, militia, soldiers, marines, all of whom are alike bound to obey you. The fact that they are organized as military bodies, (whether of the State or of the United States,) under the immediate command of their own officers, does not in any wise affect their legal character. They are still the posse comitatus." I prefer to quote the above statement of the law upon this point from an opinion by my predecessor, Attorney-General Cushing, because it thus appears to have been well settled for many years.—6 Opinions, 466, May 27, 1854.

Now, sir, this is virtually placing the military arm of the Government at the disposition of any ignorant partisan who may have been selected from purely partisan motives.

Is it intended, Mr. Chairman, that the ward politician, a specimen of our citizenship who is entitled to very little respect, shall have a power that our fathers supposed was too great and dangerous to be intrusted to the President of the United States? The sentiment of all parties from the foundation of the Government has been universally in condemnation of the presence of any kind of military organization at the polls, whether it be militia or regular soldiers. The use of the military as a civil police—a police to interfere with the rights that specifically belong to the States under the Constitution—has been held by the best authority in all parties to be against public policy and the Constitution. In 1856 Mr. Seward, who was then justly regarded as the exponent of the sentiment of the republican party, and was then regarded as the probable candidate of the republican party for President, said in the Senate:

Civil liberty and a standing army for the purposes of civil police have never yet stood together, and never can stand together. If I am to choose, sir, between upholding laws in any part of this Republic which cannot be maintained without a standing army, or relinquishing the laws themselves, I give up the laws at once, by whomsoever they are made and by whatever authority; for either our system of government is radically wrong, or such laws are unjust, unequal, and pernicious.

This was the sentiment which impelled most of the States in framing their organic laws to make provision against the possible interference of soldiers at elections. That there may be no mistake in regard to this statement, although it may seem tedious, I will insert in my remarks extracts from the laws of different northern States, showing that the liberty-loving ancestry of these different States were not only strongly of the opinion but were convinced that the liberty of the citizen could not exist except by a fair election, uninfluenced by the intimidating presence of an officer with troops, or, which is the same thing, civil officers who are invested with the power of summoning soldiers to protect the voter. They knew full well that partisan zeal, made bitter by a long-continued canvass and the acrimonies that political debate always engenders, would impel any party that was in power to use every means that the law placed at their command to give success to the party they espoused; and hence they thought it necessary in most of the States to provide by law that there should be no military interference at the polls. But listen to the expression of opinion on this subject from the following States:

Penalties for violation of election laws.

NEW YORK.

If any officer or other person shall call out or order any of the militia of this State, to appear and exercise on any day during any election to be held by virtue of this chapter, or within five days previous thereto, except in cases of invasion or insurrection, he shall forfeit the sum of $500 for every such offense.—Revised Statutes of New York State, chapter 6, title 7, section 5, page 443.

MAINE.

If any officer of the militia parades his men or exercises any military command on a day of election of a public officer, as described in section 102 of chapter 10 and not thereby excepted, or except in time of war or public danger, he shall for each offense forfeit not less than $10, nor more than $300.—Revised Statutes of Maine, chapter 4, section 65, page 104.

PENNSYLVANIA.

No body of troops in the Army of the United States, or of this Commonwealth, shall be present, either armed or unarmed, at any place of election within this Commonwealth during the time of such election: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to prevent any officer or soldier from exercising the right of suffrage in the election district to which he may belong, if otherwise qualified according to law.—Brightley's Purdon's Digest, 1872; Pennsylvania; section 124, page 562.

NEW JERSEY.

No such election shall be appointed to be held on any day on which the militia of this State shall be required to do military duty, nor shall the militia of this State be required to do military duty on any day on which any such election shall be appointed to be held.—Nixon's Digest; New Jersey, revision of 1871; an act to regulate elections; section 33, page 262.

ILLINOIS.

Electors shall, in all cases except treason, felony, or breach of the peace, be privileged from arrest during their attendance at elections, and in going to and returning from the same, and no elector shall be obliged to do military duty on the days of election, except in time of war or public danger.—Revised Statutes Illinois, 1874; Constitution 1870, article 7, section 3.

MASSACHUSETTS.

No meeting for the election of national, State, district, county, city, or town officers shall be held on a day upon which the militia of the Commonwealth are by law required to do military duty.—General Statutes of Massachusetts, 1860, section 1, page 58.

If this is true in regard to State elections, why should it not be true in regard to Federal elections? They occur now in most of the States on the same day, so that an interference with one is an interference with the other. If the party in power chooses to use the power which this law offers, it cannot only influence the election of the members of Congress, but must necessarily control at the same time the election of all State officers. Let me ask, then, Mr. Chairman, what the statutes and constitutional provisions in these different States amount to in protecting elections from interference? If this law is to remain in force, to be used every two years for the election of members of Congress by the party in majority, they might as well burn up the statutes and quietly submit themselves to the tender mercies of a partisan administration, which may be either democratic or republican.

We have heard much in this debate from the other side of the House about the revolutionary policy of the democratic party in insisting on making the repeal of these obnoxious election laws a rider on appropriation bills. It is talked of as though this method of repealing laws was resorted to for the first time. They have changed front since the days of 1856, when the question came up in the precise form in which it is now presented, with one difference, which I have no doubt will seem to the country remarkable, if not extraordinary. The difference then was that the House was republican and the Senate democratic. The Kansas trouble was the difficulty which was agitating the public mind, and, curious to recall, the present Secretary of the Treasury put an amendment on an Army appropriation bill prohibiting the use of the Army or any part of it in the execution of the laws of the Kansas Legislature. I believe it was the democrats who denounced the measure as revolutionary, and the republican leaders, such men as Seward, Henry Wilson, Ben Wade, William Pitt Fessenden, and many others who have been illustrious in the republican party, spoke on the other side of the question. In that debate Mr. Wade enlightened the country with the following sentiment:

I say the House of Representatives have done right. Here we are told it is revolutionary, and therefore we must not breathe the breath of life into their action, but must permit it to go back to the House with an appeal to the House to recede. Sir, I do not know but that you may succeed under the idea that this is revolution; but, so help me God! I hope that the man who proposes to recede a hair's breadth from the action of the House will never find his way back again. Has it come to this, that if the House of Representatives do not think proper to frame a bill for the support of the Army of the country, appropriating twelve millions, in a way to satisfy the majority in this body, revolution shall follow and the responsibility be upon the House? Pray, sir, how? Because they will not agree to do as the Senate tells them they shall do.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] would now denounce these sentiments as revolutionary and an effort of the confederate brigadiers to get back into power.

Mr. Fessenden, who was then one of the republican leaders of the Senate, expressed himself in the same decided manner as follows:

In the English Parliament from the earliest times not only have appropriation and revenue bills gone together, but in cases without number it has been the habit of that Parliament to check the power of the Crown by annexing conditions to their appropriation of money. Does he not know that the only mode in which our ancestors of Massachusetts checked the powers of their royal governors was by granting money only on conditions? The power to supply and the power of annexing conditions to supply have always gone together in parliamentary history; and their joint exercise has never been denounced as a case of revolution, or calling for revolution, or tending to produce revolution in any shape or form whatever. It is a power essential to the preservation of our liberties.

And so with all the leaders of the republican party. But now we are told that we are going to starve the Government to death by the same men who were stalwarts in defending the propriety and justness of annexing conditions to an appropriation bill.

Mr. Chairman, the issue is fair and square between the two parties; the one for continuing in force laws originally enacted for the purpose of giving the party in power, the republican party, the means of interference in elections, so as to control the House of Representatives; and the other, the democratic party, for removing from the statute-book all laws giving the Federal authority power over the elective franchise. The one is against a free and fair election, as our fathers intended the States should have, and as they did have until these odious laws put it in the power of unscrupulous party leaders to organize a force of partisans, paid out of the Treasury of the United States, to prevent the opposite party from exercising their constitutional right of voting for the men of their choice. The democratic party is in favor of leaving the election laws as the States have made them, believing that the States have as deep an interest in the purity of the ballot-box as the Federal Government can have, and that they will guard it more sacredly from all contaminating influences than any partisan administration can do, whether that administration be republican or democratic.

It is the same struggle which has been fought over and over again, whether the ruler should be the subject and the citizen the sovereign, whether we shall have a government which will quietly submit to the will of the people as expressed at the ballot-box, or a centralized despotism which shall take unto itself the control of elections and thus declare whomsoever it pleases the choice of the people. The American people, who consider the elective franchise their dearest birthright, the corner-stone as it were of all their liberties, have indicated that they are weary of the long misrule of the dominant party. This warning they have given by the election of a majority of democrats to both branches of Congress. The popular will so expressed in England would meet with instant submission, and the ministry would have the grace to resign. MacMahon resigned the position as head of the great French nation when the cry came up from the majority that his administration had proved faithless to the principles of the republic. It is only in this free country that legislative majorities, chosen fresh from the people, are defied, and the minority arrogates to itself the proud right of saying that the people do not know their wishes. The minority in this instance is only the executive branch of the Government, the President, who holds his title to office by a minority vote, and yet he presumes upon his station to occupy a position in which royalty itself would feel rebuked. Upon this issue we are ready to appeal to the people, feeling confident that they will decide to go back to the old landmarks of constitutional liberty as made by the fathers of the Republic.

Mr. CLARDY. Mr. Chairman, I assure you that it is with unaffected diffidence that I submit my views upon the bill now pending before the committee, the political phases of which have been so ably and so exhaustively discussed by eminent gentlemen on both sides of this House that little that can challenge attention remains to be said. I cannot, however, content myself with a silent support of the bill, but I propose very briefly to give some of the reasons which induce such support, and to answer as best I can some of the objections urged against its passage. I shall not discuss at any considerable length the method by which we seek to repeal the obnoxious statutes which we have ingrafted on the appropriation bill now before the committee. I will say, however, as has been substantially said several times in the progress of this debate, that the Constitution of the United States does not provide the form of bills, nor does it contain any inhibition against passing a bill in the form of the one before us.

Indeed, it is not insisted that it is unconstitutional, but we are told that this system of legislation is improper and vicious. In what respect, Mr. Chairman, I ask, is it vicious or even improper? It contravenes no rule of this House, and it is not denied that "each House may determine the rule of its proceedings." It is remarkable that the addition of these provisions, germane to the subject-matter of the appropriation bills and in the interest of economy, should create such a profound sensation among republican leaders. They are not unaware that the practice of tacking even general legislation to appropriation bills has prevailed for more than a quarter of a century. They know, too, that the congressional record for the last twenty years is replete with instances where important measures have been ingrafted on bills appropriating money to carry on the Government. They have been reminded of the fact that some of the provisions we are now considering were passed into laws as parts of bills appropriating the people's money.

After the part gentlemen on the other side have taken in the enactment of statutes imperiling the liberty of the citizen, it occurs to me, Mr. Chairman, that they are estopped from challenging the propriety or fitness of the method we have elected to pursue in relieving the citizen of the menaces to his liberty and in restoring to him immunity from the operation of these vicious laws. And, again, I submit that the charge that our action is revolutionary ought not to come from those who in 1873 voted to each Senator and to each Representative in Congress $5,000 which he never earned and to which he was in no wise entitled on "a bill making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1874."

This species of legislation commends itself to republican leaders when it transfers from the Treasury to their coffers money that belongs to the people; but when the object is to secure the freedom of elections and assure a just, a fair, and honest administration of the laws, to the end that the life, the liberty, and the property of the citizen shall be preserved, it is denounced as a most nefarious practice, the resort to which by the democrats in Congress betrays a spirit of revolution which, if not checkmated, may involve the country in civil strife. The distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] has well characterized this cry of revolution as preposterous.

But in one sense, Mr. Chairman, we may be said to be revolutionists, but not in the respect indicated by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.] If it be revolution to strike from the statute-book laws which threaten the liberty of the people and laws which not only endanger but prevent an honest and intelligent trial of their causes in the United States courts, and to place thereon laws which operate equally upon all sections of the country and upon all the people regardless of their former condition, then we may be said to have inaugurated a revolution. We are commissioned by those who sent us here to carry on a revolution of that kind. This House has commenced by repealing, as far as it may do, the statute which undertakes to empower the President, as Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy, under the pretense of keeping peace at the polls, and without "the application of the Legislature of a State, or of the executive thereof when the Legislature cannot be convened," to invade any State of the Union and to invest with his troops any precinct therein, and, by overawing the citizens, control the elections.

And now, going further, we propose the repeal of those provisions of the statute that enumerate as causes of disqualification and challenge of grand and petit jurors in the courts of the United States participation in rebellion or the giving of aid and comfort to such rebellion as making unjust discriminations against the people of the South, whose record of fidelity to law for the last fourteen years is an earnest of what their future will be.

Despite the statements made on this floor, and reports to the contrary, we all know there is no section of the country where life and property are more secure than in the Southern States, if we omit the operation of the law to which I have referred, which places it in the power of the ignorant and dishonest elements of that section to commit judicial murders and to confiscate estates.

It has been truly said that under the statute to which I have just alluded a distinguished member of the President's Cabinet would not himself be a competent juror in a United States court, and that others who owe all the distinction they ever won to their devotion to the South during the late war, and who have been honored by republican Presidents with foreign appointments, might be excluded from the jury-box, while several of the judges and a number of the district attorneys charged with the enforcement of this odious statute could not themselves take the oath which it prescribes. The republican leaders ought years ago to have effaced these unjust statutes to show to the world that in the ashes of all bitter remembrances the animosities engendered by the war had been eternally buried; or, if not impelled by that motive, we would have supposed that when they saw their removal from place and power had been resolved by a people whose trust they had betrayed, they would have destroyed it because of the evidence it affords of their reckless disregard of the rights of their fellow-citizens and of the justness of the people's verdict against them.

There may have been some apology for the enactment of these provisions in 1862, but no excuse can be given for their retention on the statute-book now. So far in this discussion, I believe no member of this House can be reckoned as a defender of a statute which needs only to be mentioned that it may be despised. In fact it can no more be defended than its continuance on the statute-book for the last fourteen years can be apologized for or excused. But this jury law which I have been discussing, flagrantly unjust as it is, is not more antagonistic to the genius of our institutions than sections 2016, 2118, 2020, and other sections of the Revised Statutes of the United States, defining the duties and powers of supervisors of election, of marshals, and their special and general deputies.

After the learned discussion of these provisions, I repeat what I said a few minutes since, that it is with reluctance that I undertake to present my views upon them. I must be permitted to say, Mr. Chairman, that I have one objection to this bill, and that is that it does not go further and repeal the section of the statute authorizing the appointment by the circuit courts of the United States of supervisors of election, the employment of persons to oversee the registration of voters and elections for Representatives and Delegates to the Congress of the United States. In other words, I object that it does not destroy the power of the courts to commission spies upon the conduct of the citizens of the several States and Territories when they are choosing their Representatives and Delegates to Congress. This espionage on the conduct of the voters of a State is anti-democratic, anti-republican, and ought not to have the sanction of law. It may be said that with the sections sought to be repealed eliminated from the statute the liberty of the voter is no longer imperiled. This may be true, but we are taught to "avoid the very appearance of evil," and I would not even impliedly recognize the right of Congress to interfere with or in any manner control elections, except as it may lawfully do under section 4, article 1, of the Constitution.

This section, gentlemen on the other side invoke as authority for their position that Congress had the power to enact the sections to which I have referred. The section of the Constitution so relied on provides "the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators." What did the convention mean by giving Congress power to make or alter regulations?

Section 5 of the same article provides that "each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members." Was it the design of the convention to give to Congress the power to interfere with the choice of its own body by the people?

When the Constitution was assailed by its opponents in the State conventions because of the superintending power of Congress to make or alter such regulations its supporters contended that it was not susceptible of any such construction, but that the propriety of this grant of power rested upon the plain proposition that every government ought to contain in itself the means of its own preservation, and that the design of the section was to lodge this power in Congress in the event of the refusal or failure on the part of States to hold elections.

At a critical time under the Confederation, Rhode Island had withdrawn her delegates from Congress, thus preventing the passage of some very important measures.

Mr. Justice Story in his Commentaries on the Constitution refers to the action of Rhode Island to show that an occurrence such as was apprehended by the framers of the Constitution was not wholly imaginary. In discussing this clause in the Constitution he says:

> Nothing can be more evident than that an exclusive power in the State Legislatures to regulate elections for the National Government would leave the existence of the Union entirely at their mercy. They could at any time annihilate it by neglecting to provide for the choice of persons to administer its affairs. It is not sufficient answer that such an abuse of power is not probable.

Again, in reviewing the objections which were urged against this provision, he says:

> The reasons in its favor are of great force and importance. In the first place, the power may be applied by Congress to correct any negligence in a State in regard to elections, as well as to prevent a dissolution of the Government by designing and refractory States, urged on by some temporary excitements.

I repeat, then, that it never occurred to the framers of the Constitution that they were vesting a power in Congress to enable it to regulate the manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives, except in those cases where the States in the first instance failed or refused to do so; and Mr. Justice Story indicates very clearly that such was his opinion as to the extent of the power of Congress in the matter of elections.

If Congress has the power to regulate the manner of holding elections for Representatives as contemplated by the statute which is sought to be repealed, then it has the power to regulate in the same or in any manner the elections for Senators, for there is no limitation of the right of Congress "to make or alter such regulations except as to the places of choosing Senators." Does any gentleman suppose the framers of the Constitution ever intended that Congress should have the power to send its spies to the capitols of the several States "to scrutinize the manner in which the voting is done;" that they intended that these spies and paid informers, surrounded by a retinue of special deputy marshals to aid and assist them in a verification of the list of Senators voting, might take possession of the capitol of a sovereign State? And yet Congress can make such regulations if it had the authority to enact the law that we are now considering. The Constitution is an instrument of limited and enumerated powers; what is not conferred is withheld. I do not claim that there are no powers by implication, but I do say that the powers not expressly delegated to the United States by the Constitution nor prohibited by it to the States, and such as are not necessarily implied, are "reserved to the States respectively, or to the people."

The adoption of the ninth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, declaring that "the enumeration in the Constitution of certain rights shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people," indicates an apprehension on the part of the States that the General Government might arrogate to itself rights which it was intended should be retained by the people. The adoption of the tenth amendment shows a like apprehension on the part of the States. The Constitution does not by express words or by implication authorize Congress to assume control of elections in the several States. While it is true that the Constitution prescribes the qualifications of Senators and Representatives, it does not determine the qualifications of electors. This power belongs to the States, section 2, article 1 of the Constitution, providing that—

> The House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States, and the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature.

It is as a citizen of a State that a man has a right to vote. The Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Minor vs. Happersett, in 21 Wal., a case that arose in my own State, has decided that the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution, which provides that "all persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside," does not confer the right of suffrage on a citizen; that the States themselves confer the right of suffrage and fix the qualifications of electors. And the Supreme Court, in a recent case reported in 2 Otto, discussing the fifteenth amendment, decides that—

> The power of Congress to legislate at all upon the subject of voting at State elections rests upon this amendment, and can be exercised by providing a punishment only when the wrongful refusal to receive the vote of a qualified elector at such elections is because of his color, race, or previous condition of servitude.

And yet, while the court holds that the power of Congress to legislate at all upon the subject of qualifications of voters at State elections rests upon this amendment, and while all the authorities agree that the power to regulate the manner of holding elections belongs primarily to the States and ultimately to Congress, our republican friends, we can legitimately infer from the position they have taken on this question, would insist that Congress has unlimited power in the matter of elections, and may, at its pleasure, annihilate the power vested in the States. I say, Mr. Chairman, that Congress has no warrant in the Constitution from which it derives its right of legislation for the exercise of this power so dangerous to the welfare of the States.

But I shall not further discuss the unconstitutionality of these laws, nor shall I detain the committee long to show their impolicy. Those who assert their constitutionality will agree that the occasion must be extraordinary and the exigency unusual to call forth the exercise of the power claimed. My friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. COFFROTH] has given us an account of the practical working of this law in the city of Philadelphia, and shown with conclusiveness that instead of the marshal protecting the citizen in the exercise of the elective franchise, his office is to deter him from the enjoyment of such privilege. The conduct of the marshals at the elections in New York in 1876 and in 1878 is proof that the law that renders their existence possible is unwise and vicious, and therefore ought to be repealed. To these instances may be added the election in Saint Louis in 1876, when, as my colleague [Mr. FROST] has stated, these creatures of a Federal court dictated the representation in Congress from one of the districts in that city.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I will say that the people demand a restoration to them of the right and privilege to elect in pursuance of the laws of the State in which they live their own Representatives, untrammeled by Federal interference and unawed by bayonets. And unless the veto of the President, with which we have been threatened by the leaders of his party on this floor, should arrest the act that is to reinvest them with their rights of citizenship, they will be restored.

Mr. COLERICK addressed the committee. [His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Chairman, after the many able and exhaustive speeches which have been made on the bill now under consideration it would perhaps be wise if I should remain silent. There are, however, some things which I desire to say in regard to the proposed legislation incorporated in the bill, and this is the only opportunity I shall have to do so.

I am opposed, Mr. Chairman, firmly and honestly opposed, to the proposition contained in this bill to repeal certain sections of the election laws and to modify others. I am opposed to it, not only because I object to the manner in which it is proposed to be accomplished, but I believe the step is a step in the wrong direction; that instead of repealing laws which have been enacted for the purpose of preserving the purity of the ballot-box and maintaining honest and fair elections, we ought to amend them, and even make them stronger than they are for the purpose of protecting every citizen, whether high or low, rich or poor, black or white, if he be entitled to vote, in the right to cast a free and untrammeled ballot, and also to make that ballot effective by preventing dishonest and fraudulent votes from being polled by those who have no right to vote.

And now, Mr. Chairman, as to the manner in which this repeal and modification of the election laws is sought to be effected, I believe it to be wrong in principle, dangerous in practice, and wholly indefensible. Notwithstanding all that has been said on the other side of the House, it is revolutionary in its character; and all right-minded, right-thinking people of the country will so regard it. I know that gentlemen on the other side deny this, and speak even contemptuously of the idea of its being revolutionary to force legislation in this manner. But, Mr. Chairman, it strikes a blow directly at the independence of the different departments of the Government. It is coercive legislation. It says to one branch of the legislative department of the Government, you must accept such legislation as we, the other branch, think proper to incorporate into an appropriation bill, or no money shall be appropriated to maintain the Government. It says to the President, approve of whatever legislation we think proper to incorporate into this appropriation bill, or no money shall be appropriated to pay your salary, no money shall be appropriated to support and carry on the legislative, executive, and judicial departments of the Government. Now gloss it over as you may, no rhetoric, no logic, no eloquence, can escape the charge that if this be insisted upon and adhered to, in case the President shall veto this bill and two-thirds of both Houses of Congress shall not vote for it, after the President returns it with his objections, then it is revolutionary.

I concede the right of the majority of this House to incorporate into an appropriation bill any legislation they think proper, if it be done consistently with the rules of the House and the Constitution. I do not for a moment dispute this; but when the House incorporates into an appropriation bill legislation which is objected to by the Senate, and says to that body "You shall accept such legislation or no money shall be appropriated to support the Government, to pay the Army, to pay the legislative, executive, and judicial departments of the Government," what becomes of the independence of the Senate? What becomes of the Government? Have you not then reached the point of revolution, and must not the wheels of the Government then stop? The same thing is true, Mr. Chairman, as to the President, who has the right under the Constitution to return any bill that may be passed by Congress, with his objections. I know that the legislative power of the Government rests in Congress. I understand that perfectly well. But our fathers, whether wisely or unwisely, provided in the Constitution that before any act of Congress should become a law, it should have the executive approval, and conferred upon the President the power, if he did not approve, to return any bill passed by Congress with his objections, and unless on a reconsideration both Houses of Congress shall, by a two-thirds vote pass such bill, it shall not become a law. Now, sir, if the incorporation of this legislation in this appropriation bill means anything, it means that unless the President shall approve the bill with such legislation in it then no money shall be appropriated for the legislative, executive, and judicial departments of the Government unless those opposed to it shall surrender their convictions and vote in favor of the bill, notwithstanding the objections of the President. The majority virtually say to us and to the President, unless you accede to our notions and accept this bill with just such provisions in it as we think proper we will not appropriate a single dollar, and the wheels of Government shall stop.

This, sir, is vicious legislation. It is coercive and revolutionary in its character. But we are told that it has been done before, and many precedents have been cited to show the fact. My friend from Wisconsin, [Mr. BRAGG,] who has just taken his seat, has referred to us such precedents, and says in one instance a proposition to borrow money was incorporated in an appropriation bill. That may have been a legitimate thing to do. It may have been the only way to raise the money to meet the appropriation, to borrow it, and therefore very proper to provide in the bill for borrowing the money. I know, Mr. Chairman, this has been done, and that you can find precedents for it, but two bad precedents never make one good one, no more than two wrongs make one right. But, Mr. Chairman, this process of tacking has certainly never been carried to the extent now proposed. If so, there has been no reference to it so far as I have heard, and I do not believe an instance can be found in our history. The gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. CARLISLE,] in his very able speech, referred to the fact that in 1855 the House of Representatives incorporated into an appropriation bill a complete revision of the tariff laws. But in that case the bill was the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill; and the failure to pass that bill would not have been so serious, it would not have stopped the wheels of the Government; and the Senate struck out the provisions relating to the revision of the tariff.

The gentleman from Kentucky says that the bill was sent to the Senate, and, after an able and exhaustive debate by that body, they struck out the provisions relating to the tariff inserted by the House, but did it upon other grounds than because it was incorporated into an appropriation bill. I confess, Mr. Chairman, I was somewhat surprised at that statement made by the gentleman, whose ability, candor, and fairness it gives me pleasure to acknowledge, for I thought I had examined that debate with some care, and I had certainly reached a different conclusion. The impression made upon my mind from reading the debate referred to in 1855 on the motion to strike out the sections relating to the tariff was that the motion prevailed, because it was out of place to incorporate such legislation in an appropriation bill; that such a practice would break down and destroy the safeguards of legislation. The vote was very close, and a number of Senators who were in favor of a revision of the tariff certainly objected to the mode of legislation and voted for the motion to strike out. Among the distinguished Senators who objected to the incorporation of such legislation in an appropriation bill were Senators Bayard, of Delaware; Brodhead, of Pennsylvania; Douglas, of Illinois; Badger, of North Carolina; Seward, of New York, and Clayton, of Delaware.

Senators Douglas, Brodhead, and Seward all declared such mode of legislation to be revolutionary in character, and that it was out of place to incorporate such legislation in an appropriation bill. So did Senators Cass, Benjamin, Weller, James, and others. Weller was at first inclined to vote against striking out, but finally changed his mind and voted for the motion, because it was an improper and an objectionable mode of legislation. Senator Toucey, of Connecticut, was in favor of the proposed legislation, and voted against striking it out. But even he admitted that if it was stricken out by the Senate, and the House should then insist on retaining it in the bill, or pass no appropriation bill, that then it would be revolutionary. I quote his exact language, and I invite the attention of the committee to it; for he was a distinguished democrat, and what he then said sustains the views entertained by republicans now on this question. Senator Toucey said:

> If they—
>
> That is the Senate—
> saw fit to reject it, then it was the intention of the committee to go forward and present the amendments which they had prepared. Is there anything wrong in this? Is there anything improper in the proposition of the chairman of the committee or of the committee itself? Nay, Mr. President, is there anything wrong in the position assumed by the House of Representatives? Sir, I can easily imagine the question which is raised here in anticipation, when it would become wrong. If, sir, we reject this revenue measure, and the appropriation bill goes back to the House of Representatives, and they insist upon it, or else will permit the civil and diplomatic bill to fail, and the wheels of Government to stop, then I take occasion to say that the House of Representatives would have reached the point of revolution. If they undertake by their subsequent action to force this revenue bill upon the Senate contrary to its opinion, or to stop the wheels of Government, they will then have assumed the revolutionary attitude, and the event will have arrived which has been darkly shadowed forth by some Senators in the course of this debate.

Now, this was the opinion of a democratic Senator in 1855, who favored the legislation then incorporated into an appropriation bill, and which Douglas and Brodhead, also democrats, as well as Seward, characterized as revolutionary in character; and hence I say when the majority of this House, at the last session of the last Congress, insisted upon the legislation then incorporated in the Army appropriation bill and in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, and absolutely refused to pass these bills unless the Senate would surrender its opinions and accept the bills as passed by the House, it, in the language of Senator Toucey, "reached the point of revolution," "assumed the revolutionary attitude," and forced upon the country the necessity for this extra session of Congress. A democratic House then said to a republican Senate, "you must surrender your convictions and opinions or there shall be no appropriation for the Army, none for the executive, none for the Legislature, and none for the judiciary after the 30th of June next. Our will shall prevail or the wheels of Government must stop." And now when the new Congress has assembled in extra session, and both the House and Senate are democratic, you again incorporate the same objectionable legislation in the appropriation bills with some modifications; and in doing so, you say to the President, "You must approve or the wheels of Government must stop." This I believe to be the avowed purpose of the majority in Congress. Whether the President will approve or not I do not know. I doubt if any one knows or is authorized to state what will be the executive action; but this I declare here without any hesitation: if the President returns these appropriation bills with his objections, as he has the undoubted right under the Constitution to do, and the majority of Congress shall then refuse to pass necessary appropriation bills to carry on the Government, then I say to gentlemen on the other side of the House you will have again assumed a revolutionary attitude, you will again have reached the point of revolution, and the people will hold you responsible. You cannot shift the responsibility upon the President, you cannot shift the responsibility upon the minority in Congress, you cannot destroy the constitutional prerogatives of the President in that way. It is your duty to appropriate the money to support and maintain the Government, and as to any legislation you may wish to accomplish you must do it in a constitutional way.

This controversy has a higher significance, Mr. Chairman, than the mere question of the repeal or modification of these statutes. It involves the independence of the two Houses of Congress and of the Executive in the enactment of laws. It involves the stability of our constitutional Government. I am satisfied we are in the right, and that we can safely go to the country upon the issue presented. But as to the veto power. It has been asserted upon the other side of the House that there is no ground for a veto in this proposed legislation, and some gentlemen have argued the question as if we were a convention sitting for the purpose of amending the Constitution, or were discussing a resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution modifying or repealing the veto power of the President. It is not a question, Mr. Chairman, whether the President should have the veto power or not. Our fathers in adopting the Constitution made it necessary for the President to approve every bill passed by Congress before it should become a law; or if he did not approve, they provided he might return such bill to Congress with his objections. Now, we may entertain and express our opinions as to the propriety or impropriety of any particular veto; but it is a clear, constitutional right of the President if he does not approve a bill, any bill that may be passed by Congress and presented to him, to return the same with his objections and if he does so, unless upon a reconsideration two-thirds of both Houses shall vote for such bill, it shall not become a law. It is therefore a clear constitutional right of the Executive to exercise the veto power. One that we cannot take away from him, unless we first amend the Constitution for that purpose, and one that should not be annulled or overridden in the way proposed by this bill

I do not know, sir, but I would be in favor of modifying the veto power so as not to require a two-thirds vote on a reconsideration of a bill vetoed by the President; but I cannot and will not now or at any other time sanction any attempt to annul the power of the President to veto a bill which contains provisions objectionable to him while the Constitution remains as it is. But, Mr. Chairman, I have said I was opposed to the repeal and modification of the sections of the election laws proposed. I do not for one moment doubt the constitutionality of these laws. I believe the Constitution gives to Congress full power to fix the time, place, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives in Congress and for presidential electors, except as to the place of electing Senators; and that exception is for the reason that it would give to Congress the power to change the place of meeting of a State Legislature; and having the power to fix the time, place, and manner of holding elections, it is clear that Congress has the power in providing for the manner of holding elections to make any provision deemed necessary to secure a fair and honest election; to prevent fraud, intimidation, and violence, and to keep peace at the polls. It has the power to secure every citizen entitled to a vote in the right to cast a free, untrammeled ballot; and having that right, I believe, Mr. Chairman, it to be the duty of Congress to exercise it. If I were to say here to-day what I believe the people of my own section most earnestly demand, it would be that we shall have peaceable elections everywhere throughout the entire country; that every citizen of the United States who has the right to vote wherever he may live, whether in Illinois or Mississippi, Louisiana or New York, Maine or South Carolina, shall be permitted to exercise that right without any interference, and that those who have no right to vote shall not be permitted to do so; that ballot-boxes shall not be stuffed with tissue ballots, and above all that armed bodies of lawless men shall not be permitted to interfere with the rights of citizens and control elections in which every citizen of the United States has a deep interest.

This is the feeling, sir, in the section of country where I live; and I believe it exists among democrats as well as republicans. And, Mr. Chairman, while I have the honor of a seat in this House I shall insist in all our legislation affecting elections that every citizen shall be protected in his right to exercise the elective franchise. If that is not done and we do not maintain free, fair, honest elections we cannot maintain our free institutions, and there is no hope for the Republic. I will go as far as the farthest in providing laws necessary for the purpose of securing every citizen the right to cast an honest ballot, and will go equally as far in preventing fraud, intimidation, violence, bloodshed, and murder resorted to to control elections. The polls must be free and accessible to every citizen, and brute force must cease to be an element of power in the politics of the country.

Now, sir, a great deal has been said about fraud in elections. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] a few moments since said that the republican party wanted to retain these officers provided for in the election laws of the United States to enable them to control elections and carry them by fraud. I do not believe this, Mr. Chairman, for a moment. All the republican party want is an honest vote and a fair count. I can more truthfully say that the democratic party desires to abolish these officers and repeal these provisions of the election laws enacted to prevent fraud to enable them to perpetrate those frauds upon the ballot-box for which that party has been heretofore distinguished. I have heard a great deal said during the last two years on the floor of the House and elsewhere about fraud in the last presidential election, and about counting in the President by fraud. Mr. Chairman, I will say in all candor, because I believe it to be true, that if the electoral vote of Louisiana in 1876 had been by any possibility returned against the republican party, and the election of the democratic candidate for the Presidency had been thereby secured, it would have been the greatest outrage upon the elective franchise ever committed in the history of our country. I believe, sir, that there were parishes and parts of parishes in that State taken possession of by armed bodies of men; that republican voters were forced to keep away from the polls on election day, and that no free, fair, honest election was held in such parishes. I believe that the democratic majorities in such parishes were obtained by an organized system of violence and terrorism, by intimidation, and by bloodshed and murder such as was a disgrace to our civilization and age.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. HENDERSON. Certainly.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I would ask the gentleman if he does not remember that after the reconstruction acts of 1868 the democracy of the State of Louisiana carried that State by over thirty thousand majority; again in 1872 the State was carried by a majority of over ten thousand; again in 1874 by a majority of about six thousand; and in 1876 by a majority of about ten thousand, and this, too, at a time when the State government was under the control of the republican party, and that backed by the Federal Government and its bayonets, and yet the result of the election in favor of the democracy was nullified and set aside on the ground of intimidation?

Mr. HENDERSON. That has not been my understanding at all of the results of the elections in Louisiana, and I ask the gentleman from Louisiana if that be true what becomes of the claim that the democratic party has been constantly growing in favor in his State? It has been frequently stated here that the colored people were going over to the democratic party and were voting the democratic ticket in order to account for the wonderful changes in the votes of various sections of the South and of Louisiana.

Mr. ROBERTSON. They have been doing it from 1868 up to the present time. I have stumped the portions of the State on the same stand with these colored men in 1868, 1872, and 1876.

Mr. HENDERSON. My information in regard to the elections in the parishes referred to is based upon the testimony of those who have investigated these matters and have heard the testimony of sworn witnesses, and I believe from what I have heard, from the sworn testimony taken and from the reports made, that the statements made by me are true.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I know that in 1876 in regard to the fraud which has been mentioned by the gentleman in the parishes of East and West Feliciana and in Baton Rouge we had the most peaceable election on the part of the democracy that we have ever had since the war. I know that in the parish of East Feliciana there was a fraud concocted by the republican party by which it was determined that the colored votes of that parish should not be cast from the fact that leaders of that party stood at the polls on election day and prevented these colored people from voting in order to consummate their nefarious purpose. I know, further, that in an adjoining parish of West Feliciana, separated only by a small creek and where the voters were not interfered with, the fullest vote, colored and white, was cast that had been polled for many years.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I understand that very well. I understand just how peaceful the election was. It was the peace of the lion and the lamb after the lamb was on the inside of the lion. [Laughter and applause.] It was the peace of death. The force, the violence, the intimidation was long before election day. It was intended that there should be no violence on election day; the reign of terror had done its work before.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I deny that there was anything of that sort. On the contrary, it was our interest to keep the peace even if we had had a desire not to do it, because we knew that any disturbance would give the returning board a pretext for throwing out our votes.

Mr. HENDERSON. I grant the gentleman that there may have been peace on the day of election.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Yes, all the time.

Mr. HENDERSON. But does the gentleman deny that there were armed bodies of men in those parishes who attended all the political meetings, not only of democrats but of republicans, and pursued such a system of intimidation long before the day of election as virtually to drive voters away from the polls and deprive them of their right to vote?

Mr. ROBERTSON. I deny that proposition, and I state that in 1878 the republicans were riding all over my parish and all over East Feliciana with drums and fifes, and making speeches everywhere; but they were not interrupted. At Clinton, where Captain Rogers with a detachment of Federal troops was stationed at the time Packard spoke, there were a few questions asked and answered, and that was all.

Mr. HENDERSON. I supposed, Mr. Chairman, that the statements made by me were a matter of history well understood by the country. The people have certainly been greatly deceived if it be not true that violence, bloodshed, and murder have prevailed in various parts of Louisiana, and to such an extent that republican majorities have been changed into democratic majorities, and the State turned over to the democracy.

Mr. ROBERTSON. No, sir; not at all.

Mr. HENDERSON. I believe it to be true, Mr. Chairman, and think there is no other way of accounting for the wonderful falling off of the republican vote. Take, for instance, the parish of East Feliciana. In 1870 there were in that parish 1,273 republican votes polled; in 1872, 1,690; in 1874, 1,688, and in 1876, only 1. This speaks for itself. And now, Mr. Chairman, while we are talking about concord and fraternity between the different sections of our country allow me to say that what we want to establish is more freedom of thought, of speech, and of action. As long as men are proscribed for opinions' sake, and especially on account of political opinions, as long as violence, outrage, and wrong are permitted, and go unpunished, so long will there be bad feeling existing between the sections, and the way to avoid it is to remove the cause which excites it. I sometimes think, Mr. Chairman, when I hear gentlemen of the South complaining of their impoverished condition, that if the people of that fair portion of this great Republic would only forget their prejudices and passions; would only encourage freedom of thought, of speech, of action, and invite men of energy and enterprise, and men of capital, to settle among them and help to develop and build up the country, the South would soon begin to prosper as it has never prospered before. A brighter day would dawn upon the people of that section, and they would soon see and feel that they were advancing to a higher and better and nobler civilization.

But let us have peace, Mr. Chairman, peace everywhere and peace at all times; and the surest way to have peace is to establish right and justice everywhere and in all parts of the country. And if the good time shall ever come when a citizen of these United States can go from one State to another all over the land and express in a respectful way his honest thoughts and opinions free from proscription, free from molestation; when every citizen will be protected in all his civil and political rights, then will reconciliation, complete and permanent reconciliation, come to all parts of the country; then will our free institutions be loved and cherished by all sections, and the Republic established upon a broad, sure, firm foundation.

Mr. Chairman, I think this effort to break down the national election laws is to be deeply regretted. I have no disposition to stir up sectional strife; I have had no disposition to excite sectional animosities. During my term of service in this House I have abstained from anything of that kind; but the people of the North will look upon this action on the part of the democratic majority as an attempt to get control of elections by fraud and by violence when necessary for that purpose. I have evidence every day from the section of country where I live that such is the feeling there, and it is growing day by day.

It is most unfortunate, too, that the democratic party having been out of power since the beginning of the late rebellion should on coming back to power in the legislative department of the Government as one of its very first acts attempt to destroy all national authority over national elections; should revive again the old doctrines and opinions as to State rights which I had hoped were exploded and the question settled, and settled forever by the blood of many battlefields, that this was a nation and clothed with full and ample power to preserve and perpetuate itself, and especially that in the effort to accomplish its purposes it should assume a revolutionary attitude and should say, "We have the power now in our hands and if you do not graciously accept what we propose we will make no appropriations. We will stop the wheels of the Government." This will not do, Mr. Chairman, the party has put itself in the wrong, and has shown the people that it is not worthy of their confidence.

Mr. Chairman, a few words more and I am done. Since I have occupied a seat upon the floor of this House I have sat, and oftentimes impatiently, and heard the most violent denunciations of the republican party. It has been charged with frauds; it has been charged with corruption; it has been charged with gross violations of the Constitution, which its patriotism preserved and maintained. In fact, it has been charged with every political crime, and one would suppose to hear these denunciations from time to time that the history of the party was full of oppression, of usurpation, of injustice, and wrong; that it had trampled under foot the liberties of the people and had forfeited the respect and confidence of all good, liberty-loving citizens.

Mr. Chairman, it has been my pride and pleasure to belong to the republican party since its first organization. It was born, sir, out of a love of liberty and opposition to human bondage. It came into power to find the hand of rebellion raised against the Republic. It had graver duties to discharge and responsibilities to meet than any other party that ever existed in the country. During four years of bitter, unrelenting, cruel war it administered the Government with an unfaltering patriotism. It brought the country safely through all the perils and dangers that threatened it. It extended human liberty, and secured the civil and political rights of every citizen by constitutional amendments. No party ever made a grander and nobler history, and if the people of this great, free Government are only true to their love of liberty the luster of its great deeds will go down undimmed through the ages.

I know the financial legislation of the party has been severely condemned by gentlemen on the other side and by the "nationals;" but, Mr. Chairman, when we consider that when the party came into power it found an empty Treasury and an impaired public credit; that it had to raise immense sums of money to meet the extraordinary expenses of the war and maintain the public credit; when we remember that this has been done, that our public debt has been funded at lower rates of interest than ever before known in the history of our country, and that we have been brought back to a sound and reliable currency, I assert, Mr. Chairman, that the financial legislation of the republican party has, in my judgment, been such as to excite the admiration of the world. No, Mr. Chairman, I love the republican party. I regard it as the party of freedom and of progress. It has proven its patriotism and its devotion to the rights and liberties of the people, and I trust it will be maintained by them as the best and surest hope of the Republic.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, I have no expectation that any words of mine will change the vote or modify the opinions of any member of this House, much less affect in the slightest degree the predetermination of the majority to pass the pending bill with all its objectionable provisions. It is a bantling of the democratic caucus, and has been adopted by the dominant party in this body. Party exigency requires its passage, and the whip and spur of party leaders I doubt not will secure it.

I cannot, however, let this occasion pass without entering my emphatic though unheeded protest, not only against the end sought to be accomplished by the democracy, but also against the manner which they have adopted with the hope of insuring success.

This bill, known as the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, provides the means for carrying on those three great departments of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880. If it contained no provisions except those necessary for this purpose there would be no great difference of opinion in regard to its details among the members of the House and no serious objection to its immediate passage. But, sir, in addition to all that is legitimate and proper in an appropriation bill, per se, this provides not only for the modification but for the absolute repeal of section after section of the Revised Statutes in relation to the elective franchise, and it effectually breaks down every barrier of protection which the National Government has erected to secure a free and fair election and a correct and honest count of the votes for Members and Delegates to this House.

That the true character of the proposed legislation may be clearly understood, its importance fully appreciated, and its objects and purposes revealed, an examination of the existing law to the extent of the changes proposed in this bill may be necessary. The present law was enacted in 1871, with some additions in 1872, and may be found in the Revised Statutes, under the title of "The Elective Franchise," from section 2011 to section 2031, inclusive.

The stupendous frauds committed by the democratic party in the city of New York in the year 1868 had startled and alarmed the country by their enormity, and these laws were enacted to prevent their recurrence. The character and extent of these frauds, the men by whom they were perpetrated, and the political party benefited thereby are matters of recent history, and must be fresh in the recollection of every member of this House; and, sir, as the correctness of nearly every statement which comes from a republican source is challenged, I will let these frauds be characterized by a distinguished statesman who has received the indorsement of a national democratic convention as a candidate for the Presidency, and received the support of that party for that exalted position at the polls. From a letter under date of October 20, 1869, from Horace Greeley to Samuel J. Tilden, I extract the following:

Mr. Tilden, you cannot escape responsibility by saying with the guilty Macbeth—

"Thou canst not say I did it; never shake
Those gory locks at me!"

for you were at least a passive accomplice in the giant frauds of last November. Your name was used without public protest on your part in circulars sowed broadcast over the State, whereof the manifest intent was to "make assurance double sure" that the frauds here perpetrated should not be overborne by the honest vote of the rural district. And you, not merely by silence, but by positive assumption, have covered those frauds with the mantle of your respectability. On the principle that "the receiver is as bad as the thief," you are as deeply implicated in them to-day as though your name were Tweed, O'Brien, or Oakey Hall.

Mr. Tilden, you and I were ardent participants in the struggle of 1840, wherein Martin Van Buren was ousted from the Presidency by General Harrison. You know how thoroughly our city was absorbed in that contest, wherein every man, woman, and child took a deep and lively interest. Our elections were then held throughout three days; there was a registration freshly enacted which blacklegs had not yet learned to circumvent; the right of suffrage was as widely diffused as it now is; no one ever complained that a single legal voter was unable then to poll his vote. And, though our city has since largely increased its population, the lower wards were quite as populous then as they are to-day—several of them more so. They were full of boarding-houses crowded with clerks and mechanics. Many of these covered sites since given up to great warehouses and manufactories; their denizens have moved up-town, over to Brooklyn, or out on some of the railroads that lead out into the open country. Practically, the lower wards are being given up to commerce, and no longer shelter by night the multitudes who throng their streets by day.

Now look at the vote of four of these wards in 1840 and 1868, respectively:

Wards.	President, 1840.		Governor, 1868.
	Harrison.	Van Buren.	Griswold.	Hoffman.
Fourth ward	1,138	1,177	480	3,820
Sixth ward	806	1,223	369	5,032
Seventh ward	1,707	1,728	1,295	6,895
Fourteenth ward	1,142	1,393	726	4,526
Four wards	4,793	5,521	2,840	20,283

Van Buren's majority, 728; Hoffman's majority, 17,443.

Mr. Tilden, you know what this contrast attests. Right well do you comprehend the means whereby the vote of 1868 was thus swelled out of all proportions. There are not twelve thousand legal voters living in those wards to-day, though they gave Hoffman 17,443 majority. Had the day been of average length, it would doubtless have been swelled to at least twenty thousand. There was nothing but time needed to make it one hundred thousand, if so many had been wanted and paid for.

Now, Mr. Tilden, I call on you to put a stop to this business. You have but to walk into the sheriff's, the mayor's, and the supervisor's offices in the City Hall Park, and say there must be no more of it—say it so there shall be no doubt that you mean it—and we shall have a tolerably fair election once more. Probably a good part of the fifty thousand supplied last fall with bogus naturalization certificates will offer to register and to vote—some of them pretending not to know that they are no more citizens of the United States than the King of Dahomey is—but very few will vote repeatedly unless paid for it; and we shall not be cheated more than ten thousand if you simply tell the boss workmen that there must be no illegal voting instigated and paid for.

Will you do it? Your reputation is at stake. The cowardly craft which "Would not play false,

And yet would wrongly win," will not avail. If we republicans are swindled as we were swindled last fall, you, and such as you, will be responsible to God and man for the outrage. Prosecutors, magistrates, municipal authorities, are all in the pool; we have nothing to hope from the ministers of justice, and the villains have no fear of the terrors of the law. I appeal to you, and anxiously await the result.

Yours,

HORACE GREELEY.

NEW YORK, October 20, 1869.

To SAMUEL J. TILDEN, Chairman Democratic State Committee.

Frauds like these described by Mr. Greeley, committed under the leadership of the great modern reformer to whom this open letter was addressed, imperatively demanded the enactment of some statute to prevent their repetition, and the Congress of the United States, in obedience to the universal demand from every friend and advocate of a pure ballot, a fair and free election, and an honest and true declaration and return of the votes cast, enacted these laws which the democratic party in this House are in such hot haste to repeal.

What is the supervisor law, as it has been termed in this debate? What are its provisions? It is important to all that they should be thoroughly understood, not only here but throughout the country.

They provide that whenever in any city of twenty thousand inhabitants or more two citizens, or in any county or parish in any congressional district ten citizens of good standing, shall, prior to any registry of voters for an election of Congressman or to any election in which a Representative to Congress is to be voted for, make known in writing to the judge of the United States circuit court for that circuit their desire to have the registration, or election, or both "guarded and scrutinized," the judge shall open his court within not less than ten days prior to the registration or election, and shall proceed to appoint and commission from time to time and under the hand of the judge and the seal of the court for each election district or voting precinct in such city, town, or congressional district as may have made application in the manner prescribed, two citizens, residents of the city, town, or of the election district or voting precinct in the county or parish, who shall be of different political parties and able to read and write the English language, who shall be known as supervisors of elections, and the judge may change such appointments from time to time.

The supervisors are authorized and required to attend at all times and places fixed for the registration of voters, and at all times and places for holding elections and for counting the votes cast. They may challenge any person offering to register or mark any name registered for challenge. They may scrutinize the registry lists and mark them in such a manner as will detect and expose the improper removal of a name therefrom or addition thereto. They may challenge any vote offered by any person whose legal qualifications either of the supervisors may doubt.

They must remain at the polls until the voting, counting, and canvassing are completed, and proper certificates issued and returns made. They may inspect and scrutinize while the election is progressing the way the voting is done, and the method in which the poll-books, registry lists, tallies, and check-books are kept, and they are required to scrutinize, count, and canvass the votes cast, and shall make returns to the chief supervisor, attaching thereto any certificate required by law, and any statement as to the truth or fairness of such election or canvass which either of them may desire to make, and which may properly and honestly be attached, that all the facts in relation to said election, counting, and canvassing may become known, "to the end that each candidate for the office of Representative or Delegate in Congress may obtain the benefit of every vote for him cast."

The supervisors are authorized to occupy such positions in the place of registration, voting, or canvassing as shall enable them to perform their duties; and all interference to prevent them from so doing is forbidden.

The law also requires the United States marshals of the district, upon the written application of the citizens of any city having twenty thousand inhabitants and upward, to appoint deputy marshals to aid and assist the supervisors in the verification of the registry and voting list and to be present at the places of registration and voting. The marshal and his deputies, regular and special, are enjoined to keep the peace, preserve order, prevent fraudulent registration, fraudulent voting, and fraudulent conduct on the part of the officers of election.

They may arrest, with or without process, any person who at the place of registration or election may violate the election laws of the United States. But no person can be arrested without process except for an offense committed or attempted to be committed in the presence of the marshal or supervisor, and any person so arrested must be brought forthwith before the commissioner or judge of a court of the United States for examination. This, Mr. Chairman, is an outline of the Federal election laws which the dominant party in this House and in the Senate, under the dictation of the democratic caucus, propose to strike from the statute-book.

I ask this House, and I ask the people of this country, what there is in these laws to justify the extraordinary conduct of the democratic party in the last Congress, or in this, in assuming the revolutionary position that unless these laws are repealed no appropriation shall be made to carry on the General Government? I know, sir, that these statutes have been charged as being partisan in their character. This charge I deny. They were not enacted in the interest of any party, but for the benefit of the whole people of the country. The power of appointing supervisors has been wisely lodged in the hands of the judges of the circuit courts of the United States, officials who are nominated by the President, confirmed by the Senate; whose salary is sufficient to place them in an independent position, and whose term of office is not to be affected by the rise and fall of political parties. They are selected not on account of any particular political opinion they may hold, but on account of their qualifications as distinguished and eminent members of the legal profession. They are men who preside over our courts when the rights of parties are to be tried and adjudicated, and to them are submitted the great questions which affect the life and the liberty of the citizen. Surely if a tribunal like this cannot be trusted to appoint officers of this character, there is none within the limits of this Government that can.

That, sir, is not all. The appointment of supervisors is not confined to applications therefor by members of the republican party. The courts and the process are open to the members of the democratic party as well, and in some instances within a very few years supervisors for the purpose of guarding and scrutinizing the registration of voters have been appointed upon the application of democrats. These applications are to be made by residents of the city, the town, or the district wherein their duties are to be performed, and the applicants are to be men of good standing in the community. Upon receiving this application the court appoints, not partisans, not republicans, but, as the law expressly provides, supervisors of different political parties. After these supervisors have been appointed and commence the performance of their duties, they attend the registration of the voters, they attend the elections, they supervise the counting, and in the performance of all their duties they act together and in the presence of each other. And in view of these facts I ask what becomes of the charge that is made that supervisors of elections are partisan in their character?

Another objection which has been urged with great vehemence against this law is the fact that the marshals and their deputies have power to arrest without process. No such power is granted to the marshals unless the offense is committed, or attempted to be committed, in their presence, and this is a power which sheriffs, policemen, and a large class of officers possess under State authority in the different cities and States of the Union, and it is a well-established doctrine of the common law, and has been for centuries. It is a power, I grant you, that should be carefully guarded and protected, but the experience of all civilized countries has justified its exercise, and there is nothing anomalous or extraordinary in its incorporation into this law.

The supervisor law, an outline of which I have given, simply does this: it secures or attempts to secure through its supervisors the placing upon the registration lists of the name of every man who has the right of registration and the exclusion of the name of every man who has not that right; it allows every man to exercise the right of suffrage in the place where he resides that has that right; it prevents or is intended to prevent any man from voting who does not possess the right to vote; it aims to secure a correct count of ballots cast, a true declaration, record, and return of that count, and it preserves all the facts and testimony in relation to the registration, the voting, the counting, the canvassing, and the returns that are necessary to make it plain that the election has been properly conducted. Can any man who desires a fair and honest election and a proper and correct count and return of the votes cast thereat object to this?

These election laws during this debate have been assailed and denounced as unconstitutional. The power of the General Government to interfere in any way with the elective franchise has been denied, and it has been claimed to be purely a matter of State legislation and State regulation. This, sir, is nothing more nor less than a reassertion in another form of the old heresy of State rights, a re-echo of the old cry that this is not a nation, but simply a confederation of States, without the power of self-protection or self-preservation. To me it seems rather late for gentlemen to make such a claim. That question was raised under the administration of Andrew Jackson, and he, comprehending the true character of our Government, appreciating the grave and responsible duties that devolved upon him as its Chief Executive, met that issue in his time with that firm, determined, and heroic spirit which characterized all his public acts, and State pride and State rights yielded to Federal authority. South Carolina knew that Andrew Jackson filled the presidential chair, that he was Commander-in-Chief of the Army and the Navy, and that the whole force of the General Government would be exerted to execute the laws of the land.

In 1861 this question of Federal power and authority was raised again. Not only was this authority denied, but the power of the General Government defied. James Buchanan, the last of democratic Presidents, sat in the chair of state, and spent the closing days and hours of his administration in studying the Constitution of his country, that he had sworn to support, to learn whether he was the President of a nation or not, and he called for the advice of his democratic law officer, the Attorney-General, to aid him in the constitutional investigation, and they arrived at the sage conclusion that there was no constitutional power to preserve the existence of the nation. About the time he made this grand discovery his term of office expired, and with him in this nation closed forever the history of democratic Presidents. His successor, Abraham Lincoln, was inaugurated the President of a nation, and under his administration this great question was submitted to the dread arbitrament of arms. In that great conflict, through those four years of desolating war, the power and authority of the National Government was maintained, and we all supposed that this question was settled forever. But, sir, from the oft-repeated utterances made from this floor during the debate on the Army bill, which has already gone to the Senate, and the debate on the bill now pending before the House, it seems the old State-rights question has returned to disturb our councils and distract our people.

It is not my purpose at this time to enter upon an extended discussion of the power of the General Government to legislate in regard to Federal elections. To me this power seems so plain and palpable under the terms of the Constitution itself that the wonder is that any fair-minded man should now controvert it.

Listen. Article 1, section 4, of the Constitution of the United States provides:

> The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators.

From this language can there be a doubt as to the power of Congress over this subject? "Congress may at any time." How? "By law." Do what? "Make or alter such regulations." What language could have been employed by the framers of the Constitution to have made this grant of power more specific and more complete? The members of that convention were wise and sagacious men. They were engaged in a great work, framing a fundamental law for a great nation, not for a day, but for all time. Would they in their wisdom have been likely, in founding a government with the popular branch of its Legislature elected by the free suffrages of the citizen, to have left, as it is now contended, the entire election machinery under State jurisdiction, thereby making the very existence of the popular branch depend upon State authority? The office of member of Congress and the House of Representatives itself are creatures of this Constitution. Without it there would be no office of member of Congress, no national House of Representatives. Where do States derive the authority claimed for them to regulate Federal elections?

There were no Federal elections until the Constitution was framed and adopted. Their authority, if they possess such, must be derived from the instrument itself that created the office and created that body. If so, what power has the State which the General Government does not possess and has the right to assume and exercise at any time when the regulations provided by the State are not satisfactory to the Congress of the United States? Certainly the power claimed is either in the State or the Congress of the United States. The State Legislature, under section 4, just quoted, cannot have a greater power over this subject than Congress itself, and all the power which the State possesses must be subordinated to the power vested in Congress, for the right conferred upon the State Legislature to act is complete in the first instance. But suppose they do not act. Congress certainly can by law "prescribe the time, the place, and the manner" of electing Representatives. Or suppose the Legislature of the State itself prescribed by law the time, place, and manner, Congress still has the power under this clause in the Constitution to make new regulations, which would necessarily supersede those made by the State, or to change to any extent the regulations which the State Legislature had prescribed, except as to the place of electing Senators.

An examination of the proceedings of the convention which framed this Constitution, the action of the convention by which this section was finally agreed upon as it now stands, the debate which took place therein, the action of several of the States when the question of its adoption was before them, and the discussions before their respective conventions will leave no room for doubt that the statesmen who framed the Constitution, and the people of that day regarded the provision now under consideration as conferring the power I claim.

Then, again, these laws which have been so vehemently denounced by the gentlemen on the other side as infringing upon the rights of the States, usurping State powers and State functions, have been upon the statute-books upward of seven years. The courts of the United States have been open to test their constitutionality, and, as was said by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. HOUK,] there is no democrat in the land, whether he can read or not, who is not a profound constitutional lawyer. It is within the knowledge of all that the democracy have given great attention to constitutional questions, particularly for the last seventeen years, and in view of all this it seems a little strange that none of them have had sufficient confidence in their constitutional opinion to carry the question to the courts and have it adjudicated by the highest tribunal in the land.

Certainly there can be no doubt as to the power of Congress over this whole question, and it is equally true, as a matter of fact, that when these laws were passed the evils were so great as to demand Federal interference to prevent them. The results which have followed from the enforcement of these laws have in every instance vindicated not only the wisdom of the laws but the necessity for their enactment. The same reasons which demanded the passage of these laws to-day require their retention. Until States have provided the necessary safeguards for the protection of the ballot and for the prevention of frauds at congressional elections these laws should remain. Amend them if they are defective. Improve them if you can, but do not strike them down by the passage of this bill and thus surrender the ballot-boxes to the cheats and ruffians of the great cities, and the white-liners, red-shirts, and bulldozers of the South. To do so would be an act of madness if not of crime. The great right of suffrage which American citizenship confers is too sacred to be tampered with, abridged, or denied. Its exercise should be free, untrammeled, and unawed.

This is the citizen's right, and it is the duty of the National Government, so far as its congressional elections are concerned, to protect them in the enjoyment of it with all the power at its command. If that right could be enjoyed throughout the country to-day, there might be some excuse or justification for the repeal of these election laws; but, sir, there are sections of the South where free elections are unknown, where fraud, intimidation, and violence have destroyed a race as a political factor and disorganized and driven the republican party from the field. The evidence of these facts is overwhelming and can be found in the numerous reports which have been made from time to time by investigating committees of this House or the Senate now in the Congressional Library.

I have no desire to remove the veil and expose again to public gaze the details of the brutal and barbarous atrocities committed upon the republicans in the South that are recorded in these reports. But when you come into this House with a proposition to tear down the barriers which Congress has erected to protect the ballot and secure freedom and purity at elections, to seek to drive away the United States Government from the polls, with the claim upon your lips that the right of suffrage is respected and enjoyed everywhere in the South, and that these laws are unnecessary, you should not be surprised that this dark and bloody record arises to confront and confound you.

What, sir, was the condition of Louisiana and South Carolina at the very last election in 1878, and a congressional election at that? I have no wish to go back beyond that period. That will be sufficient for my purpose to show the necessity for Federal control at congressional elections.

In South Carolina the celebrated tissue ballots became an important factor, and by their aid and by intimidation the "divine right" (?) of the democracy to rule in that State was vindicated. I cannot go into details, but will select from the report of a Senate committee to investigate these frauds a few specimen extracts to show how purity of elections is secured in South Carolina under home rule, and leave to the determination of this House and the country whether the Federal authority, not only military but civil, should be driven from the polls at Federal elections, and all control over them thus surrendered to the South Carolina democracy. (Extracts from report of Teller committee.)

CHARLESTON CITY.

Washington engine-house precinct.

At Washington engine-house precinct in ward 6, Charleston City, the voting proceeded quietly all day. Walter Elfe was the republican supervisor, and R. M. Wilson the democratic. At this polling-place there is every reason to believe that there was a large republican majority. The count was commenced, there being in the room three republicans and from thirty to forty democrats. After a short time the gas went out. Candles were obtained and the count continued a short time longer, when the candles were put out. In the darkness that followed the ballot-box was broken up and the ballots destroyed. The number of votes cast was 865. No return was ever made from this box.

Palmetto engine-house precinct.

At the Palmetto engine-house precinct, in ward 3, voting proceeded quietly until about half past three o'clock in the afternoon, when the supervisors called on the deputy marshal to arrest a man who had attempted to vote the second time. At this an attack was made on the supervisor, and his poll-list destroyed. Up to that time his poll-list showed that there had been 915 votes cast; and his poll-list tallied with the poll-list of the managers. From that time until six o'clock the supervisor did not keep any poll-list. When the vote was canvassed at that poll it was claimed that there had been 3,569 votes cast. If this number was cast, there must have been cast in two and a half hours 2,654 votes, or at the rate of 17 votes a minute. When the box was opened all agree that there were a great number of tissue tickets in it. These tickets were of very thin paper—so thin that print can be read through the paper—and only $3\frac{3}{8}$ inches in length and $1\frac{1}{2}$ inches wide, while an ordinary ticket is from $7\frac{1}{2}$ inches to $8\frac{1}{2}$ inches in length and from 2 to $2\frac{1}{2}$ inches wide. Just how many tissue tickets were in the box cannot now be exactly determined, because when the committee examined the boxes there were no tickets in this box, although tickets were found in the boxes used at all the other polling places except one. The supervisor swears that just before the poll closed the president of the democratic ward club came to the polls; and the witness says that he distinctly saw him put tissue tickets into the box in packages. The witness protested against this, but the managers said, if there are too many in the box we will not count them. When the box was opened, the witness says that he saw half a dozen packages of those tissue tickets that had never been folded, and they were all counted. The returns gave the democratic candidate for Congress 3,143 votes, and the republican candidate 416.

There was one other polling-place in this ward—the Market Hall—at which the republicans are reported as having 121 and the democrats 1,866, making the total vote of the ward 5,556. The highest vote ever cast in this ward was in 1876, when it cast 1,886.

That it is physically impossible in two and a half hours to cast over 2,600 votes all must admit; and it becomes the more apparent when it is understood that, by the laws of South Carolina, every voter must be sworn to the effect that he is a voter, that he has not voted elsewhere at that election, &c. The evidence shows that during the day the voters at that poll were sworn, one by one, as they voted; and if from six o'clock in the forenoon to half past three in the afternoon only 915 persons voted, the increase from that time to six o'clock in the evening is more than remarkable.

Hope engine-house.

The United States supervisor testified that he did not reach the polling place until the polls had been open twenty minutes; the managers called it thirty, but witness said it was only twenty minutes. The supervisor kept a poll list after he arrived. When the count was made it was found that there were twelve hundred and eighty-six names on the manager's list, and but twelve hundred and thirty-eight votes in the box. The supervisor had on his list (which contained the names of all who voted after half-past six o'clock a. m.) eight hundred and thirty-eight names. The poll-lists of the republican and the democratic supervisors agreed. When the count was made at the close of voting, there were found in the box three hundred and twenty-three tissue democratic tickets; and this number were found remaining in the box when examined by the committee. The tissue tickets were all counted as if honestly cast, and the return was, democratic tickets seven hundred and sixteen, republican five hundred and twenty-two. It is quite apparent that the difference between the supervisor's lists and the managers' arose from additions being made to the latter to cover the number of tissue tickets fraudulently placed in the box.

CHRIST'S CHURCH PARISH PRECINCT, (MOUNT PLEASANT.)

The supervisor at this precinct swears that he arrived at the poll before six o'clock, but the managers declared that it was after six; and on his demand to see the inside of the box, they refused, saying it was too late. The poll list of the managers and supervisors agreed, the total number being 620. When the ballots were taken out it was found that there were 1,163, or an excess of 543. A large number were tissue tickets. At this, as in all other precincts, the regular democratic tickets and the republican tickets were so different in their texture that they could be easily distinguished by the touch. The 543 tickets in excess were drawn out and destroyed, and of this number 372 were republican and 171 democratic. The box from that precinct, when examined by the committee, contained 464 democratic tissue tickets. Thus at this precinct the excess of tickets fraudulently put in the box was the means of drawing from the box 372 republican tickets; and the true returns would have been: democratic, 101; republican, 419—a republican majority of 318, instead of a democratic majority of 366—or a clear loss to the republicans in this precinct of 684 votes.

This may be taken as a fair sample of other voting places.

SUMTER COUNTY.

In Sumter County tissue tickets were also used; but it appears either that the leaders did not determine to use the tickets in the commencement of the campaign, or that they did not have confidence in their ability to carry the election by their use alone; for the most strenuous efforts were made to frighten the republican leaders from their attempted organization of the republican party. Republican speakers were threatened and maltreated, and republican meetings disturbed and broken up. Whenever and wherever the republicans attempted to hold meetings, the democracy attended in numbers, armed, and insisted on participating in the meeting, and, if refused, were threatening in their manner.

On the 12th of October the republicans attempted to hold a meeting at Sumter, the county seat. The democrats also called a meeting at the same time and place. The call for the democratic meeting was not issued until after that of the republican meeting. On the day of the meeting the democrats appeared in great numbers on horseback and on foot, armed and accompanied by an artillery company with two field-pieces. The democrats presented a programme to the republicans for division of time, but the republicans declined, and held their meeting some distance from where the democratic meeting was held. The republican meeting was not well attended, as many had feared to attend on account of the presence of the mounted and armed democrats.

Mr. Moise, a democratic witness, introduced by the minority of the committee, testified that the number at the republican meeting was about five hundred; that there were present in the town about two thousand white democrats, and among them between five and eight hundred armed cavalrymen. He said as the republicans were returning to the town after the meeting adjourned, with a band of music, and the national flag flying as they passed, about sixty of the red-shirt democracy in attendance became excited, and, leaving the democratic meeting, went after the republican procession. At once the cry was raised that there was to be a riot. The democrats loaded the cannon with nails and ran it out for action. It does not appear that the colored republicans had in any manner interfered with the democrats. Mr. Moise says that the young men in the democratic party were excited at the sight of the American flag, which, he declared, was an unpopular emblem in that part of the country. He said the republicans carried the American flag at their meetings and the democrats did not. Speaking of the national flag, he said: "When they see it at a republican meeting, where it is an emblem of oppression, it excites them. I hope it will be otherwise some time." He also testified that the colored people became very much excited; they were unarmed, and did not appear to know what to do. The American flag was pulled down, but it is not clear whether it was taken down by the whites or the colored people.

It was under difficulties of this character that the republicans carried on the campaign. One witness says that every man who took a prominent part was menaced.

Tissue tickets appear to have been used in much the same way they were in Charleston County.

It is not strange that, with intimidation and threats and the use of tissue tickets, the democrats were able to secure the returns in their favor, although the colored people are more than twice as numerous in Sumter County as the whites.

In the State of Louisiana, in Caddo Parish, the registration of voters was as follows: whites, 1,496; colored, 3,735. The colored men there, as everywhere, were true to the party which had freed and enfranchised them. At a republican meeting where the issues of the campaign were being discussed the democrats demanded the right to take part in the discussion, and the republican speakers were even compelled to desist on account of democratic interference. The democracy openly proclaimed their purpose to carry the election. Military companies were organized in its interest. In one ward, where the registered colored vote was 325 and the white vote 15, the voting place was changed and so located that nineteen-twentieths of the voters were compelled to travel a round trip of from forty to sixty miles to exercise the right of suffrage. Voters were compelled to start on Sunday evening in order to reach the voting place by the morning of the election. Two hundred and seventy republican votes were cast, notwithstanding these obstacles placed in the way, and after the voting was completed armed ruffians seized the ballot-box, destroyed the ballots, and no return was ever made.

At Caledonia two colored men were killed at the voting place. A negro hunt commenced, and if the testimony of a deputy sheriff is to be believed twenty were killed that night and the next day, and their bodies left unburied on the spot where they fell.

In Natchitoches Parish, by the State census taken in 1875, the whites numbered 5,907 and the colored 15,404. The votes cast for democratic candidate for Congress were 2,819, and for the republican candidate none! In September a republican ward meeting was held to elect officers for the ward club. Dr. Breda and his brother, who is a lawyer, both ex-confederate soldiers and southern men, Mr. Barron, Mr. Boult, and other white men, natives of the State, Rev. A. R. Blount, a man of property and a Baptist minister, with others, were present. The republican club was organized and short speeches made. The democratic nominating convention was in session a short distance away. After a recess in the latter a vote was taken to go down to this republican meeting and "disperse the mob," and a Mr. Cunningham was chosen captain of this band. He requested every one to "go and get their arms;" but the republican meeting had adjourned before the armed democratic desperadoes arrived. The day after the organization of the republican club the mayor notified the two Bredas to leave, and they did so. Mr. V. A. Barron, ex-confederate, Mr. Roby, president of the republican club, and John G. Lewis, secretary, were all driven into exile for opinion's sake, and John R. Hornsby, a native of the State, an ex-confederate, and a justice of the peace under the appointment of Governor Nichols, was permitted to remain on the following conditions:

That he should not speak to any nigger in regard to politics; that he should not interfere in regard to politics in any manner, shape, or form during the campaign; and that he should not write any speeches nor aspire to office. He asked the consequence if he did not sign. They replied, "You know what became of Blount and others; if you do not sign the articles you must leave the parish." He declined to sign, and was compelled to leave the parish, although he presented the appearance, when before the committee, of being in the last stages of consumption.

Thus were all the republican leaders driven from the parish, the party organization destroyed, and its voters disfranchised by conduct which would disgrace the highwayman.

In Tensas Parish, by the State census of 1875, there were—whites, 1,417; colored, 17,100. The vote cast for the democratic candidate for member of Congress, 2,795; for the republican candidate, 90! This parish was the scene of discord and bloodshed. Armed raiders rode through the country committing outrages upon the colored people. Men were whipped, shot, and hung by these white raiders, and others, driven away by fear, died of starvation. Comment upon deeds like these is unnecessary. They tell their own story. Human language is too weak to properly characterize their enormity, and sooner or later the hand of retributive justice will be laid upon the perpetrators.

Concordia Parish, by the State census of 1875, numbered, whites, 673; colored, 10,955. The vote returned for the democratic candidate for member of Congress was 1,037; for the republican candidate, 955. The democratic campaign here was carried on in the usual manner. Armed raiding parties roamed through the parish. Some seven were hung, some killed in other ways, and the people fled to the town for protection or to the swamps to avoid the murderers.

At Frogmore armed men took possession of the ballot-boxes and destroyed the ballots.

In Pointe Coupée Parish the democracy began their campaign early. Their first orders, quasi military, were issued in April or May to the colored voters, and they were of this character: "If you organize the party you will be strung up." "No republican ticket at the polls." In June following another movement in the democratic campaign was deemed necessary. The public must be impressed with the idea that the orders above given would be enforced, and I will let Mr. Randall McGowan give his own account of it.

The next morning Mr. Lewis said there were five men hung. I asked him what for, and he said Thomas Williams, a leader in the Fourth ward, was about to organize his club; that it was about time for us to go into the campaign; and those boys appeared that night. * * * They said they did these things to scare negroes, so that they might carry the election. These five men were given up for execution by one man, Legender, and they were all the hands, save one, on his place.

The exigencies of the democracy required the suppression of the republican vote, and in August the ordinary democratic appliances were brought into operation to accomplish this result, and as that is so well stated by Randall McGowan, as reported by the committee, I will allow him to state it in his own way:

He says that on the 14th of August a body of armed men came to his house at night-time and accused him of assisting to organize republican clubs. He protested that he had not been guilty of that offense They took him about four miles, where he expected to find some colored people, but on arriving they had disbanded. They went to the house of one Murdock, a leading republican; not finding him, they tied his wife up by her thumbs to compel her to reveal the hiding place of her husband. Failing to find Murdock, they went to the house of one Wells, whom they accused of having sought information as to how to organize a republican club. After whipping him, they called at the places of two other colored republicans, but did not find them at home. At this time they met the colored minister and his congregation returning from church. The people saw the crowd of armed men and fled. The minister was shot three times and left for dead, (although he recovered.) They committed outrages of a dastardly character on an old colored man, afterward giving him two hundred lashes. They told McGowan that he should bring all the colored people on the following Saturday and have them enrolled as democrats; and on promising to do so he was allowed to go.

But, sir, I weary with the recital of such barbarities and atrocities committed upon unoffending men to subserve the interest and insure the success of a political party. I will only add the summary of the report of the committee of the Senate appointed to inquire into the alleged frauds and violence in the elections of 1878, which may be found in Senate Report No. 855, Forty-fifth Congress, second session, page 24:

SUMMARY OF MURDERS AND VIOLENCE.

The examination of the committee, it will be seen, was confined to but seven of the fifty-two parishes of Louisiana. In these seven parishes the evidence shows there were murdered "for political purposes," during the campaign of 1878, John Williams, (page 45;) Robert Williams, (44, 57, 186, 192, 236, 347, 470;) Luke Wiggins, (44, 48;) Lot Clarke, (46, 58, 62;) Billy White, (46, 48, 62;) Greene Abrams, (49;) Josiah Thomas, (58;) Charles Bethel, (192, 236, 337, 347, 561;) William Singleton, (178, 191, 348;) Monday Hill, (186, 192, 236, 347, 469;) Louis Posthelwaite, (186, 347;) Richard Miller, (192, 236, 347;) James Starver, (192, 347, 473;) Commodore Smallwood, (236, 348, 355;) Charlie Carroll, (236, 355;) John Higgins, (278, 348;) "Doc." Smith, (347, 355, 359;) William Hunter, (348;) Hyams Wilson, (348, 355;) Wash Ellis, (348;) Asbury Epps, (244, 348;) John Robinson, (355;) Rufus Mills, (416.) Besides these there were fully as many others murdered, whose names the committee were unable to ascertain, whose corpses were seen by witnesses who testified before the committee hanging on trees or lying dead in the streets or fields. Dozens more were wounded from shots fired at them with murderous intent, some of whom were present as witnesses before the committee exhibiting their scars; others were whipped or beaten and mutilated; wives were tied up by the thumbs and whipped for refusing to tell where their husbands were secreted; scores of leaders in politics among the colored men were driven from their homes, leaving their crops in the field and their families unprovided for. In brief, a literal "reign of terror" existed, and, in fact, still exists, over a considerable portion of Louisiana, as the result of the policy adopted by the democracy for perpetuating its rule in that State.

With this record of recent transactions before us, showing that a free ballot, free speech, and free political action are absolutely destroyed by lawless power; that American citizens are exiled for their political opinions, wounded, mutilated, and murdered because they seek to exercise the rights of freemen; that tissue ballots, the bludgeon, and the bowie-knife have determined the election of members of this House, it is not time to withdraw the Federal power from congressional elections and to surrender the ballot-box into the dishonest and bloody hands of these men.

Mr. Chairman, I have endeavored to consider this question in a spirit of candor and fairness, discussing the origin of these laws and the necessity for their enactment, giving a brief abstract of their provisions, the power of Congress to enact them, answering some objections that have been urged against them, and stating my reasons for a belief in the need of their continuance upon the statute-books. I have not sought to rekindle the animosities of the war, or to excite sectional feeling and sectional strife. I know too well that the peace and the prosperity of our whole country and the happiness and welfare of our people demand a restoration of friendly relations and the re-establishment of mutual confidence and respect.

But, sir, that happy era will never dawn upon this land until deeds such as I have described shall have ceased. The leaders of the democratic party, in my judgment, possess the power to end them now and forever. Disband your rifle clubs, dismount your midnight raiders, cease to use these organizations as auxiliaries in your political campaigns, and rely no longer upon them and upon tissue ballots for party success, and they will disappear from the arena of politics.

Do more: protect and secure to all citizens, whether white or black, the full and free enjoyment of all their rights as American citizens, and strife between the sections will cease.

Mr. DAVIS, of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, it is to be deplored that the simple issues involved in the question under consideration should not have been examined and dismissed in a calm and dispassionate manner, free from even the semblance of partisan bitterness. What need of seeking to inflame sectional animosities or party prejudices in dealing with so plain and simple a question, concerning in an equal degree the rights and liberties of all parties and every section of this Republic.

It is nothing to the purpose of this discussion that errors and grievances have existed in the past, which were the outgrowth of other circumstances and conditions of this people and its government. We can better serve the country and honor ourselves by allowing the dead to bury its dead, and directing our energies to the vital and living issues that immediately surround us. It can serve no useful or wise purpose to assail with undue asperity the originators of the laws we desire to repeal, still less can it avail to ascribe to those seeking their repeal a deliberate and willful intent to pervert the legitimate powers of legislation to party and personal ends. Our duty, as it should be our desire, is to remedy the error or wrong, and not engender or inflame party animosity.

Now, does or not the legislation which we seek to erase from the statute-book of the nation bear the impress of error or wrong? Clearly both, as will appear from a very casual examination of the subject. I shall assume at the outset, and I think satisfactorily demonstrate before I close, that the law as it now stands upon the statute-book is wholly unconstitutional, and therefore unauthorized and dangerous. And I cannot but consider every attempt to justify its continued existence as a plea for the establishment of unlicensed power and a thrust at the stability of republican government, because the prolonged existence of a government of the people wholly depends upon the free exercise of the elective franchise under the conditions which the people themselves have established. This has been the experience of all people in every age, and can the ingenuity of the wisest of us furnish a better guide?

There need be no cavil about this matter, such as is necessarily incident to the discussion of a mere question of expediency, for although some of the gentlemen who have spoken on the subject have inclined to defend the continued existence of this law on the grounds of its utility or necessity, I am unwilling to believe that they desire to rest their arguments on such an unstable foundation. I cannot consider the discussion of a grave constitutional question as in any way involving the subject of expediency. We are not here at this time to consider whether or not the provisions of the Constitution are all-wise and expedient. That inquiry we may well leave for more mature and timely investigation. We have simply and solely before us the abstract question whether or not the legislation sought to be repealed can lawfully exist under any of its provisions. I think we may safely assume that it cannot. If any such provision had existed the opponents of the repeal would have produced it, and its production would have obviated the necessity for resorting to the plea of expediency in its defense. If, then, this law is wholly unauthorized by the Constitution, it is worse than folly to attempt to justify its existence on the grounds of utility or expediency.

I believe there is no pretense by the opponents of this repeal measure that there is any direct authority in the Constitution for the existence of the present law relating to the appointment of Federal supervisors of elections. All their arguments draw the breath of their nostrils from implied power; and they can quite as well draw any other inference of license for despotic rule from the Constitution as the particular one now selected. Where will you draw the line of demarkation beyond which the demagogue or the despot shall not carry his inferences or implications when ambition is in his heart? Fortunately the wise and patriotic framers of the Constitution have fixed the bounds beyond which sophistry or passion cannot lawfully extend their interpretations of its language. They have said, in substance, you shall not infer power and authority which is not expressly or by clear implication delegated to you.

Listen for a moment to the words of the great and learned Story. He says, speaking of the Constitution:

> Being an instrument of limited and enumerated powers, it follows irresistibly that what is not conferred is withheld, and belongs to the State authorities, if invested by their constitutions of government respectively in them; and if not so invested, it is retained by the people as a part of their residuary sovereignty. (Volume 3, page 752.)

It follows, from this undoubtedly correct principle, that if the champions of this law cannot put their fingers on the line of the Constitution which expressly, or by clear implication, authorizes its enactment, it was enacted in positive violation of the Constitution, and its enactment and its present existence is an error and a wrong which every well-wisher of his country should desire to see corrected. The country and the world should not for a moment be left in doubt as to the desire of an American national legislature to correct an error or remedy a wrong on the instant of its discovery. That a grave error was committed in the enactment of this law can be made certainly sufficiently apparent, and to longer allow it unrepealed would be to do violence to the intelligence and patriotism of this body, and perpetuate the existence of a glaring wrong to the States whose prerogatives were unlawfully invaded.

You have been told that even if the constitutionality is doubtful, this law is necessary to prevent injustice and fraud. Injustice and fraud by whom? Toward whom? By the several States toward some of their own citizens; and this unconstitutional remedy is, I suppose, sought to be applied on the principle that two wrongs will make a right.

Now unconstitutional legislation, if not in itself obnoxious, is to be deplored for the dangerous precedent it establishes, and the feeling of insecurity which it engenders, but when its effect is at once to deprive States of a clear right and impugn their integrity it is doubly deplorable. But if the accusations made against the States were conceded to be true it could afford no justification for the passage of an unconstitutional law to correct the evil, and it looks very like an imputation thrown out to disguise the real motives which induced its enactment and which to-day animates the opponents of its repeal. You cannot have forgotten that the plea of necessity is the old device adopted by the unscrupulous and designing in all ages to undermine liberty and destroy free government. But does it not occur to the champions of this law that by seeking to sustain it on the ground of expediency they concede its illegitimacy? Gentlemen have told you that the Government must protect all its citizens in the enjoyment of all their rights. And this is the principle for which we contend. But how the gentlemen propose to protect the rights of all the citizens by an invasion of the rights of a very large part remains to be explained. In other words, they design to overthrow the clear constitutional rights of an entire Commonwealth to secure to a few the enforcement of a principle which is not guaranteed by the Constitution.

Another objection urged by the opponents of this repeal measure is that it seeks to establish a recognition of the doctrine of State rights; and hence they seem to be satisfied with disposing of the constitutionality of all these propositions with the cry that the claim for their unconstitutionality grounds itself on the old doctrine of State rights, which was exploded by the war; and with this they couple the idea that since the war we have a government—a nation. This is such a vague and indefinite and yet so popular declaration of the results of the war and of the nature of our present form of government that it may be well to examine how far it is correct.

The loyal portion of this country believed that the Union was not simply a confederation of States; not simply a compact between independent and sovereign States, owing allegiance to the General Government only at their pleasure; but that it was a government of the United States, to which all owe allegiance as the supreme power in the land, not only as citizens, but as States. They believed that the people of a State had no right, acting upon their own construction, to resist the powers delegated to the General Government, and dissolve all connection with it at their own discretion.

Many honest men in the South thought differently. They believed the Government of the United States was formed as a compact by the States in their sovereign capacity, and being voluntary parties to the compact, they had the right to voluntarily withdraw from it.

The majority believed every citizen owed paramount allegiance to the United States Government, and that the State governments were bound to the Federal Government. War was the result. The power of the South was broken, the idea of Unionists triumphed. Leaving out of consideration the abolition of slavery and its results, I ask what was this triumph? What were its results and effects? Did it change the nature and character of this Government? Did it change the frame-work of our Constitution? No. The result of this triumph was simply a vindication of the doctrine that it is a government of law, binding upon all, and not to be overthrown at the caprice or whim of any one man or set of men. It was not an overthrow of the Government, but a vindication of the interpretation of the Constitution that all the people of all the States are bound to and by it. It was not an overthrow of the Constitution, but the idea fixed and determined that the Federal Constitution is, in fact, the fundamental law of the land; that it is not a compact or promise proceeding from the people or States, but a law directed to the States and to the people, and is the supreme law of the land.

For this doctrine the loyal portion of this country fought. In a word they fought for the doctrine that the Federal Government does not contain the elements of its own destruction. And one of the greatest monuments to the good sense and patriotic spirit of the American people is, that after the exercise of such extraordinary powers during the war, they did not change the general frame-work and character of our Government, but preserved the Constitution as given us by our fathers, only stamping upon it the doctrine that when the people or the States feel aggrieved by any of its workings they are to seek redress inside of, and by prescribed methods, and not outside of and beyond the Constitution. We have, then, if you please, a consolidated union of the States with a general government resting upon the will of the people, and that will contained and expressed in the Federal Constitution. Being the will of the people, to it we should look for their wishes. Its language is unchanged, and to its terms we must look for its applications. Its rules of interpretations are still intact. We must use them to ascertain its meanings. It is the supreme law of the land and by it we must be guided. This fact being settled, we must not look to vague and indefinite notions of what the war accomplished for its true meaning, but to the instrument itself. One of the provisions of this instrument is this:

> The House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the States, and the electors of each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature.

This provision, it is urged by Mr. ROBESON, of New Jersey, impliedly confers on Congress the right to exercise a censorship over the election of members of this House. It seems to me this provision correctly interpreted proves the very reverse of what is contended by Mr. ROBESON in his argument, and instead of furnishing a pretext for Federal interference, conclusively negatives any such right. It provides that "the House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States." Here, then, is a clear and absolute recognition of the power possessed by the people of the several States to choose their congressional Representatives without reservation. We need go no further, we need examine no other provision of the Constitution to find where this power resides, for by this very clause it is expressly located and in the people of the several States respectively.

Now, it is a correct principle that a power inherent or granted implies the ordinary means of its execution. As Mr. Story says:

> What is a power but the ability or faculty of doing a thing? What is the ability to do a thing but the power of employing the means necessary to its execution? * * * What are the proper means of executing such a power but necessary and proper laws? * * * It would otherwise result that the power could never be exercised; that is, the end would be required and yet no means allowed. This would be an absurdity.

This power, then, to choose Representatives belonging to the people of the States as declared by the Constitution, it follows as a logical sequence that the possession of this paramount power exclusively by the States necessarily involves as an incident to its possession the retention of all other lesser powers essential to its exercise. It would be a perversion of all rules of logic to say that while the States possess the power to choose their Representatives they lack the power to regulate the conduct of the polls at which the choice is made. How, then, can any powers be lawfully exercised by United States supervisors?

The provision then continues:

> The electors of each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature.

From this clause the gentleman from New Jersey frames the following argument:

> The qualifications of these electors are made by the States. The United States does not confer the right of suffrage upon these individuals, and takes as its voters a class which already have the right of suffrage given by the States.

From this he concludes the United States should see that this class has a free and fair election.

The bare statement of the proposition is the refutation of his conclusion. He says, "the qualifications of these electors are made by the States." If, then, the power resides alone in the States to make these qualifications, of course, as Mr. Story argues, the incidental power also resides there exclusively of determining what particular individuals possess these qualifications; in other words, the exclusive power of determining the individual voters and conducting the elections for this purpose; and the adoption of this class of voters by the United States is simply the adoption of voters whose qualifications the State alone has the power to prescribe, and whose qualifications the State alone possesses the power to pass upon. So in this clause there is a clear and absolute recognition of the power of the States to determine the qualifications of these electors, for it will not be contended that any power exists elsewhere than in the people of the several States to establish the qualifications for electors of their legislative bodies and the establishing of these qualfications for electors of the State Legislatures establishes them for the National Legislature. No one will pretend that the United States has the right to determine who shall vote for members of the most numerous branch of the State Legislatures; yet the very act of determining this is the very act of determining who shall vote for members of this House, for a man cannot be an elector for the latter unless he is for the former.

There is but one class of electors, and that is the class which includes electors for the most numerous branch of the State Legislature. There is but one enumeration of qualifications, and those are the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature. In fact there is but one qualification for an elector for members of this House, and that is a qualification which the State alone has the power to determine. In other words, the recognition of a man as a voter by the State authorities is a condition-precedent to his qualification to vote for members of this House.

When, then, can the authority of the Federal Government be exercised? Where does its function or power come in, when the determination of the whole matter is within the power and jurisdiction of the State, and the Constitution says the General Government shall be guided by what the State says?

It must be constantly borne in mind that Congress is the mere creature of the Constitution. It possesses no power not delegated to it by that instrument; and this right of supervising State elections for members of this House is not only not delegated, but by the terms of the Constitution expressly resides in the States, and very wisely, for without it an independent State government could not well exist. The exclusive right to judge of the qualifications of its voters is a fundamental principle of all free States, and without it all other powers are futile and impotent. The Supreme Court of the United States has fully recognized this principle in holding that the Constitution does not confer the power to vote; and it will not be contended that from the Constitution of the United States originates the right of the elective franchise at all. It is a right derived solely from the constitutions of the several States, and exists quite independently of the United States Constitution.

Can it be logically contended that Congress can control the methods of exercising a prerogative which the Federal Constitution does not create? Congress can lawfully do no more than the Constitution permits it to do, and the Constitution does no more than prescribe the class of electors that may vote for congressional Representatives. The qualifications of the individuals composing that class are determined by the several States. For instance, if any State should require a property qualification in electors for the most numerous branch of the State Legislature, Congress could not constitutionally say that a person without property should be eligible as a congressional elector. It can only say that all persons possessing qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature shall be entitled to vote for members of this House. The several States and not the United States are the judges whether or not the person claiming to possess the necessary qualifications does in reality possess them. And it seems to me that the exclusive possession of this power being in the very nature of the case in the several States effectually disposes of this entire question; for if the States are the sole judges (which certainly they are) of the competency of any person offering himself as a voter at their polls, a United States supervisor can find no legitimate occupation there.

Let us suppose that a person claiming to possess the necessary qualifications of an elector for the most numerous branch of the State Legislature in a State requiring, for instance, a property qualification in a voter presents himself at the polls and tenders his vote. Can Congress declare by statute that such a person shall be entitled to deposit his vote on swearing that he possesses the necessary qualifications? Clearly not, because the people of the State alone can judge of the fact. The truth or falsity of his representations is to be determined by the local inspectors of elections at the polls where the vote is offered and in the manner prescribed by the laws of the State. Clearly, then, the United States can exercise no authority over such electors. And nothing that may be said in support of an assumption of such authority can be elevated into the dignity of a legal argument, since it has neither the sanction of law nor logic for its existence.

This provision of the Constitution, then, instead of sustaining the constitutionality of Federal interference with State elections for members of this House, demonstrates that in the very nature of the case, in the very exercise of powers which the State authorities are compelled to employ, there is no room and no occupation for a Federal supervisor or marshal.

This provision expressly says the election of members of this House shall be by the people of the States, and no one else; and we know the possession of this exclusive right implies the exclusive possession of all powers necessary to its exercise. The people of the State alone confer the right of suffrage, and hence it is their exclusive prerogative to regulate the methods of its exercise. This provision of the Constitution prescribes a qualification for electors of members of this House which can only be fixed and passed upon by the State authorities. This provision even disposes of the argument sought to be made on that clause which says Congress may regulate "the manner" of holding elections for Representatives; for we may grant the fullest latitude to this power, and yet the fact will stand out boldly that the qualification of an elector for members of this House is based on a qualification which the State alone can prescribe, determine, and pass upon, and which, when determined and passed upon, settles the whole question, and no power or authority has the right to prevent the voter declared thus to be qualified from depositing his ballot.

But the United States supervisors and marshals undertake the regulation of the elections, when the Constitution expressly says the members of this House shall be chosen by the people of the States. They pass upon the qualification of the electors—a power and right belonging to the people of the State alone.

Then is not the assumption of such authority unconstitutional and the laws granting such authority unconstitutional? Clearly. And nothing that may be said in support of such assumption of authority can be elevated into the dignity of a legal argument, since it has neither the sanction of law nor logic for its existence.

And if the champions of these statutes consider it either wise or expedient to attempt their vindication on any other grounds, they mistake the line of their duty and the true interests of the country. It was for the preservation intact of the Constitution that blood and treasure flowed like water in our civil conflict, and woe betide the party or faction that in times of peace shall seek in anywise to impair the legitimate triumphs of that awful struggle for its permanent supremacy.

Mr. HENRY addressed the committee. [His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, the member from Michigan, [Mr. BURROWS,] in his remarks to this committee on April 18, undertook to sustain his charges against the democratic party by blackening the name of Louisiana. To effect this he quoted in part from the majority report of the "Teller committee," which he supplemented with striking pictures of outrage drawn from his own vivid imagination.

It is a common experience that it is easier to hatch a foul brood of falsehood than it is to destroy it when it has once flown from its nest. It is a useless task to attempt to hunt down all the winged fictions from fertile brains of men bent on deception and strife, but I conceive it to be my duty not to permit false charges against the State I have the honor in part to represent to go unrebuked. When a member attempts to pass his spurious small change as the subsidiary coinage of politics, I must beg leave to enter my protest.

Sir, I am amazed when I see a member of this House undertaking to base charges against the citizens of my State upon the flimsy testimony taken by the majority of the "Teller committee," especially when it must be within the knowledge of the member from Michigan that forty of the very identical gentlemen indicted upon the charges made before that committee with alleged crimes against the election laws, confronted by the same witnesses, have been recently tried in the city of New Orleans and acquitted. Their trial was before a jury to the members of which the "test" or "iron-clad" oath had been applied, and presided over by two United States judges. I repeat that they were promptly and honorably acquitted. Another lot of over fifty in number, who were indicted and tried, failed of conviction, and still another lot of sixty had their cases continued until next fall upon the motion of the United States district attorney, made in open court, where they were standing ready for trial.

Who were these gentlemen so indicted? Were they the red-handed ruffians depicted by the member from Michigan? I answer, no; and it is scarcely permissible with reference to the dignity of this House to characterize these charges as they deserve.

Sir, who are these gentlemen who have been and are being thus persecuted? I can fairly claim that they are the peers of any on this floor. Many of them are graduates of the first universities of Europe, and of colleges and schools of this country, representatives of all the professions, the heads and members of some of the most respected families of this nation; property-owners, they are the true custodians of peace. They have, so far as the United States has chosen to bring them to trial, been adjudged guiltless of crimes by tribunals whose loyalty and fidelity to the republican party cannot be questioned by gentlemen on the other side of this Chamber, and they are made to suffer simply because they are democrats.

This, we are told by the member from Michigan, is a trick. If, then, it be a trick, as has been well said by my colleague, Mr. GIBSON, it is "a trick" performed by a Federal jury, a Federal district attorney, and Federal judges, all of whom were republicans. A trick, sir! Look at it. Torn from loving ones at home, from weeping wives and children, from sisters and mothers trembling with grief, these gentlemen were dragged hundreds of miles away to New Orleans, compelled to pay their own expense and the expenses of their witnesses, to leave their business in ruins and their families in distress. They were not tried by their peers nor by juries of the vicinage, rights guaranteed by the old common law of England, but by strangers, by men whose political prejudices were liable to bias their judgment. Why, sir, it is further from the scenes of these alleged outrages to New Orleans than from this city to New York or Boston. And yet every one of them was acquitted! But what redress have they against this partisan tyranny, these outrages? None, sir, but the repeal of the infamous laws in the name of which they were perpetrated. United States marshals, with, in some instances, the basest characters in the State for witnesses, were transported at heavy governmental expense to New Orleans from these distant points to confront them. It is estimated that these citizens, all of one political party, and with but few exceptions white men and of high standing, have been thus caused an outlay of many thousands of dollars, and that tens of thousands have been spent by the Department of Justice in their prosecution; and the member from Michigan calls this a trick. I call it a crime; a crime, against liberty, a crime against justice, a crime against humanity, a crime against the civilization of this age.

With but few exceptions, all who were indicted under the charges made by the witnesses summoned by the majority on the Teller committee chose not to appear before that committee, but before the Federal courts, there to be confronted by their accusers and to have their causes legally and finally disposed of. It is notorious that anything could be proven by most of the witnesses who appeared at the call of the majority of that committee.

If there has been bloodshed and riot in Louisiana, I charge the responsibility upon the carpet-bag adventurers and political tramps of the republican party, who would be far more apt to be the authors of violence, discord, and crime than the men of substance in the community. This needs no argument, and the investigating committees of this House have shown, not by the testimony of others, but out of the mouths of this alien and nefarious spawn of despotism, that they are all that is wicked and base.

Who that loves liberty has forgotten the dark days of republican rule in Louisiana, when the representatives of the people were driven by bayonets from seats in the Legislature to which they had been duly elected to give place to ignorant and brutal plunderers. But a new charge, or rather a new count of the old charge against our people is now being made. It is said by mendacious presses, and re-echoed by equally mendacious persons in this Capitol, that the colored man is being driven from Louisiana by oppression and political persecution.

Nothing is easier, Mr. Chairman, than for the imagination to build on isolated cases a theory utterly false in fact. At every corner of this city able-bodied colored men stretch out the hand of mendicancy with pitiful tales of distress. There are more negroes begging their bread between the White House and the Capitol than between Arkansas and the Gulf of Mexico. Are these cries of suffering in these streets real and genuine? if so, is it not the duty of those gentlemen who are alluring the negro of Louisiana from his home—where he can make a subsistence, even if it be a poor one—to attend rather to these cases before their own eyes, at their very doors. On the other hand, if the daily testimony of these beggars, their oft-repeated tales of woe, are fictions, why should there be attached more credit to the echo of reports from distant and unknown persons, generally given on hearsay, self-contradictory, and as stupendous in fabrication as the Arabian Nights?

We had a system of labor which, with all its faults, secured certain large economic results and most of the benefits of civilization. War and philanthropy, whether real or pretended, swept it away. We did not stop to weep over the destruction of the slave system, but set to work to re-establish order in society, to rebuild its foundations by patience and industry; but the United States Government was in the hands of men who knew nothing except how to demolish.

Reconstruction was worse than the destruction and havoc of war. There came an army of licensed thieves among us, tricked out in the trappings of the law, paid from the public funds, and labeled on the statute-books as governors, judges, attorneys, supervisors, or marshals. They robbed us and demoralized our labor systematically, and then derided us because we were poor and disorganized by their own wicked devices.

We admit our poverty and our disorganization, and they will not depart from us until we are rid of republican misgovernment. Even now while we are struggling to restore our fortunes, at the very moment our people, straining their credit, are pitching their crops, a great agitation is produced in the laboring class by the scattering of lying circulars among the most ignorant to induce them to desert their homes and seek a new land of Canaan.

Fortunately for the colored man, this movement is not likely to assume large proportions. If it were so, I should shudder at the possible fate of this unfortunate class of laborers, seduced from fields of toil to which they are trained and accustomed to localities where they will seek to earn their bread at every possible disadvantage and be exposed to the keen competition of the most industrious and energetic race in the world, before whose competition they are doomed to hopeless defeat and the beggary and vice which have always followed their unsuccessful competition with white labor in northern communities.

In such a contest they must go to the wall, and none know this better than the political leaders in this city, who for personal and party ends have instigated this negro exodus.

Sir, it had been my intention to discuss to some extent the broader issues before this committee, but they have been already so widely and so deeply argued that it would be useless for me to occupy the time of the committee in doing so.

The question is resolved into a nutshell. It is this: Shall we repeal the test oath and have a law that will give us fair juries? Shall we repeal an act passed by a former Congress authorizing the use of troops and an unlimited army of deputy marshals and supervisors to be appointed by the party in power and to be used at the polls? Or, in other words, shall we have fair juries and free elections as in times past? The voice of the nation demands that we shall, and I for one propose to sit here until that demand is complied with.

Mr. Chairman, I am not here to bid for the favor of any section. I have no cheap patriotism for sale. A democrat, I have never been and never shall become the superserviceable agent of any organization; but I claim that I have as honest a purpose to secure the welfare of our common country as the most blatant of those who decry my State. It is for that that I am sent here by people who, though suffering, are not alienated from their Government. I am their Representative here to secure them material interests and to utter their protest against misrepresentation. For thirteen long years did the noble people of that State struggle under the cruel, infamous tyranny imposed upon them by sheer force; but now, thank God. Louisiana stands once more with her sister States in this Union, at last free, and so she intends to remain.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, this is the second appropriation bill, and like its predecessor, the Army bill, is saddled with amendments notoriously obnoxious to the Executive of the nation. The proper and legitimate purpose of the bill should be to make appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1880. For that purpose Congress was convened at this extra session. What is now to be done was left undone at the regular session, not that there was any disagreement as to the items or amount of appropriations, but because the dominant majority in the House then sought to coerce the Senate as it now seeks to coerce the Executive. Against this tyrannical procedure the republicans most earnestly protest.

The Executive is a co-ordinate branch of the law-making power, necessarily independent and distinct.

Under the Constitution, after a bill has passed both Houses of Congress, before it can become a law, it must be presented to the Executive. If he approve, necessarily implying the right and duty to investigate, he shall sign the bill; but if he disapprove, then he returns it with his objections. For both purposes he is to have ample time.

All this is carefully provided for in the Constitution, but now, for the first time in the history of the Government, to be utterly disregarded. The leaders of the late confederacy having come back to claim their alleged "heritage," under the flush of victory, with hands purpled and reeking from the fraternal strife—a strife by them unlamented and for which no palinode is to be sung, a strife not necessary to be renewed so long as the power to rule is enjoyed without the risk of strife—have declared in caucus against the judgment of experienced and able legislators, that if the President exercises his constitutional powers by a veto, the needed means for the support of the Government will not be supplied. This is the deliberate, fulminated decree of a political caucus. The judgment and conscientious convictions of the President are to be entirely ignored. Caucus is king!

Without money the legislative, executive, and judicial departments of Government must stop. Not a dollar can be taken out of the Treasury except as authorized by law. Any attempt to evade this by indirection would be a ground for impeachment. Most of the employés of the Government are paid under existing laws. What right has a dominant majority to refuse to pay its watchmen who guard the public buildings because, forsooth, it cannot arbitrarily control the Executive? They are suffering for the necessaries of life. At their peril they must remain on duty. Millions of property are intrusted to their care. You employed them, and you should, as honest men, see that they are paid. They are no party to your needless quarrel with the President. And if on the 30th June, 1879, you make no provision for their support, they must under existing laws be discharged; and if loss and disaster follow, you must take the blame. You cannot shield yourself from the just indignation of an outraged people behind the shallow pretense that the Executive is a mere cipher, and that a factious majority, now for the first time in eighteen years in the ascendency, is supreme. You can readily get the money if you will but pass the appropriation bill pure and simple, striking out what is embraced in the bill and in the title under the ominous words "and for other purposes"—purposes foreign to the bill and justly offensive to the Executive.

It is perhaps altogether supererogatory to justify the necessity of the veto power. Wisely it has been secured to the President by the Constitution. In support of the same I cite a few lines from Story on the Constitution:

> The reasons why the President should possess a negative, are, first, there is a natural tendency in the legislative department to intrude upon the rights and to absorb the powers of the other departments of government. A mere parchment delineation of the boundaries of each is wholly insufficient for the protection of the weaker branch, as the executive unquestionably is; and hence there arises a constitutional necessity of arming it with powers for its own defense. If the executive did not possess this qualified negative, it might gradually be stripped of all its authority and become, what it is well known the governors of some States are, a mere pageant and shadow of magistracy.
> In the next place, the power is important as an additional security against the enactment of rash, immature, and improper laws. It establishes a salutary check upon the legislative body, calculated to preserve the community against the effects of faction, precipitancy, unconstitutional legislation, and temporary excitements, as well as political hostility. * * * He (the President) will have an opportunity soberly to examine the facts and resolutions passed by the Legislature, not having partaken of the feelings or combinations which have procured their passage, and thus correct what shall sometimes be wrong from haste and inadvertence, as well as design. He is the representative of the whole nation in the aggregate; they are the representatives only of distinct parts, and sometimes of little more than sectional or local interests.

It is needless to quote any more. This power, Mr. Chairman, has been used from the foundation of the Government up to the present time, by Washington and his successors with more or less frequency, and is the only shield of defense against a despotic majority influenced by partisan passion or sectional hate. From its exercise no harm can result to the people, for a two-thirds vote of both Houses can overrule the objections and pass the bill. It follows, therefore, as a natural sequence, that any attempt to vest all the law-making power in the legislative department is a gross usurpation upon the rights of the Executive. Story on the Constitution, quoting from the Federalist, says "that the accumulation of all powers, legislative, executive, and judiciary, in the same hands, whether of one, a few, or many, and whether hereditary, self-appointed, or elective, may be justly pronounced the very definition of tyranny."

Montesquieu holds that "when the legislative and executive powers are united in the same person or in the same body of magistrates, there can be no liberty, because apprehensions may arise lest the same monarch or senate should enact tyrannical laws to execute them in a tyrannical manner.

Mr. Jefferson, in his Notes on Virginia, has expressed the same truth. Speaking of the constitution of government of his own State, he says:

> All the powers of government, legislative, executive, and judiciary, result to the legislative body. The concentrating these in the same hands is precisely the definition of a despotic government. It will be no alleviation that these powers will be exercised by a plurality of hands, and not by a single one. One hundred and seventy-three despots would surely be as oppressive as one. Let those who doubt it turn their eyes on the Republic of Venice. An elective despotism is not the government we fought for; but one which should not only be founded on free principles, but in which the powers of government should be so divided and balanced among several bodies of magistracy as that no one could transcend their legal limits without being effectually checked and restrained by the others.

The same sentiment thus forcibly expressed is embodied in the constitutions of the different States of this Union. In the constitution of Massachusetts, I find the following:

> In the government of this Commonwealth, the legislative department shall never exercise the executive and judicial powers, or either of them; the executive shall never exercise the legislative and judicial powers or either of them; the judicial shall never exercise the legislative and executive powers, or either of them; to the end it may be a government of laws and not of men.

In Kentucky there is a similar provision in the constitution adopted in 1850, and it is in the exact language of that adopted in 1799. Article 1, section 1, declares that—

> The powers of the government of the State of Kentucky shall be divided into three distinct departments, and each of them be confided to a separate body of magistracy, to wit: those which are legislative to one, those which are executive to another, and those which are judiciary to another.

So, too, in Virginia, I find the following adopted in the constitution of 1864:

> The legislative, executive, and judiciary departments shall be separate and distinct, so that neither exercise the powers properly belonging to either of the others.

In the constitution of North Carolina, adopted in 1776, it is provided that "the legislative, executive, and judicial powers of government ought to be forever separate and distinct from each other." After a trial of one hundred years this provision was re-enacted in the constitution of 1876 in the same identical words. I submit that under these several constitutions, each recognizing the independent branch of the executive, no Legislature would be justifiable in forcing an obnoxious amendment on an appropriation bill and attempting by arbitrary means to coerce an executive to approve what his judgment and conscience, when free to act, would unhesitatingly condemn. In business transactions if a bond is obtained by duress it is null and void, and so every judge in Christendom would hold even though assassination might be the penalty of his honest judgment.

Imagine, if possible, what would be the harmonious confusion if the Legislatures of the different States, disregarding the rights of each executive, should follow the example of the dominant party in Congress. Some grievance, real or fancied, might be offered as an excuse for the repeal or enactment of a law upon an appropriation bill, followed by a threat that if vetoed the needed supplies for the civil and military support of the Government would not be furnished. How long, think you, would sensible people endure such an exhibition of culpable folly and madness from State legislators, and what reason have we to believe that they will be more tolerant with the dominant party in Congress that has furnished the dangerous precedent.

Among the thirty-eight States of this Union the commonwealth of Pennsylvania is one of the few that has thus far interposed a constitutional barrier for the protection of her executive against legislative tyranny. The following clause of her new constitution was adopted in 1873 by a majority of nearly two hundred thousand votes. In article 4, section 16, it is provided that—

> The governor shall have power to disapprove of any item or items of any bill making appropriations of money embracing distinct items, and the part or parts of the bill approved shall be the law, and the item or items of appropriation disapproved shall be void unless repassed according to the rules and limitations prescribed for the passage of other bills over the executive veto.

That, Mr. Chairman, which could not be done by a State should not be done by a national legislature. We should not do in Washington what we could not if we would do in Harrisburgh. There it would be a legal, here it is a moral, wrong. That man who is only kept out of the Treasury by reason of its bolts and watchmen is a moral felon. To the majority I say this coercive course will not answer. Why not follow the suggestion of some of your able and experienced colleagues who suggested a fair and constitutional remedy?

I will now read from the remarks of my friend from New York, [Mr. COX;] and I cannot help adding how much better it would have been for us and the country had his wholesome advice been adopted by his party:

> I believe, and I urged in the democratic council preliminary to the introduction of this bill, that the repealing bills should be introduced here independently of the appropriation bill, pure and simple, as the better practice, more in consonance with the progress of political science, which demands bills should not be multifarious, should not be complicated. I knew both sides had more or less practiced wrongfully, but no two wrongs, no two set of practices, can make a right. Gentlemen will not have the opportunity just now to vote for these bills pure and simple. I wish they could have had that right, but I bowed in the councils of my party to the superior wisdom, if not experience, of others.

Why not introduce a separate bill to repeal these election laws which are such an alleged annoyance or grievance to your party? I will content myself by simply voting against the same. So I presume will my republican associates. The bill will readily pass the Senate, and then you must take your risk of a veto. The Constitution gives you a remedy. If that fails to secure the desired relief you must patiently abide the result. You would be justly stigmatized as disorganizers and revolutionists if you sought to attain your end by circumvention or violence. High authority has it, "He that entereth not by the door into the sheepfold, but climbeth up some other way, the same is a thief and a robber." Thus much on the coercive character of the measure.

A few words as to the merits of the law sought by this questionable method to be repealed. In the first place, the act of 1870 and its supplements provide for the employment of supervisors and marshals to protect the ballot-box at the election of national Representatives and Delegates in Congress. There are no bristling bayonets held up to overawe or frighten the naturally timid bulldozer, nor do the election laws come under the maranatha of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BLACKBURN,] who in his prophetic fury has promised to wipe all war measures from the statute-books. This is not, I repeat, a war measure. It is simply a civil law made to secure the purity of the ballot at national elections. It is not an outgrowth of the war but of fraud, a fraud without a parallel in the history of political warfare. These election laws were enacted to protect the ballot-box, not in New York alone, but in Baltimore, Philadelphia, and wherever fraud is attempted. The law strikes not at a party but at a fraud. It was not made for partisans but for criminals, and is a terror only to evil-doers. To indicate the powers and duties of the supervisors and marshals, I give the sections from the Revised Statutes:

SEC. 2016. The supervisors of election, so appointed, are authorized and required to attend at all times and places fixed for the registration of voters, who, being registered, would be entitled to vote for a Representative or Delegate in Congress, and to challenge any person offering to register; to attend at all times and places when the names of registered voters may be marked for challenge, and to cause such names registered as they may deem proper to be so marked; to make, when required, the lists, or either of them, provided for in section 2026, and verify the same; and upon any occasion, and at any time when in attendance upon the duty herein prescribed, to personally inspect and scrutinize such registry, and for purpose of identification to affix their signature to each page of the original list, and of each copy of any such list of registered voters, at such times, upon each day when any name may be received, entered, or registered, and in such manner as will, in their judgment, detect and expose the improper or wrongful removal therefrom, or addition thereto, of any name.

SEC. 2017. The supervisors of election are authorized and required to attend at all times and places for holding elections of Representatives or Delegates in Congress, and for counting the votes cast at such elections; to challenge any vote offered by any person whose legal qualifications the supervisors, or either of them, may doubt; to be and remain where the ballot-boxes are kept at all times after the polls are open until every vote cast at such time and place has been counted, the canvass of all votes polled wholly completed, and the proper and requisite certificates or returns made, whether the certificates or returns be required under any law of the United States, or any State, territorial, or municipal law, and to personally inspect and scrutinize, from time to time, and at all times, on the day of election, the manner in which the voting is done, and the way and method in which the poll-books, registry lists, and tallies or check-books, whether the same are required by any law of the United States, or any State, territorial, or municipal law, are kept.

SEC. 2018. To the end that each candidate for the office of Representative or Delegate in Congress may obtain the benefit of every vote for him cast, the supervisors of election are, and each of them is, required to personally scrutinize, count, and canvass each ballot in their election district or voting precinct cast, whatever may be the indorsement on the ballot, or in whatever box it may have been placed or be found; to make and forward to the officer who, in accordance with the provisions of section 2025, has been designated as the chief supervisor of the judicial district in which the city or town wherein they may serve, acts, such certificates and returns of all such ballots as such officer may direct and require, and to attach to the registry list, and any and all copies thereof, and to any certificate, statement, or return, whether the same or any part or portion thereof, be required by any law of the United States, or of any State, territorial, or municipal law, any statement touching the truth or accuracy of the registry, or the truth or fairness of the election and canvass, which the supervisors of the election, or either of them, may desire to make or attach, or which should properly and honestly be made or attached, in order that the facts may become known.

SEC. 2021. Whenever an election at which Representatives or Delegates in Congress are to be chosen is held in any city or town of twenty thousand inhabitants, or upward, the marshal for the district in which the city or town is situated shall, on the application, in writing, of at least two citizens residing in such city or town, appoint special deputy marshals, whose duty it shall be, when required thereto, to aid and assist the supervisors of election in the verification of any list of persons who may have registered or voted; to attend in each election district or voting precinct at the times and places fixed for the registration of voters, and at all times and places when and where the registration may by law be scrutinized, and the names of registered voters be marked for challenge; and also to attend, at all times for holding elections, the polls in such district or precinct.

SEC. 2022. The marshal and his general deputies, and such special deputies, shall keep the peace, and support and protect the supervisors of election in the discharge of their duties, preserve order at such places of registration and at such polls, prevent fraudulent registration and fraudulent voting thereat, or fraudulent conduct on the part of any officer of election, and immediately, either at the place of registration or polling place, or elsewhere, and either before or after registering or voting, to arrest and take into custody, with or without process, any person who commits, or attempts or offers to commit, any of the acts or offenses prohibited herein, or who commits any offense against the laws of the United States; but no person shall be arrested without process for any offense not committed in the presence of the marshal, or his general or special deputies, or either of them, or of the supervisors of election, or either of them, and, for the purposes of arrest or the preservation of the peace, the supervisors of election shall, in the absence of the marshal's deputies, or if required to assist such deputies, have the same duties and powers as deputy marshals; nor shall any person, on the day of such election, be arrested without process for any offense committed on the day of registration.

Its penal provisions do not interfere with the honest voter. The supervisor and his aid, the marshal, are simply policemen with similar powers and duties to detect fraud, and if perpetrated in their presence to arrest the offender.

It is no answer that these officers may abuse their power. So may police officers, judges, and all men in positions of honor or trust. Out of three thousand arrests in the city of New York under these election laws only one is shown to have been irregular. But the abuse of power is no argument against its use. Errors of detail in the law, if found to exist, should be corrected, and bad men if in office must be removed. He would be deemed a lunatic who, to rid himself of rats, would burn down his barn. The gist of the complaint of the majority in this House is that the guilty party is arrested. "Content yourself," say they, "with detecting the fraud, and try and punish afterward." To this we interpose an emphatic negative. We seek to prevent the perpetration of the fraud. The majority would lock the stable after the horse is stolen.

This law was enacted at the suggestion of a committee of Congress appointed to investigate the election frauds in the city of New York in November, 1868. I make the following extract from the report of the committee, presented February 23, 1869:

These frauds—

Say the committee—

were the result of a systematic plan of gigantic proportions, stealthily prearranged and boldly executed, not merely by bands of degraded desperadoes but with the direct sanction, approval, or aid of many prominent officials and citizens of New York, with the shrewdly concealed connivance of others, and almost without an effort to discourage or prevent them by any of those in whose interest and political party associations they were successfully executed, who could not fail to have cognizance of them, and whose duty it was to expose, defeat, and punish them. They were aided by an immense, corrupt, and corrupting official patronage and power, which not only encouraged but shielded and protected the guilty principals and their aiders and abettors.

These frauds are so varied in character that they comprehend every known crime against the elective franchise. They corrupted the administration of justice, degraded the judiciary, defeated the execution of the laws, subverted for the time being in New York State the essential principles of popular government, robbed the people of that great State of their rightful choice of electors of President and Vice-President, of a governor, and other officers; disgraced the most populous city of the Union; encouraged the enemies of republican government here and everywhere to deride our institutions as a failure, and endangered the peace of the Republic by an attempt to defeat the will of the people in the choice of their rulers.

The events of the past year in New York and the evidence taken by the committee furnish the proof of all these allegations. Among the most prominent of the frauds committed in the interest of the democratic party in the city and State of New York in connection with the election in November, 1868, are these:

1. Many thousands of aliens fraudulently procured or were furnished with certificates of naturalization illegally or fraudulently issued, by means of which they were enabled to register as voters and voted in violation of law.

2. Many hundreds of certificates of naturalization were granted in the names of fictitious persons, to be used by native-born and naturalized citizens and aliens in falsely registering as voters, and to enable them to vote many times at the election.

3. Many hundreds of persons voted in New York City from two to forty times or more, each under assumed or fictitious names, fraudulently registered for the purpose.

4. Extensive frauds were committed in canvassing tickets, and names of voters were entered on the poll lists, and democratic tickets counted as if voters representing them voted, when no such persons voted at all.

5. To accomplish these frauds gross neglect of duty and disregard of law, so great as to evince a criminal purpose, prevailed in some of the courts, while officers and democratic partisans of almost every grade, either by official influence or otherwise, aided, sanctioned, or knew of and failed to prevent them. The same influences shielded the perpetrators in nearly all cases from detection or arrest, and when arrested they have, through the agency of judicial officers and others charged with the duty of prosecution, escaped all punishment.

6. Through these agencies the democratic electors of President and Vice-President and the democratic candidate for governor of the State of New York were fraudulently elected.

7. And the investigations of the committee show that existing State laws and the mode of enforcing them are wholly inadequate to prevent these frauds, but that Congress has the power to enact laws which, if faithfully executed, will to some extent furnish remedies hereafter.

In another part of this report it also appears that over 50,000 fraudulent votes were cast at this election in the city and State of New York. Manifestly, Mr. Chairman, it is not necessary to attempt to strengthen what this report conclusively establishes, that great frauds were perpetrated in New York in 1868, and in consequence of the same the laws now sought to be repealed were enacted. The same necessity which existed then for the enactment of the laws pleads strongly for their continuance. New York is now, as it was then, a notoriously corrupt city. In it neither the living nor the dead are safe. Respectable women are robbed in broad daylight in public thoroughfares where police officers almost jostle each other, while in the darkness of night sepultures are despoiled of their dead for the sake of plunder by ghouls and human hyenas. Fraud has tainted the ermine and piled a mountain of debt upon innocent tax-payers. Some great partisan thieves, it is true, thanks to the vigilance of republican editors, have been exposed and punished or driven into exile, their names linked with infamy and used only as synonyms for crime; but the "slums" in the "Babel," as Greeley justly stigmatized them in his famous letter, still bear absolute rule, and unless checked by stringent laws are still ready to assume any guise or play any protean part for the benefit of the corrupt party that pays them best.

Congress has clearly jurisdiction over the subject-matter. It is not proposed to interfere with State or municipal elections. These, whether conducted honestly or not, are under the control of the municipality or State. But the election of national Representatives concerns the nation, and the right to hold an election involves as an incident the further right to have it fairly and honestly conducted. Without such a power the election would be an idle farce. Whenever a right is given under the Constitution the necessary means may be employed to enforce the same by adequate laws.

The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but Congress is authorized "to alter such regulations."

Madison, in 3 Elliott's Debates, 347, in the Virginia convention, said some States might regulate the elections on the principle of equality and others might regulate them otherwise. Should the people of any State by any means be deprived of the right of suffrage, it was judged proper it should be remedied by the General Government.

Mr. Webster, in regard to the right of suffrage, 6 Webster's Works, 224, lays down two great principles of the American system: first, the right of suffrage shall be guarded, protected, and secured against force and fraud; second, its exercise shall be prescribed by previous law. Congressmen, Mr. Chairman, and Delegates are national legislators. Although from particular States and districts, they are not to legislate solely for such States or districts, but for the United States as a nation. They belong, in a word, to the nation. The right, therefore, must vest in Congress to see that its members are legally elected; and the Constitution expressly provides that each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members. For this purpose its committee sits to investigate election frauds, and again and again ousts members for the same. Cannot the body that investigates fraud enact laws to prevent its perpetration? If not, then your National Government, so far as relates to national elections, is an undisguised failure. But this cannot be admitted. The right to prevent fraud at national elections must exist in Congress. States might, either from accident or design, fail to secure an honest ballot. Party spirit or sectional hate might find it to their interest to wink at tissue ballots or fraudulent naturalization papers. "A right," says Mr. Madison in the Federalist, No. 43, "implies a remedy; and where else could the remedy be deposited than where it is deposited by the Constitution?" "meaning," says Story, as the context shows, "in the Government of the United States."

In Prigg vs. Pennsylvania, 16 Peters, 636, the Supreme Court say:

> The National Government, in the absence of all positive provision to the contrary, is bound, through its proper departments, legislative, judicial, or executive, to carry into effect all the rights and duties imposed upon it by the Constitution.

The Prigg case just quoted was a fugitive-slave case from York, Pennsylvania. The owner alleged he had a claim upon the fugitive, and the Supreme Court of the United States, Story delivering the opinion, held that wherever an end recognized by the Constitution was to be reached, proper means must be employed to secure the same. Under the Constitution the means to secure the return of the fugitive are not indicated. He was to be delivered upon claim of the owner. But by whom? How were the facts to be ascertained and the rights of master and slave determined? Who was to pay the expenses? On these and other kindred questions the Constitution was silent. But the South insisted that the end must be reached, and the fugitive-slave law was enacted to accomplish that purpose. Under the most stringent penalties all citizens were bound to aid in the recapture of the hunted fugitive, and none, without risk of fine and imprisonment, could offer him shelter or give him a crust of bread. At what expense to the nation and sacrifice of human feelings this odious law was executed is a matter of familiar history. Suffice it to say, this was in the interest of the South. But happily the occasion for this statute no longer exists. But under the same Constitution and this decision which secured the return of the slave we ask for the enactment of a national election law to insure a fair election. And in answer to the argument that there is no expressed delegated authority contained in the Constitution I quote the following from the above decision:

> But it has been argued that the act of Congress is unconstitutional because it does not fall within the scope of any of the enumerated powers of legislation confided to that body; and therefore it is void. Stripped of its artificial and technical structure, the argument comes to this, that although rights are exclusively secured by or duties are exclusively imposed upon the National Government, yet, unless the power to enforce these rights or to execute these duties can be found among the express powers of legislation enumerated in the Constitution, they remain without any means of giving them effect by any act of Congress; and they must operate solely proprio vigore, however defective may be their operation; nay, even although in a practical sense they may become a nullity from the want of a proper remedy to enforce them or to provide against their violation.
> If this be the true interpretation of the Constitution, it must in a great measure fail to attain many of its avowed and positive objects as a security of rights and a recognition of duties. Such a limited construction of the Constitution has never yet been adopted as correct either in theory or practice. No one has ever supposed that Congress could constitutionally by its legislation exercise powers or enact laws beyond the powers delegated to it by the Constitution; but it has on various occasions exercised powers which were necessary and proper as means to carry into effect rights expressly given and duties expressly enjoined thereby. The end being required, it has been deemed a just and necessary implication that the means to accomplish it are given also; or, in other words, that the power flows as a necessary means to accomplish the end.

Exercising the utmost charity for differences of opinion growing out of different localities, I cannot conceive how lawyers can reach the conclusion that under the decisions of the Supreme Court Congress had the right to legislate for the return of the slave, but cannot to secure an honest national election. One of Bulwer's heroes had a very elastic conscience; to-day it would scarcely stretch over a mole-hill; yesterday it easily covered a mountain. Now, as in other days, men who have swallowed a camel will strain at a gnat. Above and beyond the Constitution a nation, like an individual, has the right of self-defense, and a nation can be destroyed as effectually by fraud as by violence. But I will not reopen what ought to be settled, the right of self-defense. By a certain wing of the now dominant party it was once held that this right did not apply to a nation. On that heresy the republicans took issue, and the gage of battle then, as now, so arrogantly flung down was taken up and the arbitrament of the sword was in harmony with right and the mandate of law.

I have, Mr. Chairman, finished my argument on the law and the merits of the bill. A few words in reply to the threat of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BLACKBURN.]

Permit me to premise just here that with the eloquent gentleman I have no quarrel. On the contrary, his frankness deserves to be commended. It is eminently proper that the men who act as the exponents of party should fully proclaim their views. These have now been authoritatively announced. "For the first time," says the distinguished gentleman, manifestly speaking for his party, "in eighteen years the democracy are back in power in both branches of this Legislature, and she proposes to signalize her return to power." How and in what way, I ask? Let his speech in the RECORD before me answer. "We," says the gentleman, "do not intend to stop until we have stricken the last vestige of your war measures from the statute-book, which," according to the latest revised edition, "like these, were born of the passions incident to civil strife, and looked to the abridgment of the liberty of the citizen."

But he and his wing of the party have "come back to rule." Like vagabond prodigals who needlessly, ay, criminally, left the paternal roof, and disgusted with the husks upon which they have since been feeding have at length returned, and now as their first act seek to signalize that return by defiantly breaking down the barriers reared to save a common heritage from destruction. No repentance has come from the eighteen years of exile, and probationary discipline has only served to intensify a latent malignancy now fully developed in the blatant threat.

In view of a historic example, significantly suggestive, I say to the gentleman and his sectional party, who threaten us with their destructive measures—

> Be advised; heat not a > Furnace for your foe so hot that
> It doth singe yourselves.

After an absence of eighteen years—how carefully the time has been computed—they "have come back to rule." Where then, may I ask the gentleman, were you engaged during the first four years of the eighteen which are the burden of your jeremiad? I regret that the gentleman is not in the House to answer the interrogatory. I must therefore read what appears in the Congressional Directory: "Entered" (so runs the record) "the confederate army in 1861 and served throughout the war." I do not quote the record to hold the gentleman up to special odium in that service, not forced upon him by his State, and obviously a labor of love, but to show that if he was not in the councils of the nation to resist the enactment of partisan legislation it was not the fault of the republican party during the four years of our fraternal strife. But they "have come back to rule." They seem to think their sole mission is to rule, and that they were "born ready booted and spurred to ride rough-shod over the people." They aimed to rule at Charleston in 1860, and having failed to coerce their associates undertook to ruin the party. The result is well known. The defeat of their nominee, John C. Breckinridge, was a foregone conclusion, to which they directly contributed. Having ruined the party which they could not rule, they attempted to destroy the nation which they could not govern. Let me here fortify this position by a sentence from The American Conflict. On page 362, volume 1, Mr. Greeley says:

> The people of the United States had in an unexceptionably legal and constitutional manner chosen for their President an eminently conservative, cautious, moderate citizen of blameless life and unambitious spirit, born in slave-holding Kentucky, but now a resident of free Illinois, who held with Jefferson and nearly all our revolutionary sages and patriots that human slavery is an evil which ought not to be diffused and strengthened in this nineteenth century of Christian light and love.
> Hereupon the ruling oligarchy in certain States, who had done nothing to prevent, but much indirectly, but purposely, to secure this result, resolved to rend the Republic into fragments, tearing their own fragments away from the residue.

The same oligarchy, Mr. Chairman, have come back a united South, and mean to rule.

Ay, that party that has so grossly mismanaged its state affairs comes back to rule the nation. Look at the South; there is scarcely a single one of the late rebellious States that does not contemplate repudiation. Their debts are to be compromised, adjusted, or scaled—terms intended to molify and disguise the unmitigable meanness of repudiation. We protest against this mode of regulating national affairs. We insist that the national debt shall be paid, not compromised, adjusted, or scaled. Our integrity is our tower of strength, which they upon the adverse faction want. It was this that elevated us in the estimation of the world.

"Not your brilliant victories on the field," wrote a friend to me from the palace of King George, of Athens, "but the courage to tax yourselves to pay your national debt astonished the crowned heads of Europe, and raised you to the very pinnacle of moral grandeur." This was a just tribute to our integrity, and a faint echo of that higher law, "righteousness exalteth a nation."

Mr. OSMER. Mr. Chairman, there are some things which to an attentive observer of this protracted discussion of the committee seem to be conceded by both sides of this Chamber.

First. That the manner of the proposed legislation now resorted to, however supported by precedent, is objectionable in that it may be, and often is, resorted to by a majority to compel the assent of the minority to measures which could not be passed upon their merits rather than to defeat some wholesome and necessary law.

Second. That Congress has the right under the Constitution to pass laws to regulate the manner and secure the integrity of elections of members of this body.

Third. That the majority now in Congress have the power and the constitutional right to repeal any law passed by it.

I am not unmindful of the fact that from the beginning of this protracted, interesting, and learned discussion some members of the democratic party upon this floor have denied the right of the Government to interfere in any manner with the election in the States of members of Congress, insisting that the States alone have jurisdiction in the premises. And this in the face of the fact that the bill under consideration, reported by a democratic caucus and which we are asked to pass, concedes the right and authority of the Government to supervise these elections.

Whether supervisors shorn of power are permitted or required by law to be present as idle and impotent spectators merely, or whether they shall be present armed with power and authority to preserve the purity and integrity of elections, is of no consequence. The constitutionality of the law in question cannot be determined by reference to the scope of the supervisor's duty. The reiteration by the opposition of the assertion that the laws the repeal of which is now and in this manner demanded are not only inimical to the true interest of the people, but that they are unconstitutional, makes it necessary and proper to recur to that instrument. The clause principally involved is section 4, article 1 of the Constitution, which is as follows:

The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators.

This provision is not chargeable with being ambiguous, and it would seem to have been well understood by statesmen at the time of its adoption. In an article upon it by Mr. Hamilton, (I read from the Federalist, No. 59,) he says:

Its propriety rests upon the evidence of this plain proposition that every government ought to contain in itself the means of its own preservation.

And again:

They [the framers of the Constitution] have submitted the regulation of elections for the Federal Government, in the first instance, to the local administrations; which in ordinary cases, and when no improper views prevail, may be both more convenient and more satisfactory; but they have reserved to the national authority a right to interpose, whenever extraordinary circumstances might render that interposition necessary to its safety. Nothing can be more evident than that an exclusive power of regulating elections for the National Government, in the hands of the State Legislatures, would leave the existence of the Union entirely at their mercy. They could at any moment annihilate it by neglecting to provide for the choice of persons to administer its affairs. It is to little purpose to say that a neglect or omission of this kind would not be likely to take place. The constitutional possibility of the thing, without an equivalent for the risk, is an unanswerable objection. Nor has any satisfactory reason been yet assigned for incurring that risk. The extravagant surmises of a distempered jealousy can never be dignified with that character. If we are in a humor to presume the abuses of power, it is as fair to presume them on the part of the State governments as on the part of the General Government. And as it is more consonant to the rules of a just theory to intrust the Union with the care of its own existence than to transfer that care to any other hands if abuses of power are to be hazarded on the one side or on the other, it is more rational to hazard them where the power would naturally be placed than where it would unnaturally be placed.

This Government constituted by the fathers ordained this a nation, provided for a Congress whose Representatives on this floor should be chosen by the people, whose rights and duties are derived not from the Legislatures of the respective States or in any manner from the laws or constitutions of States, but rather under the Constitution from the whole great people who, as has been said by a gentleman on the other side, hold in their sovereign hands the destiny of the nation. And yet the argument is made that we are in some form officers of our respective States; that we derive our powers from them; that in some way or other we owe some sort of primary duty or allegiance to our respective States in regard to all matters, and that in the event that the passion, prejudice, or interest of the State should be in conflict with the manifest interest of the whole people we should yield to the former and ignore our obligations under the Constitution. I had thought that such theories had been settled by the court of last resort in which a forensic display was made that shook the continent. The position is fallacious and without foundation either in the Constitution or in the opinions of its best commentators. Allow me to read briefly from Webster. Upon an occasion not much unlike this he said:

Who, then, shall construe this grant of the people? Who shall interpret their will, where it may be supposed they have left it doubtful? With whom do they repose this ultimate right of deciding on the powers of the Government? Sir, they have settled this in the fullest manner. They have left it with the Government itself, in its appropriate branches. Sir, the very chief end, the main design for which the whole Constitution was framed and adopted, was to establish a government that should not be obliged to act through State agency or depend on State opinion and State discretion. The people had had quite enough of that kind of government under the confederacy. Under that system the legal action—the application of law to individuals—belonged exclusively to the States. Congress could only recommend; their acts were not of binding force till the States had adopted and sanctioned them. Are we in that condition still? Are we yet at the mercy of State discretion and State construction? Sir, if we are, then vain will be our attempt to maintain the Constitution under which we sit.

Again, and on the same occasion, he said:

I hold it to be a popular government erected by the people; those who administer it responsible to the people; and itself capable of being amended and modified just as the people choose it should be. It is popular, just as truly emanating from the people as the State governments. It is created for one purpose, the State governments for another.

But why cite authorities when the right and authority claimed declaimed against form the woof and web of the legislation proposed. Stripped of power, reduced to mere myths, the supervisors of elections are retained; they may testify to the frauds they witnessed if they shall have the courage, but are rendered powerless to prevent it. A mummy stationed there would answer as well, but you provide for their presence and thereby concede the right.

But, sir, the questions raised by your party do not rest here. It were well for the country if they did. If, as you say, the safeguards thrown around the ballot-box by the republican party are inefficient, why not amend them and make them more efficient? If they are inimical to the interests of your party, repeal them. Why divide them? Why tack a part of the repealing acts upon one and a part upon the other of the appropriation bills? You thereby say to all the people who differ with you that unless we accede to your demands the whole machinery of the Government shall cease. They might all have been tacked upon this bill, thereby providing for the pay and sustenance of our little Army of not more than twenty-five thousand men, which to-day stands guard on the western frontier between civilization and the savages, keeping the peace across the continent. Then you would have struck your blow at the civil service alone. But you strike at both the military and the civil service of the Government, and tell us it is not revolutionary! Why in the name of all that is reasonable and fair, having the power in both Houses to repeal these laws, do you not provide for the continued existence of the Government in all its branches and pass your repealing statutes as separate measures? Send your bills to the Executive, and let them abide their fate; if approved, you should be satisfied; if not, appeal to the people who shall judge between us. This you refuse to do and say you are not revolutionary! Upon the threshold of this Hall you stood on the last days of the past Congress and the first day of this, declaiming to us and to the country that unless we ignored our convictions and consented to the withdrawal of every protection by the Government to its citizens in the exercise of their highest civil right and privilege you would withhold from the officer, servant, employés, and pensioners the money which the people have furnished, and to pay which is a sacred duty.

Your demands are made a condition-precedent to the fulfillment of the highest governmental obligation. The doors of the courts shall be closed; civil rights jeopardized; justice delayed; Army disbanded; the national obligations go to protest; and you say it is not revolutionary! I was surprised, sir, to hear the gentleman who has just taken his seat pronounce a eulogy upon the civilization in this country of eighteen years ago. Need I remind him that eighteen years ago, here under the shadow of this Capitol, men and women were sold in the open market as merchandise? He should have said the barbarism of eighteen years ago. We have not brought these questions here. They were thrust upon us by you. The republican party stands to-day where she has always stood—for the right, for truth, for justice, for humanity, and points you to the emancipated and enfranchised millions whom she crowned as freemen. It was alleged that in the North and South there has been a denial of the right to vote; that frauds have been committed and the voice of the people disregarded and set at naught; that this, if permitted, would make the franchise a delusion and imperil the Republic. To secure every qualified voter in his right and to provide that his ballot should be counted, these laws were passed. Is it true that the whole history of election frauds in the South and in the North is false? That the volumes of testimony that to-day encumber the shelves of your library are untrue? I shall refer to but one of the reports on this subject, that of the Teller committee, touching these elections in Louisiana in 1878. I read briefly from the report:

In these seven parishes the evidence is that there were murdered for political purposes, during the campaign of 1878, twenty-three persons. Beside these there were fully as many others murdered whose names the committee were unable to ascertain, whose corpses were seen by witnesses who testified before the committee hanging on trees or lying dead in the streets or fields. Dozens more were wounded from shots fired at them with murderous intent, some of whom were present as witnesses before the committee exhibiting their scars.

Such is the evidence, such the means resorted to to capture the Capitol. Coming from such fields of conquest you regale our ears with platitudes about the freedom of the elections and the rights of the sovereign people. You say that the report is untrue and rest your denial upon the assertion that persons were arrested and indicted for these alleged crimes, and upon trial were acquitted. Need I say to any gentleman, to any lawyer, that that proves nothing more than that the persons arrested were not guilty or that the prosecution failed in obtaining and producing evidence sufficient to convict, or possibly, as it sometimes happens, that there are juries in certain sections unwilling to convict for certain offenses; that prejudice, which is corruption, often defeats the ends of justice? The guilty parties may not have been arrested, nor is it material. No one has denied the terrible facts that for "political purpose" twenty men were murdered; that others were hanged upon the trees; that the dead bodies were found by the way-side and in the fields. These are the damnable methods that signalized your journey here to possess your heritage. We complain of it not because it affects us so much as it violates the rights of the people. If permitted, the poor and the weak will vote by sufferance of the strong. Law-breakers, murderers, and assassins will rule the land.

The President is bound by his oath to take care that the laws be faithfully executed—and we have some concern in knowing that the people are secure in the enjoyment of every constitutional right and privilege. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BLACKBURN,] in his impassioned oration, said that "we are the ones to make the issue," and that he tendered it; that the gage of battle is delivered; that you do not intend to stop until you have stricken the last vestige of our war measures from the statute-books, which, like these, were born of the passions incident to civil strife, and looked alone to the abridgment of the liberty of the citizen. After this manly declaration and bold threat can you complain that you have opened the pages of the history of that legacy of carnage and desolation which you left us eighteen years ago. But for your return to power—but for your proclaimed determination to again rule or ruin the Republic—this session would not have been. The country would have been at rest—its people pursuing their peaceful avocations, willing to forget the sad recollections of the past, and eager to welcome the dawn of returning prosperity and a better civilization. To-day, as heretofore, you adhere to your doctrine of the rights of States. Your teachings culminated in a war of four years. Your teachings reft the forum in 1861 and into the yawning gulf went down the American youth by hundreds of thousands. For evidences of valor and subjects for poetic fancy let the student hereafter read the history of that heroic struggle which resulted in settling for all time that this is a nation.

Sir, it is said here that unless we consent to the repeal of these laws the supplies shall be withheld. We cannot and will not yield. The questions are vital. The Army will not starve nor will the Government perish. Behind us stand the people who love their country, who hear and know what is done here; and though shattered and torn so recently by your treason, they will come from around the graves of heroes whose memories are green—from the valleys and the mountains; from fruitful fields and abundant mines—to the aid of the nation. They have decreed that the government of the people, by the people, and for the people shall not perish unmasked. The question is simply this: shall we have honest and fair elections for Representatives and presidential electors, or shall fraud and murder hold high carnival on the day of election so as to make it possible for the democrats to elect a President in 1880? Do you need the electoral vote of New York, and do you require freedom to repeat your gigantic frauds there? Will it be necessary again to overcome the majority of thirty thousand which shall roll down from Erie to the Hudson, and that Tammany Hall shall make the count?

I do not know what gentlemen think, but it would seem to be vastly more important that each and all—the humblest with the greatest—should be secure in the free right to vote, and that such vote should be counted than that either party should triumph. When the people triumph the Republic is secure. But why add words to this protracted discussion. We all know that the argument was closed when the bill was reported to the committee. The decree of the caucus was then written. No argument can change or amend. It awaits but its formal entry, when the curtain will drop on your first act signalizing your return to power.

Mr. ELAM. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. BURROWS,] in his speech delivered in the House on Friday, the 18th instant, used this language:

> Mr. Chairman, there is no occasion for the warmth exhibited by the distinguished gentleman, for I only read the report of a committee showing that intimidation and murder had been permitted in Louisiana during the last election. I made no accusation against the courts or any officers of the courts. I simply declared what the report of the committee showed, that in Louisiana there had not been a fair and free election. It is a notorious fact that in many of the districts of Louisiana there was not a free or peaceable election. I have in mind one district now in particular, in which Caddo Parish is located, a district extending thirty-five or forty miles. There the ballot-box was placed at the northern extremity of that parish, and men were compelled to make a journey of twenty miles and back again in order to cast their votes. It is a notorious fact that three hundred black men made that march and deposited their ballots; and it is equally notorious that after they had deposited their ballots an armed band of ruffians seized that ballot-box, broke it to pieces, and destroyed the ballots. And no man can deny it, for it is supported by abundant evidence. It is also admitted, and cannot be denied, that in another parish that usually casts a heavy republican vote, not one solitary republican vote was polled, and why? Because you drove the leaders of the republican party from that county, serving upon them notice to leave, and they are in exile to-day.

Now, I desire to repeat what I said in the five minutes in which I was allowed to reply to the charges contained in the above extract, that the Natchitoches prisoners were charged with having undertaken to inaugurate a conspiracy to drive Hornsby, Blount, and others out of the parish so as to prevent them from voting for my opponent.

These parties all went to the city of New Orleans and were present at the trial before the circuit court of the United States. These witnesses were cognizant of all the facts that transpired on the day they were ordered to leave Natchitoches and testified to them very fully. I have never heard it said or intimated before that there was any lack of witnesses to prove what transpired on that occasion.

The witnesses that it was intimated were taken off of the steamer Danube were so taken off, if at all, at a point on the river more than a hundred miles above the parish of Natchitoches, as I am informed and believe. They were not going to New Orleans to be examined as witnesses against the Natchitoches prisoners, but for the purpose of being used, I suppose, as witnesses against parties in Caddo Parish. The Caddo cases have not been tried but deferred until next fall.

The Natchitoches prisoners were tried in a United States court, presided over by a republican circuit and district judge, by a jury largely composed of republicans; and the iron-clad oath, prescribed by section 821 of the Revised Statutes, was administered to as many jurors as the district attorney required.

Now I think it is fair to assume that these parties so tried were acquitted, not for the want of evidence on the part of the prosecution, but because the evidence submitted was not believed, or was rebutted, and therefore the verdict of the jury in the case is entitled to much greater weight, they having been enabled to form a more correct estimate of the testimony of the prosecution against those prisoners than that read by the gentleman from the report of a partisan committee.

Now, as to what occurred in the parish of Caddo, I have this to say: At a precinct on Red River, at a poll, I think, called Caledonia, late in the evening after the voting had about closed, some one informed the deputy sheriff of the parish, who was conducting the election, that there were thirty or forty guns stacked in a school-house very near where the election was being held; that they had been put there the night before by the negroes, and that there was a party of negroes in that building then. He asked two or three of the bystanders to go with him and examine into the matter. When within a short distance of the door they were fired on by the armed crowd of negroes inside and two or three men shot down. A fight occurred, and there were five or six of the negroes killed and the balance driven off.

As to the statement contained in the extract that I have read from, that a ballot-box containing two or three hundred ballots was taken from the officers in charge by some armed ruffians and destroyed, I have heard this charge before, but I have never heard that it was known who these parties were. The impression is that they did not live in the parish or in the State. Those votes were illegally put into that box. The proper authorities had fixed upon another place near by as the proper polling place. The democrats went there and voted. The republicans, without any authority at all, took a ballot-box and went to another house in the neighborhood. They had no judges, no supervisors under the State law appointed by any authority. That is my information on that point.

I have evidence in my possession, furnished by white and colored republicans, that the reason their party did not carry the parish of Caddo was that the republican managers had caused the names of all their candidates to be printed on one ticket, with a view of depositing them in one ballot-box. That was the method provided by law while the republican party was in power in Louisiana. They overlooked the fact that after the democratic party came into power the Legislature repealed that statute and provided that the names of the State officers should be put upon one ticket—members of both houses of the Legislature, sheriff, clerk, and recorder; but candidates for justices of the peace, police jurors, and other ward officers, and for mayor and town offices, such as trustees and aldermen, should be voted for on separate tickets and placed in separate ballot-boxes. This change in the law it is supposed was overlooked by the republicans, and they had printed the names of their candidates so closely together and in such small type that they did not have time to alter them. This, no doubt, was an oversight on the part of the republican managers in the parish.

Now, in relation to the balance of the election in my district, and to explain why my majority was so much larger at the election in November, 1878, than it was in 1876, I have this to say: In Bossier, Red River, and Webster Parishes, two of them being republican and the other being very nearly divided, the republicans put my name on their ticket. I was not in any one of those parishes during the canvass of that year, and do not remember to have seen any one from either of them. I did not know this fact until after the election. In Vernon, Natchitoches, Sabine, and De Soto Parishes there was no republican ticket in the field for any office, and no republican votes were cast, nor do I believe there was any organization or any republican candidates in Bienville or Winn. I made no canvass on the east side of the river, in consequence of injuries that I received from the upsetting of a stage coach, and therefore I cannot speak positively as to the fact whether there was any ticket in the field in Winn and Bienville or not. Then the only parishes in which there was any contest between my opponent and myself worth speaking of was in Grant and Rapides.

During the course of this debate it has been broadly intimated here that all the political measures under consideration that have been attached to the revenue bill have been brought in here upon the demand of the South. This has been distinctly stated by a portion of the republican press. Now, I think it is due to the truth of history that this statement should be corrected.

All that the southern members asked for in the beginning, as I understand it, and insisted upon, was the repeal of the test-oath provision and a change in the mode of drawing juries in the United States courts to prevent them from being partisan. During the holidays I called upon a good many of my party friends in Congress who remained in the city, and brought this matter to their attention. While doing this I met Mr. HERBERT, of Alabama, who, when I mentioned to him my views, informed me that he had the same object in view, and these propositions were eventually agreed to and put in proper shape and form to be offered on the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill. Afterward Mr. Southard, of Ohio, submitted that provision of the bill repealing and changing the law in relation to supervisors of election and deputy marshals. Northern and western democrats, doubtless because it affected the elections in their States, supported it and insisted that it should be incorporated with the other provisions relative to the test oath and the judiciary.

I referred to this matter for the purpose of contradicting the statements which have been made with a view of crediting the South with the demand for this legislation. It comes from no one section—it comes from the whole country; it is the demand for a return to constitutional government made by the majority of the people of the whole country through their democratic Representatives on this floor. When the bill providing for the appropriation for the Army was under consideration a few weeks since, various objections were made by the republican members to the legislation attached to that bill, to one of which, as it is kindred to that made to the present proposed legislation, I will briefly refer, as well as to the unanswerable argument advanced by the democratic members in reply thereto.

Although the position stultified the record of their party, although it embodied the declaration that the means by which a law could be adopted were not suitable to be employed for its repeal, the leader of that party on this floor on that occasion, who had denounced as "unconstitutional and revolutionary" the efforts of a minority to prevent the adoption of that legislation, changed his position and charged with revolution a majority which proposed to repeal an unconstitutional law in the same manner in which it had been adopted, and that in pursuance of an unbroken line of precedents which had received the indorsement and sanction of the ablest statesmen of the present and the past.

As to the constitutionality of that law, as to the benefits to result from its repeal, as to the necessity for its repeal, as the issues involved in its consideration are substantially the same as those involved in the consideration of the pending bill, I shall address myself directly to them here.

It would be more correct for me to use the word issue instead of issues, for I regard every detail of the proposed legislation as springing directly from an attempt on the part of the Federal Government to usurp the power of the States. It has been more than an attempt, for it has been successful in revolutionizing our form of government.

I charge the republican party with revolution, and that of the most dangerous character, because its work has been done under the mask of secrecy and in the name of patriotism.

In an investigation before the Legislature of North Carolina, Richard C. Badger testified as follows:

Question. What are your present party affiliations?
Answer. Republican of the straitest sect. My theory is a government of the strongest kind—a centralized government.

I quote this as illustrative of the position of the republican party. The definition is concise and true, and its accuracy is attested by the very legislation we are seeking to repeal.

In the same connection I desire to quote briefly from the able speech made in the course of the discussion of the bill for the enforcement of the fourteenth amendment, in the United States Senate, by Mr. Vickers, with the view of showing that the members of the democratic party to-day, in seeking the repeal of these laws, hold to the same opinion as that entertained by them when they opposed the passage of these laws. Mr. Vickers said:

There may be a civil revolution as well as one by physical force; and is there any difference in principle or in character whether a government be subverted by force or by usurpation and unconstitutional measures?

We charged them then with revolution, and the proof that the charge was true is found in the existence of these laws upon our statute-books to-day. We charge them now with revolution, and the proof that the charge is true is found in the fact that they are here to-day opposing the repeal of unconstitutional laws. I propose, then, Mr. Chairman, to lay down the primary propositions, that the laws we propose to repeal are unconstitutional and revolutionary in their character; that they are subversive of our form of government and necessarily fatal to its perpetuity; and that the preservation of our form of government and the preservation of our personal rights and liberties demand their repeal.

The first section numerically of the Revised Statutes proposed to be amended is section 800. The effect of this amendment is simply to place the State of Pennsylvania on the same footing with her sister States as regards the selection of jurors in United States courts; is simply to make harmonious and uniform that system of selecting juries which has from the beginning been found to be the best and fairest. With the causes which led to the adoption of a different method in that State, which may have made it advisable, or with the changes which to-day make it no longer necessary for Pennsylvania to form the sole exception in this respect to the uniformity of the Federal jury system, I am not informed, but it was suggested by gentlemen from that State more familiar with the workings of the system there than I, and therefore far better able to present this question to the House.

THE TEST OATH.

In common with all of the Representatives from the Southern States I am prepared, Mr. Chairman, to speak fully as to the necessity which exists for the repeal of sections 820 and 821 of the Revised Statutes, which provide for the administering of the test oath to jurors in the Federal courts. The law requiring this oath belongs to that class of legislation which we term onerous. It belongs to that class which, existing in the early days of England, has been held in abhorrence as one of the instruments employed in the work of oppression, as one of the arms of tyranny—in the days of Catholic supremacy employed as a means to secure the conviction and execution of heretics; in the days of the Reformation as a means to secure the conviction and execution of Catholics! We have notorious examples of the use of this weapon whenever the law was to be prostituted and made the obedient servant of tyranny. We have, too, the record which shows how the people have condemned this policy and sooner or later shattered the power which evolved it. As an abstract principle, then, I assert without fear of contradiction that such a law is a disgrace to any government that pretends to give fair trials in criminal prosecutions to its people.

How did it come upon our statute-book? We speak of war legislation, not as legislation referring to the conduct of the war, but as legislation which was characterized by the looseness which prevailed in Congress during the times when excitement ran high, when the jesuitical doctrine that the end justifies the means controlled the deliberations of our Federal councils, when the Constitution was forgotten and the rights of the people under it ignored; and it is such legislation as I have described that the democratic party terms war legislation. This provision requiring the test oath forms a part of it. When it was reported from the Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate, in 1862, an unfavorable report accompanied it, and one of the first Senators in the republican party, Mr. Hale, of New Hampshire, was the first to condemn the measure. He said:

The objection I have to it is this: I hope to see, and at no very distant day, some of these States restored to the Union, and the machinery of the Union going on. If this bill is passed it will be utterly impossible to organize a jury in any of these States, provided this is a law.

* * * * * * *

Some of the best Union men we have have done it (aided the rebellion) under coercion; the authority of the State having been usurped by the seceded Legislature, they have every one of them indirectly given assistance; and if this bill passes in this form you cannot organize a jury in one of those States for twenty years to come.

Mr. Grimes said:

You can repeal the law when the sentiment of loyalty increases so as to justify it.

And that is what we propose to do now. And when the proposition was submitted to that Congress to limit the duration of the statute, Mr. Howe, the Senator from Wisconsin, said:

When the Congress of the United States gets sick of it, I suppose they will have power, if they are lucky in the progress of the revolution, to repeal it.

Mr. Davis, of Kentucky, said:

I hope the bill will pass; it is essentially necessary for the execution of the laws against treason in the State of Kentucky, and in all the border slave States.

These extracts answer the question I have submitted. This law was enacted for the purpose of convicting in the State of Kentucky and border States, where political excitement ran high and the division of sentiment had produced a feeling of bitterness unknown elsewhere, men charged with treason; but even then it was not passed but upon the guarantee of Senators Howe and Grimes that when the States were restored to the Union it should be repealed. In 1871 a bill passed this House repealing said sections, but it failed in the Senate.

Perhaps the only noticeable feature in connection with the vote in that body at that time is that a high officer of the present administration, Mr. Schurz, gave his vote in favor of repealing it. This is the history of this law so far as the records of Congress speak, but its unwritten history would fill a longer chapter. Its injury to our system of government, to our judicial system, to the individual, can never be written or estimated.

Why have not the other side of this House, although continuously in power for nearly a decade, complied with the promise which they made to their colleagues; why have they not repealed this unjust law?

The republican party can answer this but in one of three ways:

They may say, We wish to preserve it as one of the memories of the war, as one of the fruits of that struggle, for we purpose to-day to punish our opponents of thirteen years ago.

Against this course when this bill first came before the Senate Mr. Cowan, the Senator from Pennsylvania, advised them. He said:

I think, then, it is far better to allow the law to remain as it is, and not to build everywhere in our pathway, in endeavoring to reconcile these deluded people, monuments of our former differences, monuments which will remind us at every step of the misfortunes of the country, and the alienation of one part of our people from another.

There is another great principle which, I believe, is admitted on all hands by the wise men who have gone before us; that when a rebellion is suppressed, there are but two methods of treating those who participated in it. The one of the utmost severity, the other one of the utmost lenity. That which is forgiven must be forgotten; that which is remembered must be punished, but there must be no half-way measures. If a man is forgiven, he is to be forgiven entirely; he is not to be reminded constantly that at one time he was a traitor; because if you do that, you keep alive the spirit of treason, and it may break out again in another generation. I think, therefore, we had better leave the oath as it is, the law as it is on this subject, and trust to a returning sense of the people, when the rebellion is suppressed, to administer their laws duly.

I do not think the republican party will venture to say that they oppose the repeal of this law because they propose to punish the people of the South by depriving them of one of their greatest rights as freemen. A second solution of the cause of their unwillingness to repeal this obnoxious law might be found in their want of confidence in the people of the South to do justice as sworn jurors in issues to be determined in Federal courts. They may hold that the Federal office-holder, the newly enfranchised colored man, the interests of the Government would not receive justice at the hands of the southern juror. If they lack this confidence, if they can believe conscientiously such wrong of so great a people, then they may so account for their action.

But I do not believe this, the more especially because in the third reason, which may account for their action, I see a continuation of that policy which seems to have actuated them from the day their party came into power down to the present day, and that is a desire to maintain their party domination by means of a Federal judiciary clothed with a discretionary power which places the liberty of the citizen of the South within their power.

Certainly no one will doubt that the continuance on the statute-books of this law forms an important feature in that policy which is seeking to centralize our Government. The very discretionary power which is vested in the judge and district attorney as to requiring the juror to take the oath or not but adds to the partisan influence exerted under this law. Among the highest privileges of an American citizen is that to sit as a juror, and yet under this law the judge or

United States attorney, although unable to take the oath himself, may exclude from the jury-box every man presented who is unable to do so.

In effect it amounts to this, ex-confederates may be excluded, democrats are excluded. The price to be paid for the privilege of sitting on a jury in a United States court is the abandonment of the democratic party and the indorsement of the republican. The class of men eligible under this statute as jurors in the United States courts in the South is small. It consists of the few who have become domiciled there since the war, those who have attached themselves to the republican party, those who have attained their majority within a very few years and who were, therefore, too young to take any part in the war, and the negroes. No matter what part a man took in the late war, in practice the oath is not administered to him if he is a republican.

Is it probable that impartial juries can be obtained under this statute as administered by United States courts in the South? Clearly not. These juries are impaneled to convict, and for no other purpose. They are empaneled not to prevent violations of the laws of the United States, but the purpose of these prosecutions is to punish citizens, or to put them to great expenses and inconvenience, in the hope that they will be deterred from taking an active part in future elections for members of Congress, and they make of these courts not the interpreters of the law, not the vindicators of justice, but mere political machines, kept in operation to sustain the republican party, interfere with elections, trifle with the rights of the States, with a view eventually of having these courts form one of the links in the chain which the centralization party of this country is forging.

During the expiring moments of the Forty-fifth Congress, Mr. Hale said, on page 37 of the RECORD of March 5:

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. DURHAM] has said that it was necessary to put upon the appropriation bills this political legislation. Sir, my comment upon that statement is to say that I hold in my hand a bill passed seventy-four days ago by a republican Senate repealing the test oath so much insisted on by this democratic House. That bill is very brief and in these words:

"Be in enacted, &c., That section 820 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and the same is hereby, repealed, saving the application of the same to all offenses committed prior to April 20, 1871, and all proceedings for prosecution of offenses pending on the said 20th day of April, 1871.

"Passed the Senate, December 20, 1878.

"Attest:

"GEO. C. GORHAM, Secretary.

"By WM. E. SPENCER, Chief Clerk."

Seventy-four days have gone by since that bill came to us from the Senate, and no attempt has been made to take it from the Speaker's table and pass it, so as to give the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. DURHAM] and his associates "an honest and an inteligent jury." [Applause on the republican side.]

Instead of that, a democratic caucus has taken this matter into its own hands, has ignored a proper bill passed by a republican Senate, and has demanded that this and other measures, which they declare to be of vital importance, shall be forced through Congress upon appropriation bills. It has attempted to array this House against a co-ordinate branch of the national Legislature, the Senate of the United States, as I believe with the intention on the part of some men belonging to the reactionary and revolutionary portion of that party to precipitate an extra session of Congress. That is what I have charged from the beginning, and in proof of the correctness of my assertion is this bill passed by a republican Senate, but which this democratic House has persistently refused even to take up and consider.

Now, he was ignorant or disingenuous, because the section of the Revised Statutes to which he refers is not that which provides for the administering of the iron-clad oath, but it is the next one succeeding, (section 821,) which is in these words:

SEC. 821. At every term of any court of the United States the district attorney, or other person acting on behalf of the United States in said court, may move, and the court, in their discretion, may require the clerk to tender to every person summoned to serve as a grand or petit juror, or venireman or talesman, in said court, the following oath or affirmation, namely: "You do solemnly swear (or affirm) that you will support the Constitution of the United States of America; that you have not, without duress and constraint, taken up arms or joined any insurrection or rebellion against the United States; that you have not adhered to any insurrection or rebellion, giving it aid and comfort; that you have not, directly or indirectly, given any assistance in money or any other thing, to any person or persons whom you knew, or had good ground to believe, to have joined, or to be about to join, said insurrection or rebellion, or to have resisted, or to be about to resist, with force of arms, the execution of the laws of the United States; and that you have not counseled or advised any person to join any insurrection or rebellion against, or to resist with force of arms, the laws of the United States." Any person declining to take said oath shall be discharged by the court from serving on the grand or petit jury, or venire, to which he may have been summoned.

Therefore the Senate bill to which he referred did not provide a remedy for the evils complained of, because if it had become a law it was still left discretionary with the presiding judge, upon the motion of the district attorney, or other person prosecuting in behalf of the United States, to administer the oath as the succeeding would have remained on the statute-book, as I have already shown.

My colleague [Mr. ELLIS] introduced a bill at the first session, I think, of the Forty-fifth Congress for the repeal of both of these sections. It went before the Judiciary Committee of the House, and my information is that the committee compromised on a bill to repeal the eight hundred and twentieth section and leaving the next in force, which was reported to the House and passed. If the republican majority in the Senate or the House had been as willing to do such an act of simple justice as Mr. Hale claims himself and friends were ready to do, at the last moment, it is very probable that this extra session might have been avoided. I think it fair to say that his party would not have made the concession which he then proposed, if they had not been driven to it by the firm attitude of the democratic party in the House in demanding the repeal of these sections of the Revised Statutes, and the amendment of the eight hundredth section, changing the method of drawing juries in United States courts.

As I have shown before, it was not possible for the republican party with its organization to have carried the last election in Louisiana, and these prosecutions under these Federal election laws have been instigated for the purpose of intimidating white men in the future. I feel it safe to say that no conviction in my judgment can ever be obtained on any of these indictments. It amounts simply to a persecution.

SUPERVISORS AND DEPUTY MARSHALS.

Sections 2016 to 2031 inclusive, which provide for the appointment of supervisors of election and of deputy marshals, were tacked on as riders to the sundry civil appropriation bill of June 10, 1872. The democratic party propose to repeal these provisions in the same manner as they were enacted.

The unconstitutionality of the existing law grows out of the fact that under its provisions the Federal Government has trenched upon the rights of the States and usurped powers specially reserved to them in the Constitution. I desire to refer briefly on this point to what I said on another occasion. Section 4 of article 1 of the Constitution reads as follows:

The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators.

By this section it was made mandatory upon the States to regulate the holding of elections for Representatives, but an ultimate power is conferred upon Congress to "make or alter such regulations."

This power was purely a contingent power, capable of being exercised at "any time" when the States failed to make due provision, or having made provision for holding elections had so far departed from a system which would insure just and uniform representation as to justify the intervention of Congress, a power, as the discussion reported in Elliott's Debates shows, given solely to enable the Federal Government to preserve itself from destruction, in the event of the States declining to act. I quote from the debates on this section for the purpose of showing the object of adding this qualifying clause to this section of the Constitution.

I read from pages 366 and 367 of Elliot's Debates on the Federal Constitution:

Mr. Monroe wished that the honorable gentleman, who had been in the Federal convention, would give information respecting the clause concerning elections. He wished to know why Congress had an ultimate control over the time, place, and manner of elections of Representatives, and the time and manner of that of Senators, and also why there was an exception as to the place of electing Senators.

Mr. MADISON. * * * It was necessary to give the General Government a control over the time and manner of choosing the Senators to prevent its own dissolution. With respect to the other point, it was thought that the regulation of time, place, and manner of electing the Representatives should be uniform throughout the continent. Some States might regulate the elections on the principle of equality, and others might regulate them otherwise. This diversity would be obviously unjust.

* * * * * * *

It was found necessary to leave the regulation of these, (time, place, and manner,) in the first place, to the State governments, as being best acquainted with the situation of the people, subject to the control of the General Government, in order to enable it to produce uniformity and prevent its own dissolution. And, considering the State governments and General Government as distinct bodies, acting in different and independent capacities for the people, it was thought the particular regulations should be submitted to the former, and the general regulations to the latter. Were they exclusively under the control of the State governments, the General Government might easily be dissolved. But if they be regulated properly by the State Legislatures, the congressional power will very probably never be exercised. The power appears to me satisfactory, and as unlikely to be abused as any part of the Constitution.

When in the Twenty-eighth Congress the construction of this section of the Constitution was brought to the attention of the House by reason of the fact that the right of the Representatives from the States of New Hampshire, Georgia, Mississippi, and Missouri, to seats in that Congress was in question, they having been elected under the general-ticket system, whereas Congress had by an act approved June 25, 1842, required elections for Representatives to be held under what is known as the district system, a report was submitted to the House by Hon. Stephen A. Douglas, of Illinois, to whom it had been referred. From his remarks accompanying this report I desire to read a few extracts. Mr. Douglas said:

It had been stated so many times on that floor that probably some might believe it, that twenty-two States of the Union had been districted in obedience to the act of Congress. Was it so? The gentleman from New York had told them that the State of New York was districted in obedience to the law of Congress. But what was the fact? Being a member from that State and living at the seat of Government the gentleman might be supposed to know. The very Legislature which passed the law districting the State, passed also a resolution protesting against the validity of the act of Congress and declared they did not district the State in obedience to that act. * * * Nearly two-thirds of all the States stood upon the same footing as the State of New York. His own State (Illinois) first passed a resolution declaring that the law of Congress was invalid, inoperative, and not binding upon the States; that it was the political trick of a desperate party to perpetuate its own power, in defiance of the will of the people. After doing this the Legislature districted the State according to their own wishes and not in obedience to the law. The State of Ohio did the same thing. A majority of the States of the Union did this, yet the gentleman from New York told the House that they did it in obedience to the law.

Again, Mr. Douglas says in this connection:

But to return to the question as to what the framers of the Constitution actually meant when they inserted that clause in the Constitution. The debates of the convention clearly showed that they who formed the Constitution and they who interpreted it and ratified it meant that the power of Congress over the elections should be exercised only in the event of the States refusing to legislate upon the subject, or legislating in such a manner as [not] to submit the rights of the people to a fair representation. There could be no question or dispute upon this point. The report of the majority of the committee admitted that a majority of all the States of the Union protest against the exercise of this power, except upon the happening of the contingency to which he had referred. As to the intention of the framers of the Constitution upon this point there could be no doubt.

In addition I desire to quote one of the concluding resolutions of the report of the committee, having reference simply to the exercise of the power by the Federal Government, so far as districting the States is concerned, under the authority derived from section 4 of article 1:

Resolved, That the second section of an act for the apportionment of Representatives among the several States according to the sixth census, approved June 25, 1842, is not a law made in pursuance of the Constitution of the United States, and valid, operative, and binding upon the States.

Mr. Benton, speaking of the act of 1842, said:

This is a case of a command, of a mandamus. Congress does not district the States, but commands the Legislature to do it. It is a command without authority, without a sanction for its observance, without precedent, and, in my opinion, without constitutional warrant. I desire in this connection to add to this weight of authority the opinions of Alexander Hamilton and of Judge Story. Mr. Hamilton says in the fifty-ninth number of the Federalist: "They have submitted the regulation of elections for the Federal Government, in the first instance, to the local administrations, which in ordinary cases, and when no improper views prevail, may be both more convenient and more satisfactory; but they have reserved to the national authority a right to interpose whatever extraordinary circumstances might render that interposition necessary to its safety."

He also says in the same article:

Its propriety rests upon the evidence of this plain proposition, that every government ought to contain in itself the means of its own preservation. The correctness of the view I present of the intent of the framers of the Constitution in adding this qualifying clause is also sustained by Mr. Justice Story. He says: "In the first place, the power may be applied by Congress to correct any negligence in a State in regard to elections as well as to prevent a dissolution of the Government by designing and refractory States, urged on by some temporary excitement. In the next place, it will operate as a check in favor of the people against the designs of a Federal Senate and their constituents to deprive the people of their right to choose Representatives. In the next place, it provides a remedy for the evil if any State by reason of invasion or other cause cannot have it in its power to appoint a place where the citizens can safely meet to choose Representatives. In the last place, (as the plan is but an experiment,) it may hereafter become important, with a view to the regular operations of the General Government, that there should be a uniformity in the time and manner of electing Representatives and Senators, so as to prevent vacancies when there may be calls for extraordinary sessions of Congress.

When, in 1871, this question of Federal interference with congressional elections came before the Senate through a House bill amendatory of the act of May, 1870, it was made the object of severe comment by Mr. Vickers, the Senator from Maryland. A portion of his remarks are well worthy of reproduction here. He says:

It will be seen by the extracts I have read that the power was inserted for the especial purpose of guarding against a destruction of the Government in the last resort, to be used only to save life, not as a medicine to alleviate or assuage, but as a life preserver. If a power be granted for one purpose it cannot legally be used for another, although in form and letter it may embrace it. Every law and every constitution must be construed according to its intent and purpose when made.

Will gentlemen reflect calmly on the powers which are conferred on these supervisors and deputy marshals?

They are given the power to construe State laws and those laws regulating the exercise of the elective franchise; to play the part of the spy and the informer upon State officials; to arrest without warrant and deprive of his liberty, as well as of his right to cast his ballot, an American citizen. They are supervisors, judges, managing clerks, spies and partisans, and executive officers at the same time. Their duties are not limited to those I have described. Another important duty is that of voting, and I regret to say that this Government has been made the instrument, under this law, of bribing men for $5 a day to vote the republican ticket. And I feel no hesitation in saying that 75 per cent. of the deputy marshals appointed were composed of that class whose votes could be so purchased. To such men has the control of our State elections been confided.

I but repeat that which I find of record, and I shall select, not a record furnished from elections in the South, for which section this political machine was created, but I will take the record of the North and West to show you how this law has been abused, to what base purposes it has been applied.

In the eastern district of Missouri, at the election held there in 1876 for Representatives, there were appointed eleven hundred and twenty-three deputy marshals, all of whom were placed in and around the several election precincts in the city and county of Saint Louis, and not one of them was appointed in compliance with the wishes of the democratic candidate in the district where they were principally placed, but they were all appointed by a republican marshal. I quote further from the notice of contest served by Mr. FROST on his opponent in that election. He says:

That said eleven hundred and twenty-three deputy marshals were placed in and around said several election precincts in the city and county of Saint Louis, within said congressional district, on said day of election, in violation of law, and used their official positions for the purpose of securing votes for you for said office of Representative, and in discouraging and preventing legally qualified voters from voting for me; that by reason of the great number of said marshals, their oppressive action, their active partisan conduct in your behalf, their open expressions of hostility to me as your opponent for said office, and their willful and notorious abuse of the authority with which they were invested as such deputy marshals of the United States, more than five hundred voters within said district, and legally entitled to vote for Representative in Congress for said district, were on said day of election intimidated from voting for me, and did not vote at said election.

That more than nine hundred of the persons so appointed as deputy marshals of the United States were members of the democratic party, resided within said district, and were legally entitled to vote for said office of Representative, on said day of election; that your partisans, at whose request said appointments were all made, called upon said persons prior to said day of election and required from each of said persons a promise to vote for you, and use his best efforts to secure your election, as a condition-precedent to such appointment; that more than five hundred of said persons did so promise and did vote for you on said day of election, by reason of said promise and of said appointment; that after said appointment had been made said voters were made to believe, by persons acting in your interest, that it was not only necessary that said persons should vote and induce others to vote for you, but that if you were not elected no compensation would be paid to them for their services as such deputy marshals; that on said day of election and upon the pretense that it was necessary to have a witness to prove that said deputy marshal had voted for you at said election, in order to secure payment of the $40 which had been promised to each of them for services at said election, certain of your partisans went to said marshals respectively and placed in their hands ballots, whereon your name was printed as a candidate for said office of Representative, and insisted that said ballots should be voted in their presence; that the persons selected for said appointment as marshals were, with few exceptions, wholly unfitted for the duties of said office and wholly ignorant as to said duties; that a great majority of said persons believed that their sole duty at said election was to secure the election of yourself as Representative in Congress for said district; that said persons have been paid for their alleged services at said election the price and sum of $10 each, out of money belonging to the United States; that more than five hundred of said deputy marshals were induced to vote for you at said election by reason of said false and fraudulent representation of your said partisans and of the promise of money above set forth; that the appointment of the said eleven hundred and twenty-three deputy marshals was wholly unnecessary at said time and was done for the purpose of preventing a full and fair election for Representative in Congress for said district, and by illegal, wrongful, and disreputable means to overcome the majority of the democratic party in said district, theretofore, then, and now, exceeding sixteen hundred votes.

I select from the testimony of numerous United States deputy marshals taken in that case a brief extract from that given by Thomas Barrett, one of these officials, it being similar to that of nearly all of the deputy marshals sworn. He says, on page 154:

Question. Were you informed by him that you couldn't get the appointment as United States marshal unless you voted for a republican Congressman?

Answer. He told me himself I couldn't be appointed unless under those conditions I should vote for the republican Congressman. The rest of the ticket he said he didn't care about.

Cross-examination by the counsel for the contestee, George H. Shields:

Q. You promised you would vote for the republican ticket to get the appointment?
A. Yes.
Q. And in order to get the appointment you willfully told him a lie?
A. Well, I did't consider it was any of his business if he would appoint me. It was Government money that was to pay me, which had no right to be used in the interest of one man. It didn't matter what he was. That's the way I looked at it.

James Francis Ryan, another deputy marshal, testifies on page 158:

Question. Did he make that a condition, for you to vote for Congressman?
Answer. Yes; that I should vote for Congressman.
Q. Or else you couldn't get an appointment?
A. Or else I couldn't get an appointment.

Nicholas W. Dervy, another deputy marshal, says on page 199:

Question. Did he make it a condition that you should vote for the republican Congressman before you received your appointment?
(Counsel for contestee objected; let him state the facts.)
Answer. Well, that is what he said. As long as I said I would vote for Metcalfe I would get my commission. So he brought me in the room right next to the United States marshal, Leffingwell, and gave me my commission.
Q. What were your politics?
A. Democrat.

This is sufficient, I trust, to enlighten those who do not know of what kind of material United States deputy marshals are made and for what purposes they are appointed fully on this subject. I will, however, read one more extract from the testimony of John Berg, another deputy marshal, who says on page 246:

Question. Now, have you any objection to telling who you voted for for Congress?
Answer. I voted for L. S. Metcalfe, I think his name is.
Q. Now, what consideration moved you to vote for L. S. Metcalfe?
A. Well, I voted for Mr. Metcalfe more because them fellows put me in that club; and they put me on as United States deputy marshal, and then I thought it was no more than just to vote for him; otherwise, if I could not have been a deputy marshal, I would not have voted for him, and I guess they would not have put me on as marshal nohow unless they thought I was a republican.
Q. Those were the considerations that moved you to vote for Metcalfe?
A. Yes, sir.

But it may be said that Missouri is one of those border States which are still to be made the victims of war legislation. Let us go to Pennsylvania, examine the testimony taken before the committee of which Senator WALLACE is the chairman, and see what supervisors and deputy marshals do there.

The first and most startling disclosure made before this committee was in the shape of a petition submitted by a number of naturalized citizens of the State of New York, which, if the statements therein contained be true, affords the most damning proof of the iniquitous results of this system. I submit a portion of this petition without comment because it is a matter which must eventually come before this House. I regard it as of special moment, because it is the first time in our history that a subordinate officer of the Federal Government has ever dared by judicial action to determine the qualifications of voters in a State who had been naturalized and held their certificates in due form of law. A question had arisen as to the regularity of certain certificates of naturalization taken out in 1868. Of persons holding these certificates about five thousand had registered in 1878.

Judge Freedman, of the superior court of the State of New York, had "rendered an exhaustive opinion, deciding that the method of naturalization complained of was lawful and regular," and this opinion has since been sustained by that of Judge Blatchford. John I.

Davenport was in 1878 the chief supervisor of the city of New York. I read a portion of the petition submitted to this House:

On the 3d and 4th days of November, 1878, the day preceding the election, Commissioner John I. Davenport caused the said Stephen Mosher to swear before him to about four thousand printed complaints against the persons registered as voters in the different election districts in this city as having naturalization papers issued in the year 1868, charging them with having "on one of the days of registration, for the purpose of registering or otherwise, unlawfully used a certificate of naturalization, knowing that it had been unlawfully issued or made," but containing no further particulars; said Mosher having, and being known by Davenport to have, no knowledge whatever of the parties or of the facts, except such as he might have obtained from copies of the registry lists. On each of these so-called complaints, many of which he admitted upon his recent examination in court that he did not read, Commissioner Davenport issued a warrant for the arrest of the accused, and placed the same in the hands of the marshals he had detailed to the various polling places in the city so that they were there at the opening of the polls, the proceeding being kept strictly secret. As soon as each voter who had registered upon papers issued in the year 1868 presented himself he was arrested and dragged from the polls, unless known to be in favor of the combination ticket, when he was not molested. Early in the day the men were all arrested and taken away to intimidate the others. When this result had been accomplished, those coming later were told that if they did not vote they would not be interferred with; if they did vote they were arrested on the spot.

In many cases those arrested were taken in the first place to the republican headquarters of the district, and from there to Davenport's rooms. The others were taken there directly. On the upper floor of the post-office a large "slave-pen" had been provided, into which these men, guiltless of any crime, were thrust like wild beasts, until it was packed with a struggling mass of suffering humanity, and there they were kept in this condition for hours, without food or water.

In addition to those thus confined, the court-rooms of the circuit court were crowded with other prisoners waiting the slow process of having their cases disposed of by three commissioners—Davenport, Deuel, and Shields. There were several other commissioners in the building, or whose services could have been obtained. But these cases were only brought before these three, one being the instigator of the whole proceeding, and the other two clerks employed by him in his office as clerk of the United States circuit court, and therefore subservient to his will. In addition, it was physically impossible for these three men to hear the vast number of cases brought before them during election day.

The process pursued in the majority of the cases was uniform and evidently agreed upon beforehand. The men were called up one by one, and asked a number of questions, particularly if they had voted. If they had, and if their naturalization was regular according to their statements, they were informed that if they waived an examination they would be released upon their own recognizances to await the action of the grand jury, and were accordingly discharged. If it appeared not to be regular, they were held to bail. If they had not voted, they were told that they would be required to give bail varying from $1,000 to $5,000, unless they would pledge themselves not to vote, being also told that they would be arrested a second time if they broke their promise. It having been previously announced by Commissioner Davenport that he would exercise what he termed his legal right of taking twenty-four hours to examine into the sufficiency of any bail that might be offered, and would commit the party arrested in the mean time, this was equivalent to informing those men that they would be locked up for at least a day if they refused to give the required pledge, and, with more or less demur, it was given by all. Nor was the threat of punishment for its violation an idle one. Patrick Whelan, who was brought before Commissioner Deuel on election morning and released after this pledge had been extorted from him, voted in spite of it. He was at once arrested and brought again before that commissioner, who asked him if he had voted. He replied "that he had a legal right to vote and had done so, as he did not consider a promise obtained as his had been binding." Bail was at once offered in the person of Mr. John Foley, a well known and responsible business man, personally acquainted with Mr. Davenport. Commissioner Deuel evaded the responsibility by sending the matter before Davenport himself. The latter stated that he would hold Mr. Whelan in $5,000 bail, to await the action of the grand jury. Mr. Foley at once signed a bail bond in that amount, and justified as the holder of unincumbered real estate in a sum far exceeding it. Mr. Davenport, however, stated that he should take time to examine into his sufficiency as surety, and sent Mr. Whelan to jail.

It is unnecessary to say that this intimidation was directed against democrats. A few republicans were arrested, but it was by mistake and they were generally released by the marshals. At the election in Philadelphia in 1878, as appears from the testimony taken by the Wallace committee in that city, there were appointed seventeen hundred and thirty-two United States supervisors of elections, and seven hundred and seventy-three deputy marshals. These deputy marshals were paid for two days' service $7,730. The expenses of the supervisors amounted to $27,400. On page 23 of this testimony the evidence of R. C. Howell is valuable as showing the character of these deputy marshals and the manner in which they were engaged:

Q. Who was the United States marshal for your division?
A. Charles Oliphant.
Q. Was he drunk or sober on that election day?
A. He was drunk.
Q. Describe briefly his conduct.
A. He was insulting voters all day.
Mr. CAMERON. That is a conclusion rather than a fact. State whas he said.
The WITNESS. Whenever a democrat would come up, who was challenged, and who would present his tax receipt, he would say to the judge, "Put that receipt in your pocket."
Q. (By the Chairman.) Did he take hold of any person during the day?
A. Yes, sir; about six o'clock in the evening, Mr. William B. Hackenburg came to the polls to vote, when there was some dispute in regard to a vote. Mr. Hackenburg was standing there. Mr. Oliphant grabbed him, pulled him away from the polls, and said, "I'll arrest you anyhow." The people of the neighborhood got around and prevailed upon Oliphant to let go of Hackenburg. He did not take him away.
Q. Had Mr. Hackenburg's vote been challenged?
A. No, sir.

On page 31 Mr. Hackenburg testifies:

Question. What was the condition of Oliphant—drunk or sober?
Answer. I take him to have been a drunken man. He was very noisy and quarrelsome. He had frequent disputes with the people outside on the pavement, especially with Mr. Howell; he threatened to fight Mr. Howell. He had several assistants there, strangers to the division, men whom I had never seen there before.
Q. Were these men who were assisting him strangers in the division?
A. Yes, sir; I am confident they were not voters. I never saw them before nor at any other time.
Q. Did Mr. Oliphant challenge your right to vote before he seized you by the collar?
A. No, sir.
Q. What was the first intimation you had of his interference with you?
A. It was by catching hold of me by the collar and pulling me away with him

On page 38 John Trainer testifies:

Question. Do you know the marshal who was there?
Answer. Yes, sir.
Q. Who was he?
A. Charles Herr.
Q. Have you known him any length of time?
A. I have known him about five years.
Q. What is his character and reputation as far as you know him?
A. Very bad.
Q. Has he been arrested?
A. He has been arrested to my knowledge for receiving money under false pretenses.

On page 61 John Hughes testifies:

Question. Did you see the United States marshals, Muth and Homeyard?
Answer. Yes, sir; I saw Mr. Homeyard there.
Q. Have you known him for some time?
A. I cannot say that I am in any way acquainted with Mr. Homeyard; I have seen his face frequently, but to say that I know him personally I cannot.
Q. What was his behavior during that election day as to the conduct of his duties as United States marshal? What did you see him do?
A. I think I was down there myself in the morning about nine o'clock. I do not know whether it was Mr. Barr or Mr. McGinniss who had the window-book, but whichever it was, he asked me to take it for a few minutes. I took the window-book, and was standing on the cellar-door, when Mr. Homeyard was talking to a man by the name of Schriber. Then a colored man came along Cherry street, on the north side of the way, and an officer was with him. The colored man came over to the window to vote, with a ticket in his hand. I said to him, "You can't vote here." He said, "I can't?" "No, you can't," With that Homeyard jumped to me and said, "What's the matter with you?" I told him there was nothing the matter with me. I said, "This man does not live here, and has no right to vote here." Then I gave a general challenge as the man stepped on the cellar-door. Mr. Schriber told him to go and get a voucher. He left, and Mr. Homeyard said if I interfered any more he would lock me up. I told him that that would please me very much if he would, and I asked who he was or what authority he had there. Mr. Homeyard then left the polls, went across the street to a small cigar-store and came back with a badge on his coat to let me see that he was a marshal.

On page 72, James Morris testifies:

Question. Who was the marshal there?
Answer. I think his name was De Sanno.
Q. Does he live in that division?
A. I could not say.
Q. Did you ever see him before that day?
A. I never saw him before that election day.
Q. What was his behavior on that day?
A. He was drunk the whole day; from about nine o'clock until about six he was right drunk. He was just around the division there.
Q. What is his first name?
A. I do not know whether it is John, or what it is; I know that his name is De Sanno. It is not on the assessor's list in the division.
Q. His name is not on the list of voters in the division?
A. No, sir.
Q. What did he do?
A. He was standing around there all day, just walking up and down before the window.
Q. Had he a badge?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. What was on the badge?
A. I think it said "Deputy marshal."
Q. Did he arrest anybody?
A. No, sir; he was too drunk, I think.

The testimony of Charles J. Miller, the murder detective of Philadelphia, on pages 101 and 102, with reference to the character of these marshals is yet more startling. He says:

Question. What is the character of Philip Madden?
Answer. I think he is one of the worst men in Philadelphia.
Q. In what respect?
A. He is a dangerous man; he is violent and dangerous.
Q. How long has he been out of prison?
A. I think probably eight months or a year. He was convicted of highway robbery, I think.
Q. Do you know of this man Madden having shot anybody?
A. I did not see him shoot anybody. I heard he shot a boy at one time.
Q. Was he in prison, to your knowledge, more than this one time?
A. He was in prison twice.
Q. What is his general character; is it that of a peaceable citizen, or that of a desperate, bad man?
A. His character is that of a desperate, bad man.
Q. Do you know Francis McNamee, of the Eighth ward?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. What is his character?
A. I arrested him for being concerned in five robberies, about seven years ago, and convicted him for having stolen goods in his possession. He was sentenced, I think, to eighteen months. I am not certain about the length of the sentence.
Q. Do you know in what precinct he lives?
A. No, sir; he lives in the Eighth ward, somewhere about Locust street.
Q. Do you know Joseph Hilferty?
A. No, sir.
Q. Do you know Daniel Reading, of the First ward?
A. Yes, sir; very well. I guess everybody here knows him.
Q. What is the general reputation of Daniel Reading?
A. He is considered to be a very bad, dangerous man. He has been tried for murder.
Q. How long since was he tried for murder?
A. In 1869.
Q. Is his reputation still bad or good?
A. Bad.
Q. Do you know a Mr. Pitts?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Of what ward?
A. The Seventh ward. He keeps a place in Lombard street above Eighth, on the south side.
Q. What is his business?
A. He keeps a gambling place, and things of that kind.
Q. Is he a colored man?
A. He is a colored man.
Q. He keeps a gambling-house; is it a drinking-house?

A. Yes, sir. He has been arrested once or twice, and was tried before.
Q. For what offense has he been tried?
A. I cannot remember; but he was arrested once or twice.
Q. To what ward does Daniel Reading belong?
A. To the First ward. His name does not appear upon the list of marshals as having been put down for the precinct in which he lives, but I think he lives in the twenty-third precinct, on Mildred street below McKean, I think.
Q. Is the name of Frank McGowan on the list of marshals here before the committee?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Is the name of Philip Madden on the same list of marshals?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Do you know Henry Scott?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Who is he?
A. He keeps a hotel in Lombard street.
Q. Is he a white or colored man?
A. A colored man.
Q. Do you know anything of him?
A. His reputation is bad. I am forgetting about him.
Q. Do you know Rodney F. Springfield?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Is he of the Fifteenth ward?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. What is his reputation?
A. He was tried for killing a colored man, for shooting him.
Q. Is he upon this list as a deputy marshal?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. The name of Springfield is on this list?
A. Yes, sir
Q. Do you know Michael Slavin, of the Fifth ward?
A. Very well.
Q. What is his reputation?
A. He is a notorious repeater, a thief.
Q. Has that been his reputation for some time?
A. It has, so far as I know him, for eight or nine years. I have seen him lead gangs of repeaters to vote many a time; that is his profession, "repeater."

John B. Cahill, on pages 163 and 164, testifies:

Question. Do you know John May, whose name is on the written list of marshals that I hold in my hand?
Answer. I do, very well.
Q. Is he the same who is on this list of marshals? [Indicating list in evidence.]
A. Yes, sir.
Q. What is his business?
A. He keeps a house of prostitution on the corner of Newmarket and Peg streets.
Q. Do you know whether he arrested anybody on election day?
A. I do not. At this last election he did not.
Q. Do you know Abraham Hoffman?
A. I do, very well.
Q. In what precinct does he live?
A. He is supposed to live in the fifth precinct of the Eleventh ward.
Q. Has he any other name than Hoffman?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. What is his other name?
A. I call him "Shad."
Q. Where does he live?
A. I give it up.
Q. What is his business?
A. He used to keep a house of prostitution on Fifth street, below Callowhill.
Q. Do you know anything about his occupation on election days?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. What is it?
A. A repeater.
Q. Who does he generally repeat for?
A. The republican party.
Q. How do you know that?
A. By following him on several occasions.
Q. Detail for us one of those little diversions of yours.
A. A couple of years ago he was out through the Thirteenth and Fourteenth wards.
Q. How many times did you see that he voted?
A. I suppose, at the least calculation, three to six times at different places.
Q. Has he any known business now?
A. No. He skipped away for stealing a five-dollar note.
Q. When was that?
A. Here some three or four months ago.
Q. Was there a warrant for him?
A. That I don't know.
Q. How do you know as a fact of his having stolen a five-dollar note?
A. He stole it from a man by the name of Lafayette Groul, on Third street, below Green.
Q. Do you know William Eckenbrine?
A. I do.
Q. Where does he live?
A. I don't know where he lives now.
Q. What is his character?
A. Billy is a first-rate fellow.
Q. What is the general reputation of the man?
A. Billy is a pretty good fellow.
Q. Has he been charged with any criminal offenses lately?
A. No, sir; I never knew him to be charged with anything, only he was arrested for larceny, but I believe the bill was ignored.
Q. Is he a republican?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Has he any ostensible occupation?
A. Just now he has.
Q. What is it?
A. He works in a coffee-roaster's, in Third street below Coates, or Fairmount avenue, as it is now called.
Q. All these names are upon this list of marshals, are they?
A. Yes, sir.

Again, on page 168, Henry Kohler testifies:

Question. Where were you on the day of election in November, 1878?
Answer. I was United States supervisor in the thirty-second division of the Nineteenth ward.
Q. Who was the marshal there?
A. David Beckman.
Q. What occurred between you and Beckman in regard to the vote of the man to whom you objected?
A. David Beckman brought a man there to vote who had no papers. He was not a citizen. I challenged the man on a general challenge. David Beckman said to me, "Now, you know that man has his papers." I said, "I don't know anything of the kind; I want to see them." He kept on fooling, and at last he said to me, "Damn your soul, I will jerk you out of that poll." I said, "You have no more authority there than I have; I want to see this man's papers." The man went away and did not come back. David Beckman came in the polls after that and said, "Now, you know that man had his papers." I said I knew nothing about them. The man never came back to vote. I knew the man, and knew he had no papers.
Q. What were Mr. Beckman's politics?
A. He counted himself a democrat at one time; he was elected on the school-board and he sold the school-board out; he sold the democrats out; and after that the democrats kicked him out of the executive committee; then he went over to the republicans.

I have quoted these extracts at length, in order that this House and the whole country may know what manner of men the republican party is desirous shall preserve the purity of our elections. When they oppose the repeal of this law I wish the country to know that it is to maintain such men in a position to control the right of honest men to vote that the republican party to-day opposes the repeal of this iniquitous law.

These examples I have cited are not the exceptions, they are the rule. The high-handed acts of oppression done by this swarm of prize-fighters, drunkards, and murderers, in the interests of the republican party, in the name of law, and paid for out of the money of the people, are a disgrace to American civilization.

It will not do to talk about the South any longer. The violations of the Constitution intended to oppress the South have been found more useful in the North, and we of the South, Mr. Chairman, are here to-day hoping that we may be enabled to aid in preventing such occurrences like those which took place in the last elections in these districts. We are here, sir, and we represent a solid South not to obliterate one statute which is for the good of the people, but ready to blot out every one which infringes on the liberties of the citizen.

Mr. Chairman, I have shown I believe that these laws are unconstitutional, and that their repeal is necessary if our institutions are to be preserved. There is no doubt in my judgment as to what the action of Congress will be on these bills. They will be passed with the repealing legislation attached. I do not propose to venture a prediction as to whether the President will approve or disapprove them. If he disapproves, the responsibility will be on him and his party for stopping the necessary supplies for the support of the Government.

During the delivery of the foregoing speech the following colloquy took place:

Mr. WHITE. I understand from the course of the gentleman's remarks that he is speaking of the election of 1876.

Mr. ELAM. Yes, sir.

Mr. WHITE. And that he was not personally present at any poll at which an election was held.

Mr. ELAM. I made no canvass in one-half of my district. The district was divided by the river, and I canvassed the western side, but I was prevented from canvassing the eastern side of the river by an injury which I received.

Mr. WHITE. At what poll was the gentleman present?

Mr. ELAM. I was not present at any poll at that election.

Mr. WHITE. I wanted you to say by way of amusement and instruction what you knew of the election of 1876. Does my friend disclaim that there was any violence or outrage committed by the opposition to the republican party in 1876 in any of what are known as the "bull-dozed counties?"

Mr. ROBERTSON. I have spoken already in regard to the parishes of my district.

Mr. WHITE. I have this to say in answer to the gentleman, that in several parishes at the election of 1876, there were the darkest outrages ever perpetrated in the history of elections in this country, and I think that the record of crime, the record of murder, the record of violence, the record of interference with voters, has never been exceeded as it was in that case.

Mr. ELAM. Does the gentleman include Baton Rouge, and the region in that vicinity?

Mr. WHITE. I would include it if it were necessary.

Mr. ELAM. I want to ask you one question. I do not remember all the testimony, but I believe the gentleman has read the testimony or was a member of the committee?

Mr. WHITE. I have read the testimony.

Mr. ELAM. Yes, sir; you were down there?

Mr. WHITE. Yes, I was.

Mr. ELAM. You have read the testimony?

Mr. WHITE. Yes, and I think that Eliza Pinkston testified in her examination that her husband was killed, her own throat cut, as well as——

Mr. ELAM. I think that this violence was perpetrated by colored republicans. I think the testimony was to that effect. So much for Eliza Pinkston.

Mr. WHITE. Now, Mr. Chairman, in the testimony as to the persons who were killed, as to this woman who had her throat cut—that she was mutilated, that her husband was murdered, was known to citizens there. They did not call on the coroner, they did not send for the sheriff, nor was any effort made to arrest the perpetrators of this outrage. What does that show? It shows a condition of confusion, demoralization, disregard for law and right and order, which calls for the attention of the General Government.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Was not that under a republican administration?

Mr. WHITE. I do not care under whose administration it was——

Mr. ROBERTSON. That is all I wanted to know.

Mr. WHITE. No man who would allow a laborer of his to lie naked and murdered on the roadside is to my mind animated by proper instincts of law and order. Men who will allow such things to occur cannot be held up to the American people as exemplars of law and order in that portion of the country, or as individuals who can be trusted to secure to this humble portion of our fellow-citizens a free and uninterrupted exercise of the ballot.

Apropos to that I could refer my friend to the instance of Benjamin James, who on the very morning of the election left the city of Monroe with the ballot-box under his arm to go to the polling place, and was stopped on his way by a military company, a company of men calling themselves democrats; he was shot, was left for dead, and as a consequence no election was held in that locality on that day. Why was this negro, who was an election officer and I believe a constable of his locality, interfered with? Was not this political?

Mr. ELAM. I hope the gentleman will not take up any more of my time.

Mr. WHITE. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I merely referred to these things in answer to the remark that the elections in that region were peaceful and quiet and that there was no interference with the rights of the colored voters there.

Mr. ELAM. In the first place, the affair in the parish of Ouachita is said to have occurred in 1876.

Mr. WHITE. Certainly.

Mr. ELAM. That parish is not in my district.

Mr. WHITE. It is in Louisiana; it is one of the five bulldozed parishes.

Mr. ELAM. That parish is not in my district, nor was it in 1876; therefore, as to the facts occurring there, I cannot speak with the same accuracy as in relation to what occurred in my district in 1878.

I have one further statement to make. I do not remember whether I heard that testimony or not; but I talked with this gentleman, who was the old master of Eliza Pinkston.

Mr. WHITE. Why, he was examined; I heard him examined.

Mr. ELAM. I know he was examined, but I do not remember whether I heard his testimony or not; sometimes I was in attendance on the committee, and sometimes I was not. But there is evidence there to show (and it is the opinion of the people of that parish, so far as I could ascertain at the time) that Eliza Pinkston's husband was killed by a man of his own color, with whom he had formerly had a difficulty. Eliza Pinkston's husband in a fist-fight had whipped this man, who at that time threatened to kill him on the first opportunity.

Mr. WHITE. That is the allegation. There is a debate about that matter; and if the gentleman from Louisiana and myself, as lawyers, were defending the persons whom Eliza Pinkston in her testimony charged as being the perpetrators of the offense, we might probably acquit them. But what I mean to say is, that this outrage was perpetrated; and leading men like Mr. Tidwell, the ruling spirit of that parish, did not try to bring any of the perpetrators to justice.

Mr. ELAM. Mr. Chairman, there have never been greater outrages committed in this country in modern times than have been committed in the coal and iron regions of the State of Pennsylvania.

Mr. WHITE. Very well; we have brought the criminals to justice; we tried and hanged eleven of those men in one year.

Mr. ELAM. I cannot yield further.

Mr. WHITE. I shall not allow my State to be unjustly arraigned in that way. It is true that crimes were committed, wicked and criminal associations were formed——

Mr. ELAM. Those who live in glass houses should beware of throwing the first stone.

Mr. WHITE. What does the gentleman refer to?

Mr. ELAM. I allude to those atrocious crimes committed in the mining districts of Pennsylvania by the "Mollie Maguires" and organizations of that kind within the last four or five years.

Mr. WHITE. The answer to the gentleman is that while crimes of that kind were committed the perpetrators were hunted out by the authorities, were tried, convicted, and punished. Was the same thing done as to the perpetrators of these offenses in the State of Louisiana?

Mr. ELAM. It was wherever that could be discovered. Since the war I have defended more than a hundred colored men charged with murdering people of their own color.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I have done the same thing repeatedly.

Mr. WHITE. Was any effort made to bring the parties concerned in the Pinkston case to justice?

Mr. ELAM. I do not know; I have no information as to that.

Mr. WHITE. Have you any evidence that the public officers were invited to take any steps in the matter?

Mr. COFFROTH. Will the gentleman from Louisiana allow me a moment?

Mr. ELAM. Yes, sir.

Mr. COFFROTH. My colleague [Mr. WHITE] says that in Pennsylvania the Mollie Maguires were brought to justice; that is true; but there is a part of the history that my colleague does not give. As long as the organization known as the "Mollie Maguires" could be used by the republicans to carry elections in Pennsylvania they were not brought to justice. Eventually they were brought to justice through the efforts of a democrat in that State, the president of the Reading Railroad, who brought detectives there to ferret out the Mollie Maguires, and who carried on the prosecutions.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania, rose.

Mr. ELAM. I cannot yield further.

Mr. WHITE. I deny the truth of that statement. Frank Gowen was an active agent, but my friends, General Albright and Linn Bartholomew, and others in the county of Schuylkill, conspicuous members of my party, whom I could name, were prominent actors engaged in the arrest of the authors of those crimes and in bringing them to justice. Do you deny that General Albright had anything to do with bringing those criminals to justice?

Mr. COFFROTH. General Albright had nothing to do with the trial of the first causes; besides he does not live in Schuylkill County, he lives in Carbon County.

Mr. WHITE. He lives in Mauch Chunk. I referred to other friends and members of the republican party who aided to bring the criminals to justice.

Mr. COFFROTH. Hon. Frank B. Gowen and Hon. R. W. Hughes, both democrats then, the latter now a greenbacker, prosecuted those cases.

Mr. ELAM. I cannot consent to yield any further.

Mr. WHITE. My colleague should be ashamed to bring odium upon his own State.

Mr. COFFROTH. I do not bring odium upon my State. I repudiate anything of the kind. I bring odium upon the men who defended and prolonged the execution of the Mollie Maguires, the men who controlled them in the election until they secured the election of their governor in that State, and then, because of the pressure of party politics, issued the warrants for execution.

Mr. WHITE. In every one of those counties there was a democratic majority, and all the Molly Maguires were democrats. I defy contradiction.

Mr. COFFROTH. They voted the republican ticket.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Who prepared Eliza Pinkston for her appearance before the returning board?

Mr. WHITE. I did not bring her there.

Mr. ELAM then concluded his speech printed above.

Mr. WISE. Mr. Chairman, before the discussion on this bill is ended I propose to suggest a few thoughts from my stand-point, and ask how and in what manner will it affect the people of the country at large? In the light of experience the use of "troops at the polls" by the order of the President can only end in disaster to the people. The gentlemen who have seats on this floor must not forget that the people are forbearing with their rulers to a fault, but when aroused to the fact that there is a direct or indirect design to contravene their rights as free and independent citizens to declare their sentiments at the polls by hinderance or molestation, the party so doing will be denied consideration by them. The people have made up their minds on this question that "troops at the polls to keep the peace," at the call of Federal power through ANY party that may control the executive, is menacing in its character to the liberties of the people.

From the formation of the Government the people of the States have looked upon privileges given to the Federal Government with a great deal of jealousy. They are, irrespective of party, unwilling to allow any more power to be centered in the Federal Government. The universal opinion of the people of all the States is, that the power of the State government must first be exhausted before any call or assistance can be received from the Federal Government. I am free to express myself on this floor that more than 80 per cent. of both parties, in fact, all except the politicians, are against the use of "troops at the polls" on the pretext "to keep the peace." Our republican friends on the other side of this Chamber know that this is a dangerous tool to handle, and in a roundabout way they would favor the repeal incorporated in this bill if it were not for the mode of doing it. Now, I have no desire to criticise the motives of these gentlemen; but, Mr. Chairman, are not the republican politicians here really begging to have a little more time, inasmuch as an election is close at hand? If they can only use the military at that time, they will be satisfied. They have just learned how to use this force in connection with marshals and a host of political spies who have been fattening upon the hard-earned taxes demanded from the people.

I insert the sworn testimony of a witness before the Wallace investigating committee of the Senate, to show the means used by the republican party to keep the peace at the polls:

Charles F. Miller sworn and examined.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Question. In what precinct do you live and vote?

Answer. In the seventeenth division of the Nineteenth ward.

Q. Were you in that precinct on election day?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. State what occurred there with regard to the conduct of the marshals, if anything.

A. About five o'clock a gang of repeaters came there—three or four of them—brought there by a letter-carrier. One of them came up to vote in the name of Mr. Motts. He was challenged, as it was said he was not the man. I went up and looked at him. I knew Mr. Motts, and I told this man he was not the man and he would have to go away from there. So I took hold of him and took him around to Magistrate Field's. He gave the name of Harrison; he had a hearing and was committed to prison. I took him down, and at that time got talking to him. I knew his face but did not know his name. Then he said his name was McCracken. He was taken to prison. The United States marshal there did not interfere. It was very quiet before that. About that time there was a little squabble in consequence of some man, who came up with a workingmen's ticket, hitting this man of whom I have spoken, but I stopped him.

Q. How do you know that it was a letter-carrier who brought that man there?
A. I saw him; I know him. I have seen him in uniform.
Q. Was he in uniform then?
A. No, sir.
Q. What is your official position?
A. I am the murder detective of Philadelphia.
Q. In connection with what office?
A. The district attorney's.
Q. Do you know Philip Madden?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Where does he live?
A. On Bainbridge street, I think, above Seventh, in the Fourth ward.
Q. In what division?
A. I cannot tell; I think it is the fourth.
Q. What is the character of Philip Madden?
A. I think he is one of the worst men in Philadelphia.
Q. In what respect?
A. He is a dangerous man; he is violent and dangerous.
Q. How long has he been out of prison?
A. I think probably eight months or a year. He was convicted of highway robbery, I think.
Q. Do you know of this man Madden having shot anybody?
A. I did not see him shoot anybody. I heard he shot a boy at one time.
Q. Was he in prison, to your knowledge, more than this one time?
A. He was in prison twice.
Q. What is his general character; is it that of a peaceable citizen, or that of a desperate, bad man?
A. His character is that of a desperate, bad man.
Q. Do you know Frances McNamee, of the Eighth ward?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. What is his character?
A. I arrested him for being concerned in five robberies, about seven years ago, and convicted him for having stolen goods in his possession. He was sentenced, I think, to eighteen months. I am not certain about the length of the sentence.
Q. Do you know in what precinct he lives?
A. No, sir; he lives in the Eighth ward, somewhere about Locust street.
Q. Do you know Joseph Hilferty?
A. No, sir.
Q. Do you know Daniel Reading, of the First ward?
A. Yes, sir; very well. I guess everybody here knows him.
Q. What is the general reputation of Daniel Reading?
A. He is considered to be a very bad, dangerous man. He has been tried for murder.
Q. How long since was he tried for murder?
A. In 1869.
Q. Is his reputation still bad or good?
A. Bad.
Q. Do you know a Mr. Pitts?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Of what ward?
A. The Seventh ward. He keeps a place in Lombard street above Eighth, on the south side.
Q. What is his business?
A. He keeps a gambling-place, and things of that kind.
Q. Is he a colored man?
A. He is a colored man.
Q. He keeps a gambling-house. Is it a drinking-house?
A. Yes, sir. He has been arrested once or twice, and was tried before.
Q. For what offense has he been tried?
A. I cannot remember; but he was arrested once or twice.
Q. To what ward does Daniel Reading belong?
A. To the First ward. His name does not appear upon the list of marshals as having been put down for the precinct in which he lives, but I think he lives in the twenty-third precinct; on Mildred street below McKean, I think.
Q. Is the name of Frank McGowan on the list of marshals here before the committee?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Is the name of Philip Madden on the same list of marshals?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Do you know Henry Scott?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Who is he?
A. He keeps a hotel in Lombard street.
Q. Is he a white or colored man?
A. A colored man.
Q. Do you know anything of him?
A. His reputation is bad. I am forgetting about him.
Q. Do you know Rodney F. Springfield?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Is he of the Fifteenth ward?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. What is his reputation?
A. He was tried for killing a colored man, for shooting him.

By Mr. CAMERON:

Q. Was he convicted?
A. No, sir; he was acquitted. He was a police officer, and the judge charged the jury that as he was a police officer, even if the man whom he shot was innocent, he had the right to shoot the man. The colored man was fleeing when this policeman shot him.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. Do you know George Cornelius?
A. Yes, sir; he is constable of the Fifth ward.
Q. Is he upon this list as a deputy marshal?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. The name of Springfield is on this list?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Do you know Michael Slavin, of the Fifth ward?
A. Very well.
Q. What is his reputation?
A. He is a notorious repeater, a thief.
Q. Has that been his reputation for some time?
A. It has, so far as I know him, for eight or nine years. I have seen him lead gangs of repeaters to vote, many a time; that is his profession, "repeater."
Q. Do you know William Glenn of the Nineteenth ward?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. What is his business?
A. He is superintendent of Norris Square.
Q. Under what authority?
A. Under the city.
Q. Does his name appear on this list of marshals?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Do you know Charles Boeler, [or Brinkler?]
A. He is the constable in the Sixteenth ward.
Q. Is he upon this list of deputy marshals?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Do you know Charles Dannenhower?
A. No, sir; I might know him by sight.
Q. Do you know Thomas Hood?
A. I think I do.
Q. Do you know David Monat?
A. I do. He is a councilman from the Fifth ward. He is in the prothonotary's office.
Q. A clerk in the prothonotary's office?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Is he upon this list of deputy marshals?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Do you know John Patton?
A. No, sir; not by name. I might know him if I saw him.

To use such means to "purify" the ballot is simple mockery.

As we pass along this line of argument let it not be forgotten by the gentlemen on the other side of the House that when their party was first organized it was published to the country by no less a personage than Hon. Rufus Choate, who was a bosom friend of Daniel Webster; that the republican party was sectional, the members of which were parading the streets of Boston before Mr. Choate's office with a flag with but one-half the number of stars within its folds, and were engaged in breathing out all manner of epithets against the South. This is the same republican party which flourished in proportion as sectional principles prevailed in 1860, and now is dying out in proportion as the people of the nation are becoming united. This is verified in both Houses of Congress. Now, forsooth, in proportion as the Southern States are returning to the Union and to the democratic party, we find the same sectional appliances of hate, vituperation, and abuse employed on the part of the republican Representatives to effect the same end, and when that cannot be done, and the people still fail to vote the radical ticket, they come upon the floor of this House crying "Give us the Army—troops at the polls to keep the peace." It is patent to every close observer, to every one who reads, that since the people of the South have been relieved from the interference of the Army, through democratic influence, there is more prosperity, more happiness, less confusion in that section than when the Army had charge of the polls.

Now, Mr. Chairman, not only was the strong arm of the military used at the polls in the several parishes in the State of Louisiana, but the troops dictated who should preside in the Legislature in 1876 by interfering in the legislative hall in driving representatives from it, so that the political complexion of that body was changed. Mr. Chairman, I ask if this branch of the National Legislature, this committee, is not a polling place? This is a place where votes are cast, expressions are reflected. Cannot the President, under this law, when we get a little boisterous, as was the case on last Saturday—it was especially more so than I ever witnessed at home at my polling place—cannot he send the troops here to this polling place to "keep the peace at the polls?" I insist that this is inferable, but is not in accordance with the eternal fitness of things. Yes, sir; he can invade either or both of these Chambers on the pretext that he is "keeping the peace at the polls" just as well here as in any State or parish in the country.

Mr. Chairman, when these facts are fully realized by the people in the North, you will see a change in the political phase of the Northern States. There is no mistaking this. Sir, it is patent to every thinking man that the plea of the republican members on this floor is for a revolution in the political status of the country. It is for a military despotism instead of a free representative form as our fathers gave us. Then, Mr. Chairman, the minority in this House are as much dissatisfied as they were before the late war of the rebellion; they want a revolution; they want to drive the representatives of the Southern States away from these halls. They find that this can be accomplished only by the placing of "troops at the polls to keep the peace;" they find they cannot do it by reason, hence they desire to do it by the power of the sword. They, by the change of the fundamental law of the land, have increased the representation in the Southern States, and unless they can command the strong arm of the "Army at the polls to keep the peace," as they have it in the law, they fall into the minority on this floor. The approaching election makes them overanxious in regard to the repeal of the several sections indicated in this bill. Does this not conclusively prove that they have lost all confidence in the people to hold free elections? Insisting, as they do, for the "troops to be kept at the polls," do they not commit themselves in opposition to trusting the people? Do they not say that self-government is a failure? George III made this same demand of the colonies. It was on this very principle that we separated from the mother country. We defended the principles of self-government against a foreign power; are we to defend and contest the same principles with the rulers of our own Government?

Mr. Chairman, we as a nation are struggling with a political foe for as sacred a cause as engaged the colonial fathers with a despotic foe. It is the same revolution over again; only, instead of being a despotic foreign foe, it is a political usurpation of the rights and liberties of our people. Hence, this is a vital question to the American people. There is another view of this subject I desire the members of this House to examine before they vote on this question. Our republican friends have been in full power for about eighteen years, and they learned too well that the purse and the sword are the power of the nation. They care nothing for public opinion. What they want is power. If the sections of the law proposed to be stricken out remain on the statute-book, then they have the use of the sword at the polls to "keep the peace." In my district the great struggle is to get the purse away from the republican party, back to the people, so that it can be so managed that the commercial industries can be revived. Under the management of the republican party the once thriving laborer and mechanic are too poor to obtain the prime necessaries of life.

In Pennsylvania we have to pass laws to punish tramps. It seems to have become a rule that the more business a man does the poorer he gets. The hardest-working man in the neighborhood is the first to be sent to the almshouse. The man who does the least to increase the volume of wealth in the country is flourishing out of large gains taken from the misfortunes of his useful business neighbors. But, Mr. Chairman, the scene does not close here; would to God that it did, and the curtain would drop and shut out from mortal vision the multiplied cases of deep distress and anguish which are on every hand. Investigation has disclosed a fearful situation among the laboring classes all through the North.

I here invite the attention of the committee to a report of an investigation made of the condition of the workingmen of Chicago:

A number of families were visited at meal-time. The food was observed to consist chiefly of black bread and broth. In a few instances there was a sort of a mess which had been cooked in an iron kettle, consisting of pieces of meat, bread, and soup. The physician stated, as a result of repeated observations, that much of the food eaten by this class was obtained at the slaughter-houses in the shape of refuse and blood.

Starvation has prevailed to an alarming extent, with and in the face of unlimited crops of every kind. These starving, suffering masses have been driven to riot and unlawful acts, not that they were intentionally wicked, but because they were in want of the common comforts of life. Sir, I might weary the patience of this committee by reciting tales of suffering and woe which have been endured by the best people of the country. During all this time the republican party has had full control of the Government.

Now, Mr. Chairman, let us account in some way for the situation. The picture is true of about nine-tenths of our people; the other tenth, I wish to speak of. They are the favored class of this country; their interests have been fully cared for in this Chamber. The taxes of the country have been lifted from their property and placed upon the shoulders of those least able to bear them. They, by being in a large majority on this floor, have seen fit to change the original contract of the foreign and domestic bondholder, thereby doubling the value of his bond at the expense of the people. In consonance with this they have a system of finance which is certain death to any of the business interests of this country. I refer to the national banking system in connection with the bond system; I know of no plan which could have been devised to so universally destroy the laboring classes as the one just referred to.

The dollar of the banker has four times the power of the dollar of the producer. The producer and manufacturer, after deducting taxes, can by careful industry and close economy save at the end of the year but little above 3 per cent. on capital invested, while this system of national banking realizes at least 12 per cent. The result of this is, the useless business has crushed out the useful vocations of the country while the money-selling banker has acquired great wealth and power; the industries are reduced to the lowest point of bankruptcy; the important law of distribution is violated to such an extent that a slavery is upon the white laborer of the North more loathsome and oppressive than was ever upon the black man of the South. I make no defense of southern slavery, because it was wrong; but what profit is it for the people of the North to offer up their lives for the abolishment of the one and then place themselves and their children under the power of a more exacting and oppressive master? At this juncture the republican party are calling most lustily for the use of the Army at the polls. This, to say the least, looks suspicious. They must mean more than "honest elections and honest count." Do they not oppose the repeal of the clause allowing the "troops to be used at the polls?" And why, Mr. Chairman, do they do it? For this reason: they have the greatest maximum of power and the people are reduced to their greatest minimum of power; hence a good opportunity is presented to revolutionize the Government.

The suspicion is still further aroused when it is so strenuously insisted upon just before the approaching campaign, with their candidate in training among the crowned heads, and who has already received as lengthy a service in the presidential chair as the "Father of his Country" would accept for fear the people would look with suspicion on any movement of this kind as a step taken in the direction of imperial power. Taking all these facts into consideration—that eight years in the presidential chair is as long a time on an average as the crowned heads of Europe hold the reins of their government, and that the republicans are insisting upon the use of the Army at the polls when the people are at their minimum financial strength to achieve victory—there is but one solution, and that is that the leaders of the republican party rather than let the democratic party govern the country, by the power of the PURSE and the SWORD are determined to revolutionize the Government from one of OPINION to one of FORCE. Hence we conclude that the present issue is one of the most important in time of peace ever brought before the American Congress, and the democracy cannot satisfy the people if they return to their homes without repealing the law; for ours is a struggle for liberty—the liberty of the individual, the liberty of a fair and honest ballot. Liberty exists in the hearts of our honest and sturdy voters. They heartily exclaim, in the language of Colonel Lovall, who was confined in Cromwellian dungeons—

O Liberty, can man resign thee,
Once having tasted thy gentle flame?
Can prison bolts or bars confine thee
Or whip thy noble spirit tame?

Mr. WHITE. Will my colleague allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WISE. I am always charitable, and will yield to my colleague.

Mr. WHITE. Was my colleague a democrat or greenbacker?

Mr. WISE. My colleague wishes to draw me out on that subject.

Mr. COFFROTH. He is a democratic greenbacker.

Mr. WISE. I am opposed to the national banking system.

Mr. WHITE. Is that the way they are in Greene County?

Mr. WISE. I am standing where President Jackson stood in 1832, and hold that the national banking system is dangerous to the liberties of the people, and I say four-fifths of the republican party in my county stand upon the same principle. They are opposed to the national banking system. They want the credit of the people given back to the people. They do not want it centered in the hands of a few men, taking the credit and property of the people for nothing and turning round and selling that credit back to them at a rate of interest which no business in the country can pay.

Mr. WHITE. How much "greenbacks" does the gentleman want?

Mr. WISE. As many as will subserve the best interests of the people. I do not propose to say how much that will be, but I propose to reach that particular point that will inure to the best interests of the people.

Mr. WHITE. Is my friend in favor of the billion proposed by the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. WISE. I will give my answer in this way: I believe the present financial system has been sedulously contrived, not for the improvement of the condition of the people, but, on the contrary, to the destruction of their best interests. I refer the gentleman to his own district, and I am sorry to refer him to my own district, with which he is well acquainted.

Mr. WHITE. My own district is getting along well.

Mr. WISE. A few men are making themselves rich out of the misfortunes of their neighbors—making more in that way than by legitimate business, whether of mining, agriculture, or otherwise. The iron interest, sir, of your county is in a terrible condition. I say, sir, that in nine counties out of ten in my State instead of one sheriff we should have two or three to conduct the sales. I know that my colleague is too intelligent to make a mistake in that direction. But if he is subserving the best interests of the country I will acknowledge that I am mistaken and he is right.

Mr. WHITE. The sheriff says the sales are decreasing in my district.

Mr. WISE. Do you not know there are more sheriff sales in your district now than there ever were in all its history?

Mr. WHITE. No, sir; two years ago the sheriff sales were more numerous. Since that time we have seen prosperity returning to our people. Business is looking up, and it will improve still further if we turn our attention to more legitimate legislation than these partisan enactments. I would like to hear my friend upon that question.

Mr. WISE. I thank my friend for calling attention to that. I have been endeavoring to call attention to it all the while. But when we undertake to offer bills for the relief of the distress which prevails among the people what do we find? We could not come before this House and present bills for the relief of our people; and why? Because the party on the other side to which the gentleman belongs objected by absorbing the entire morning hour. I say, Mr. Chairman, that party will be held to an account for this insult—I cannot use any milder word—for this insult to the American people.

I know my colleague [Mr. WHITE] is a very popular gentleman. He carries his own district in spite of several candidates dividing the opposition vote. I have not been up there myself, but still I am satisfied that some day he will find his match and that a Moses will arise in his district who will lead his people away from the bondage of the money-changers and do better for their interests.

Mr. COFFROTH. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. COFFROTH having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. JONES reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 2) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. STONE indefinitely on account of sickness.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. GOODE, by unanimous consent, leave was granted to withdraw from the files of the House papers in the case of Anna Perry; there being no adverse report thereon.

On motion of Mr. EVINS, by unanimous consent, leave was granted to withdraw from the files of the House papers in the case of Phœbe Meek; there being no adverse report thereon.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. In pursuance of the order of the House made this afternoon, I move that the House now take a recess until ten o'clock to-morrow morning.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at eleven o'clock p. m.) the House took a recess until to-morrow morning at ten o'clock.

AFTER RECESS.

The recess having expired, the House reassembled at ten o'clock a. m., (Friday, April 25, 1879.)

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. RICHARDSON, of South Carolina. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of proceeding with the consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. BLACKBURN in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes.

Mr. RICHARDSON, of South Carolina, addressed the committee. [His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

Mr. KIMMEL. Mr. Chairman, this law intends to clothe the United States Government with authority to keep the peace in the several States in violation of the Constitution, and therefore ought to be repealed.

The line of demarkation between the powers delegated to the United States and those reserved to the States and the people is clearly laid down in article 10 of the Constitution, in these words:

> The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people.

However wide may be the differences between strict and latitudinarian constructionists of the Constitution in regard to many of its provisions, there cannot be honest difference here. The framers of the Constitution were too deeply interested in protecting the States from the power of the Federal Government and its dread instrument, a standing army, not to have provided in the plainest language against all interference with the internal order of the States except upon the demand of the States themselves, as follows:
